RATIONAL RELIGION AND MORALS.

INTRODUCTION.

RATIONAL MIND, pure and innocent to its available capacity, gift of Deity, is the subject of analysis for the world's exaltation; not the perversion of man; not the ignorant tyrant and corrupt engine of government, oppressor of the people; nor the rabid evil genius of society, that riots in exploded customs and obsolete dogmas, the poor dependent on the bigoted opinions of the hour and brief authority.

But the independent assertor of immortal principles, and soundest practical philosophy of every-day life, acting with progressive improvement in the best lights before it, taught by the highest dictates of enlightened reason and liberal justice, and ever subject in its minutest errors, to the correction of truth's faithful representative, time, in its wisest tuition: that seeks to be wise in this world and to-day, that it may be wiser in the Universe and the future to come.

The Universe, the magnificent result of cause and effect, with its conservative principles declares the supreme character and name of its Author, in the great first cause, whose almighty attributes are centred in unity and perfection. The Creation presents past, present, and future theatre, for best fruition of intellectual and rational created beings.

The soul of the Universe and centre of universal sympathies is God, the preserver as creator, the ruler as organizer.

The analyst is Mind, moral free agent under the wise limits of universal conservative principles. The correct and immutable decisions of a sound rational mind of proper calibre and quality in a sound and healthful body, rest on common and proper sense, truth, honesty, justice, and science; principles, the essence and standard of which are reason, and their test is experience introductory to the highest earthly tribunal, an enlightened public opinion of a world-community, wise in conscientious reason, and just in truth and virtue.

ANALYSIS OF MIND—ITS FUNCTIONS.

AMONG the invaluable gifts of the Universe, subject to the best appreciation and enjoyment of God's noblest creation, man, brilliant as the light of the suns reflecting their elementary greatness and superiority in their solar systems, inviting as the planets with all their richest treasures and gorgeous splendors, honored with satellites and encircled by atmospheres, embracing all their wonderful elements and philosophical agencies united in mighty concentric revolutions, in connection with all the systems of spheres around the holy centre, still above all is Mind inestimable in value, that takes cognizance of universal relations and results, itself emanation and inspiration of the Supreme.

Mind analyzes the facts of creation, and introduces itself into the appreciation of the first great cause, Creator of all, of the Universe through the sublime tuition of cause and effect. Mind is the only key to the analysis of man's nature and destiny, and above all others that of its functions and of itself in the attainment of self, the greatest knowledge, an element of its unlimited powers only defined in the circle of the Universe.

Mind is the telegraph of Deity, to the Universe and eternity.

Mind is the best agent to secure immortality.

Without Mind man approaches the animal.

With Mind man approaches his God.

With Mind man reaches reason, an independent monitor, and entertains in its sublimest state an enlightened conscience, Mind's trusty guardian, God's best inspiration.

Without Mind man loses reason, degrades and brutalizes himself and becomes nothing, forgetful of his Creator and his highest, best, social duties and relations to mankind in general.

With Mind man governs himself and enjoys creation.

Without Mind man becomes the sport instead of the master of the elements, and the greatest wreck of the creation.

With Mind man does his duty, and reaches his dignity and reward, his highest self-respect and the best earnest for immortal fruition.

Without Mind man prostrates himself to the dust of the earth, and creates his own penalty from violation of universal conservative principles that vindicate themselves, and exact evil, the negative of good.

With Mind man masters time and soars to immortality and eternity.

The powers of Mind, the unsullied emanations of Deity are equal, if attaining its inherent virtues for its own rational conservation.

Mind increases in mental and moral endowments according to the appropriate cultivation and its richness of innate qualities, to the best exaltation and purity of conscience.

Man's moral free agency, or proper action of Mind accountable and responsible to attain its best purity, cannot be mistaken by Reason.

The qualities of mind made available if directed aright by the best cultivation, that declares the best lights of the world liberalized above all grovelling notions that cannot respect Reason, best exhibit the dignity of man's character and worth.

A pure mind must be filled with good, to avoid its necessary negative, evil.

Mind innocent and pure, is the unadulterated greatest gift of Deity; its negative state is that of evil, to be avoided on the principles of highest safety.

Mind constitutes the chief of the living scriptures of an Immortal Deity, alone guarding in its purity its sacred temple from injury.

Mind has to work out its good, as self and free agent, without which position there could be no merit.

Who can do justice to this noble jewel gift and diamond attribute, above all price?

To rational Mind, correct rational education and cultivation's pure light, are everything for its good, the only means for best appreciation of itself.

The operations of Mind are forever constant for good or evil, and should be furnished with the select treasure of proper materials.

The analysis of Mind discovers our errors, and secures the avoidance of their penalties in general, best on conservative principles.

Mind's best and satisfactory gifts mature on the attainment of general principles.

The brighter the light of Mind obedient to conscience, the more rational its enjoyment, and the brighter its reward.

The God of Creation has wisely given to Mind conservative principles, that are universally to be respected, for safety in physics, ethics, and all science.

Any other doctrines rest on no foundations and are demoralizing.

Mind can never yield reason to tradition, unless infatuated or unprincipled, misled or misleading by the wiles of sophistry and bigotry.

Any doctrine that requires or admits the least sophistry, that is a counterfeit of honestry to defend it, is dangerous to the rights of Mind in even an enlightened community; is demoralizing and an imposition, a false pretence, unworthy of the respect of Mind and Reason, of rational religion.

The whole truth cannot be recognised except through Reason, Mind's constant and sure guide.

Take Reason, the patron, away, and Mind is lost in a fathomless abyss, without compass or chart.

Will the people whose free mind should elicit pure light, being entitled to a proper position in rational religion, submit to the trespasses of ignoble sophistry on their senses, and the outrages of bigotry on their rights, because the theme is Theology? Every rational mind is held in abeyance, to the true wisdom of pure religion.

RELIGION.

Among the most sublime and magnificent subjects of the Universe is Religion, that properly refers rational Mind in all its duties to God and in all its social relations to man, productive of universal religion of principles and brotherhood.

Who can analyze this mighty subject?

Who has ever analyzed it rightly?

All rational and honest beings are vitally interested in Rational, the only True Religion, that causes the creature to appreciate with the highest adoration, the Creator of the Universe.

The highest-toned attributes of Mind, embracing in their amplest comprehension, morals, philanthropy and universal humanity, invoke the indispensable highest tribute, intellectual and religious of this world, to the proper investigation of this its most important theme.

This vital subject is addressed to all rational, particularly the most cultivated minds, the more religious as their civilization is more refined before the highest earthly tribunal of Reason and Truth.

Faith under such auspices, secures the right code of True Religion, that rests in the Bible of Rational Mind, that necessarily excludes all Bibles of Tradition of all pretensions.

Correct analysis of the rightful functions of the supreme gift of the Supreme Power, Mind rightly cultivated, shows wisdom the most rational fund for Religion in rational existence, to bless the highest rationality, the immortal soul.

Are intellectual freemen, the highest state of mortal existence in refined civilization, afraid to investigate this loftiest subject, because bigots, the slaves of slaves, proclaim their dynasty?

Will freemen never avow rightful professional universal views of True Religion, because of the dynasty of the false, but another edition of superstition?

Will they elude the very means of true wisdom through rightful investigation?

The God of Nature and the Universe has endowed his rational creation with religious as well as physical conservation, vindicating his glorious principles.

Can the Mind of Truth in good faith avoid any longer its investigation, because corrupt dynasties have sought to alienate Mind's rights, and bury truth under the false pretences of conceited and presumptuous faith?

Faith rises the more exalted as Truth justifies, and Reason confirms it.

All minds good and true looking to their duty, to human nature so fallible under the wiles of sophistry and the curses of fanaticism and bigotry, to the best interests of a world-wide subject that interests the affections of all minds for their best safety, for the security of all salutary institutions, should raise at least modest protests to stay some of the errors of the day, too prevalent for silence and acquiescence.

It is to be deplored, that so many of the supposed authority-minds engaged in politics, the press, peculiar faith, and the professions, are afraid to say their soul is God's alone, but as mere caterers to pre-existent customs, no matter of what calibre and quality, continue pretences the seed of future evil, when the light of the age, Reason and Mind, require so many fundamental changes.

The right doctrine is no creed fund, no manufactured discipline, no inquisitorial dogmas, but that which meets the demand of Mind upon the proper Faith of Reason, founded in the very character and essence of creation.

None other can be more essential or ancient, as it refers to the first origin and originator of all: hence, all other creeds are antagonistic and subordinate to extinction, as none of them reaches the correct position of the supreme, nor purely consecrates with faithful and intellectual reverence, his most characteristic attributes.

Man's nature demands religion that only comes truly and rightly through the wisdom and purity of mind, and mind must look to itself for truth.

All wise men confide from the satisfactory evidences of their senses, that were given them to lead to all correct conclusions and the proper reflections thereon by mind, that has the unbounded theatre of the Universe to read and analyze in a Creator and his conservative attributes, and firm in this knowledge, they dare not contravene them as due in full to the first great cause originating all such.

Rational religion acts then in all sincerity of conviction with all conscience, and is too pure for mortals to assail.

So enlightened is public mind in this free and intelligent Union, that if we were now to submit to its test, it is rational to believe that the majority would decide that all religious faiths short of rational religion are wrong.

An enlightened conscience affirms them wrong, in principle and profession.

But many systems may be built up on various materials, the main question especially in religion is, which is the right one, for there can be only one right? Rational mind positively, without the least risk of mistake, declares that, rational religion. Now, Mind has that to investigate.

Can it be credited that priestcraft has imposed so much superstition on the human mind not liberalized by education, that people are actually afraid in their stupid ignorance, to institute any comprehensive investigation?

All such minds are slaves of priests and superstition, especially, if they oppose to this very investigation the names of infidelity, skepticism, and free thinking.

Religion is a conscientious serving and duty to the Almighty in appropriate manner, for the certain safety of mind on earth, and the soul's security thereafter.

Without rational religion the mind overlooks its obligations, and the particulars of those obligations, and the noblest of all the object of all duty.

Without rational religion the mind loosely conceives of duties, but fulfils no direct obligations.

Rational religion then is, the rational binding of rational minds to the Almighty Being, for all rational duties during its consciousness.

The reward is the amount of life's benefits and soul's happiness.

The induction to the true belief of principles of paramount value, regards the Immortal Being, Author, Creator and Preserver, Almighty. The unity of these principles produces necessarily, unity indivisible and incommunicable to others, as division implies an equivalent imbecility. One Being who does everything by his own inherent attributes supreme and independent, cannot by reason of those attributes divest himself of them.

All good citizens are bound to uphold the proper institutions of the world, in their relations to their and others interest.

Then they must think wisely and essay to counteract those rabid self-interest seekers, who act all the time as if nature required a midwife, and that all the departments could be supplied by their important pretensions.

They just reverse Nature's acts and God's decrees, interrupting the beauty and strength in impeding the most substantial blessings and most legitimate capital, the inherent capacities of liberalized mind.

They must be reminded to make no trade or speculation of religious professions.

This is a sacred gift, so intended to all men that have rational mind as an innate quality distinguishing it from that of the brutes, to be used rightfully according to its endowing faculties, distinguishing grade of talents, that must never be perverted for any sinister purpose.

THE BIBLE OF RATIONAL MIND.

I stand committed in pledge, to a proper amount, for the correctness of the principles of the Bible of rational mind, through the blessings of rational religion. Our proper position will be thus defined:—Finding that there is no peculiar rational inspiration, it becomes mind most nurtured in culture to rear the best fabric of a moral and religious code. As to the people not being able to appreciate things aright, that is a great mistake. In popular constitutional government, we see that, as constituents, they are competent to teach their representatives, and rebuke them for their delinquency. They cannot know the world-facts too soon. It is because they have been taught by peculiar education, the perversions of mind to aid the cause of their false teachers, that the world has suffered so much and long. With the Peace Convention, the pacificators of the world cannot establish peace without principles; with them, they can procure peace without the convention.

This bible calls for science, knowledge, and wisdom, the best appreciation and use of principles. The present time uses as agents, or servants, the gods of the ancients, as lightning, and surely should define their peculiar bible to be effete.

This bible aids to break up the odious monopoly of evil customs and habits that do not seek what is right, but what is popular.

What is really sacred history, is that which pertains to the pure rights of God, who has written and endorsed all his own writings in the universe, by his supreme self-evidence.

The bible of mind only elicits the knowledge of the true God and his supreme characteristics, displayed by his unmistakeable and undeniable word, cause, and effect,—that introduce rational mind through the principles of causation,—that reflects the whole universe.

Now, nothing in the universe besides gives these facts, that are fixed and immutable. No peculiar book of man, of Jews or any other, can do it.

It may be pretended that the world, mankind, would only get the idea of God out of their Jew bible, which is the most absurd of all fallacies. Various nations, as a part of the Egyptians, Persians, had just as good an idea. The knowledge of deity among all the ancients, Jews and all, was most clearly imperfect, and reflected their limited knowledge.

The statement of Josephus, of Aristeus, to Ptolemy Philadelphus, that the Egyptians worshipped the same God as the Jews, who "paid a peculiarly excellent worship to him," cuts down all pretences of the priestocracy. The bible proves who was their peculiar God, and all that assert the claims of the Jews to a pure view of the God of the universe, compromise truth, honesty, and intelligence.

The bible of rational mind proclaims that you can be nothing without monotheism.

I am gratified that I have adequately and most satisfactorily investigated for myself the subject of religion, and that monotheism presents the only position that will secure rational religion. It is essential for all mankind to know, that religion must hold all peculiar faith in perfect abeyance, which proves at once the whole position of monotheism, or rational religion. Let these be on one side, and the brightest of peculiar faith on the other.

Would you go to Mark's last chapter to wind up all the Christian believers at one moment, or would you soar to God's Word to reach the facts of sublimest action? It is even so; you go to Mark or to God's works. What a difference.

By God's Word you rule out Mark and all the tribe of impostors of spiritual knockings. God's facts are omnipotent. If you went to Mark you would be none the wiser, but be the subject of imposition, ignorance, prejudice, bigotry, and superstition, a world's age; whereas, if you went to cause and effect, you would defeat the whole humbug, without getting out of your seat. Now, what else but a participation in such crimes can you plead, who adopt such a felon as Mark? As good citizens you are bound to renounce all such at once, now and for ever.

You bible advocates may feel ashamed after your Wesleys and your Foxes are exposed; but you still persist in the participation of the foundation that is ever creating such vile impositions.

Agitation of the world by such a base, is horrible indeed. You have asked us to read your bible, and I candidly tell you the result.

The powers of ratiocination elicit the world-wide faculties to perceive that the standard of perfect, correct, legitimate, exact, sublime taste is religion, that points to the highest enjoyments of the universe, and the best appreciation of its God. As to peculiar faith, she is a murderess, tainted with high treason to mind and God, debauched in all the prostitution of priestocracy.

The bible of mind proves conclusively that all bibles are mere books, till proved bibles, otherwise they are base, ignominious counterfeits.

The bible of rational mind gives us the highest reverence for Deity, far surpassing all that Polytheists, including Trinitarians, can possibly have with their peculiar mutilated gods.

The world is a mutual insurance company, that bespeaks the holiest purposes to be carried out on religious and social principles. Exalt yourselves, people of the world, to the right appreciation and action.

Monotheism contemplates rational religion, the comprehensive universe problem, that requires the immortality of the soul for its completion, and comes the nearest of all in proving it in the sublime data given. Peculiar faith deals in the metaphysics, mysteries, and detestable sophistry of faith, while religion looks to honest truth and facts.

She bids the world, rational mind, mankind, to seek the right position, and maintain it rationally, and to act with a zeal worthy of the best of causes, that of the First Great One Almighty. It is only religion that can put the whole frame-work of world society right. She must bring in her conservative revolution, enable the master analyst to correctly criticise all departments of life. To rid the world of all the malign antagonism that is alien to its whole interests, let all have all the fullest and speediest benefits of rational religion. All peculiar-faith, Christian, or any, is in the way of the legitimate currency.

How the world is imposed on all the time by the whole mock-faith. You must not discuss religion, say the priestocracy, and the people blindly obey those whose very name will be a by-word hereafter. The peculiar bible logic is the craziest of all things. It would wind up the creation at any time if it ever had a hold, from the imbecility of its peculiar gods.

Heretofore it was only sectarianism exchanged for another kind, all bad and without redress. Then all sectarianism and peculiar faith went for rational religion; but this will not now do, as none is religion that is peculiar.

Now, because many do not believe peculiar bibles, they are not to be excluded from the higher obligations of principles of religion that the world, mind, mankind, must have. The bible if rational will bid us never take up a position without principle that will uphold us for ever.

Rational religion legislates for the whole world, and yields to mind its rationality, and to rationality all that are in the elements of eternal happiness. Why do men differ so much about religion? Because they have never analyzed this subject aright. They advance doctrines, pretending them principles.

THE BIBLE OF RATIONAL MIND AND RELIGION, AND THE PREMIUM OF $5000 THEREON.

What can be advanced against the bible of rational mind? An unprincipled opposition may affect that it is like the works of Deism, not right. Then if wrong, why not seek the reward?

As all critics cannot be confided in because all do not rationally and religiously investigate, all rational minds should take nothing for granted from the priestocracy.

I would not only be happy, but am anxious to pay over five thousand dollars in negotiable paper, to any peculiar faith advocate, Christian, Jew, Mormon, Mahommedan, or any other, to prove the authenticity of any such bible, and if not competent to do so, to upset monotheism, all by rational principles.

That I may do full justice to this whole subject, I make the preceding offer.

I will be thoroughly a monotheist, and that I may be so, I comprehend all peculiar faiths known to the world, or that can be possibly conceived of by mind.

The reason is most obvious, as how can any advocate act with truth and fidelity if he cannot establish the authenticity of his bible?

How can he religiously blame any mind for infidelity, if he cannot prove or demonstrate the faith authentic? In other words, can any triumph over infidelity if they cannot prove or demonstrate the faith authentic? The only triumph over infidelity, is through the authenticity of the peculiar bible. But if unsuccessful, then what becomes of conscience, that peculiar faith-advocates talk so egotistically about?

If all peculiar faith bible-positions be utterly false, must not their advocacy be perjury? The question is with all such advocates to disabuse the enlightened mind, or abide the explosion of the only infidels, for assuredly, if incompetent to demonstrate the truth of the peculiar faith-bible, they stand forth in bold relief as impostors, and are estopped from any abuse against those whom they assail with false pretences as infidels.

What intelligent world-citizen is there, that cannot see that no dependence can be put in peculiar faith-criticism?

There are various reasons that cause me to commit myself to monotheism.

I will pay for the damages to the world and its society, in order to be set right if wrong.

Peculiar faith people will estimate this book with the prejudices, that they have to all other books not espousing their doctrines.

But are they not tired of their own profitless position that disturbs the world, and does not benefit any?

Do you, citizen, wish to adhere to superstition, or change to the cultivation of religion?

Do you seek the only rational means thereto?

The universe read rightly, gives us the only correct edition of God's works.

Those not appreciating, may require the reason of my publication. My answer is, to have religion put on the proper basis of mind.

The more bigots oppose, the better, as they will use themselves up in the sublime facts of monotheism.

Were I to omit this publication, I might be more popular in Church and secret society, but a great and paramount duty awaits me.

My individuality is not to be looked at, especially when I claim no exemption from human nature's frailties. I pay this premium, if fundamentally wrong.

My good feelings can be perceived in the principles, as I deal with what militates against them.

If the whole set of peculiar doctrines are wrong, then no part of any peculiar faith can stand. Thus much of the proposed reward might be offered to the successful proof of a Devil, which would be a miserable failure according to the correct law of evidence. This premium is offered to any person of the five grand divisions of the whole world, that will prove without any sophistry, that the author is not right in the main, on the subject of rational religion, or the bible of rational mind. This certainly is the paramount question with the world, that ought to correct the errors or adopt the principles of the author. That question resolves itself into the enlightened inquiry of how far he is right, and what is essential to perfect the glorious system. Mind that is rational, sees no rational authenticity of any peculiar scriptures of the myriads of ancient bibles, and consequently the full failure of all their advocates to disprove the bible of rational mind. There can be no satisfactory proof of the authenticity of any bible of tradition in the world, no matter from which of the five grand divisions. The bible of the religion of principles, God's document, cannot be gain-sayed, much less disproved. The only proof that is required of the authenticity of the scriptures, is satisfactory evidence on the principles of sound truth.

But the author may be mistaken? Then this premium is for the mistake. I wish to be rid of all mistakes.

But why the reward? As many have prejudged. I am desirous of calling the citizens of the world back to right perception and judgment, and therefore offer this premium for orthodoxy.

What proof do I require? The authenticity must be unquestionable and satisfactory to gentlemen.

If I were offered this premium to prove my position, and could not do it, I would renounce that profession, certainly, as disreputable.

I consider that monotheism or religion of principles, is self-evident.

What good does peculiar faith do, but deceive the world, trading on the capital of the first? All is arrogant imposture.

All the writers on monotheism, must ever have its principles as paramount, while on the same subject seeking originality, they may still have analogous views, in some respects, differently, or even similarly expressed.

The platform that I maintain, upholds conservative principles. I have and can have, no antagonism to any that upholds them.

Have the priestocracy any to God Almighty?

Why do I offer this premium for what is so clearly plain? To meet bigots, most effectually.

If this book have truths unimpeachable, the world can see the premium safe; if otherwise, the prize is truth gloriously won.

The bigot would lay aside his views about peculiar faiths and Messiahships, before the sun-light was off his horizon, were he not a prejudiced bigot. Thus with facts so plain, the bigot will remain bigot, till monotheism diffuses its rays and dispenses its blessings. No one with successful solutions, can draw on me in vain. Good men will excuse me if wrong. I know I shall be excused at the right time by such. All objections to receiving this premium, can be met at once, for the amount can be dispensed, if fairly won, to all the best of purposes, and the triumph can be that of the noblest, most laudable, ambition.

The purport of this publication, is to secure the right faith by discussion freely and fairly executed.

This work was written in pure defence of religion, and to illustrate not christianity, but the brilliant and substantial effects of mind reflecting Deity's power, regaining her long usurped rights.

What true soul can I possibly offend?

If any have adopted bad faith or pernicious errors, no matter the name, of course they ought to be obliged to me to set them right.

Prove me wrong, and I will adjust all claims of right and order.

If I have become antagonistic to you or your rights clearly, convict me on principles.

But some people are afraid to read such books. No one that is wise and sincere is afraid to trust the selection of the true from counterfeit coin, to have a true report as the result.

But the perverted are afraid, those that hold the bad coin, tremble for fear and reproach. Forethought in all such discussion, will disclose the true point.

If the position of rational religion be not correct, what is easier than to win the premium?

If I have done an injury to the Church or the priestocracy, I will atone for it by that means, and act with the amende honorable. Without investigation, no one could rightly estimate how valid this position is.

I let the subject carry me to its legitimate results, and congratulate myself on the amount of satisfaction. I am pleased to find my writings confirmed on reading the world before publication. Genius has consecrated her contributions, at the shrine of monotheism in more ways than one, for mankind, mind have devoted, however imperfectly their resources, in some way or other, in all ages and in every clime.

But as the premium being forthcoming, the peculiar faith advocate affects that I would not believe his doctrine if an angel from his heaven were to come with the proof. To all this the most valid answer can be at once returned, that my soul, my mind with its functions, has the deepest interest in all such.

I have as deep a sincerity in all this matter as could be elicited in all the treasure of the Universe. Who can have any deeper or more vital interest?

I am fully satisfied in my own confidence that there is but one God, a perfect Being, but to prove that I have no part of prepossession, I offer the premium not to defend myself behind prejudices, but to annihilate them, no matter where they exist.

After a number of years' investigating and thinking on spiritualization of peculiar faith, my mind all at once fastened on rational religion, as the only effectual means without prejudice or peculiar education. From these two words has grown all that is valuable to my mind.

I offer the premium on the basis of principles, sound honest sense and truth I offer it for authentic proof, demonstration, satisfactory and soundest principle that the whole world will recognise

If a bank note affirmed to be valuable, but unknown to us, were offered, the world of course in its wisdom would ask for satisfactory proof of its genuineness. If books are presented which their advocates pretended guaranteed deeds of gifts of the most important kind, and had besides what were considered genuine interpolations that affected them essentially, and no name signed, being perfectly anonymous, a sane man would not, could not receive them. Interpolations prove foul play, when especially, all are palmed on the world as genuine.

Who endorses their divine origin? Self-evidence cannot, as in God's works. The text is admitted by the warmest advocates, to be corrupted. How far? Of course, enough to invalidate them by their vitiations.

Is this religion that goes for honesty and truth? The world has nothing to do with such peculiar faith or its bibles, but truth is needed as the strictest justice to the world to anticipate all such evils.

I wish the smartest scholars to meet this question fairly and honorably. I would not mislead the world, hence this premium to be applied as the church sees fit when fairly won.

This offer is for the people, including the parsons. I wish to give the Bible advocates all the advantages they claim and prove, wishing to advance the highest morals of the world, and declaring for pure religion. All that belongs to rights and justice, I wish to accord.

If the world priestocracy cannot attack the main points with truth, they should not protract this world wrong any longer, nor vitiate the principles of refined civilization to effect retaliation. In the name of God let them adopt the principles of rational religion, and unite the world on the glorious basis of universal brotherhood. Liberality and justice will enable me to allow all the legitimate latitude of proof on the principles of reason in the world.

This work is an introduction to the magnificent subject of Monotheism that all minds should rightfully analyze, and not listen to the seductive and criminal sophistry of priestocracy. If there be any real error on any adopted faith, ought not its advocates who profess truth, be most signally obliged to any intelligent minds for exposures of its fraud or its imposition? To satisfy the most skeptical, I desire to be responsible and hold the world responsible for facts. I write not to incense any order, being no opponent but on principle.

RELIGIOUS MORALS.

Has the world any religious morals? It has peculiar faith morals in abundance, which pervert the world. Mind has to look to the illimitable liberality of rationality in religion to reach them. The desecration of religion is by peculiar faiths.

The idea of approaching God is by our best actions, words and thoughts.

Rational religion can establish the only basis of pacification throughout the world, and the best platform for universal civilization.

Do I have faith or belief in a God? Certainly. Why do I have that confidence?

Because this is a world most conclusively of cause and effect, and the proper analysis refers most positively to the great first cause. No rational mind can escape this just conclusion.

In the next place, I must define to the extent of my powers exactly what are the qualities, attributes and principles of God. These we can appreciate more exactly by philosophical science the more exactly we can define it, that is we can only define them exactly by exact philosophical science—none other, as all the false pretences of tradition bibles conclusively show. God is the exclusive Creator, uncreated and unbegotten. How can any claim of a begotten created son, be equal? The idea is preposterous to all that will drop the priest and become the man, the thinking rational being.

Religion, rational religion, is certainly not accountable for any slaughter of the human race in any age or country, in France, or elsewhere; if that were the case, God is amenable to man's censure, the most absurd position. All such evils are referable to peculiar faiths, all of which are of man.

Rational religion requires the full culture that implies the constant exalted exercise of conscience, the conservative of rational mind.

The only universally safe position in this Universe is on principles. You are after religion, and must therefore maintain in the best faith, intellectual, social, moral, religious, filial, conjugal and parental relations. You can obtain all by and through God alone and exclusively; by none other most positively. Is it religious morals to continue the propagation of inventions, made in the days of a world's ignorance? Let reason look into facts, and it must see that God has no room for a specific hell or purgatory. What is it to the people if the pockets of the priestocracy require them?

Mind has to regard the world, national and individual sins, according to the Universe ethics established by God. All this requires the supreme duty of all mankind.

The peculiar faiths of the world have finessed too much, and, destitute of principles as all are universally, they have lost the confidence of the truly religious.

As religion is the supreme of all supreme constitutional rights, it is indispensable that she be confirmed by all constitutional principles.

Religion goes for the greatest of all good, the whole public of the world and nothing less at all. What can imply more universal benefit accredited in all good faith? Carry religion into the world. It has it now. Let it be improved on, to make it as rational as the highest rationality can carry it.

In matters of religion the rational mind must elicit principles, not mere policy, to command the organic powers of the whole, or Nature. The whole classes of the world society form one harmonious whole. All reforms and revolutions should be invariably and universally conservative, and all then must be on rational principles to be permanent. The rulers of the world should bow to the majesty of religious not peculiar faith requisitions, however much of peculiar power and vanity they sacrifice.

When we speak of reform on conservative revolution, it is the right action of the world to recovery of her right position. None should be without legitimate principles.

Truth and honesty uphold all religion that sustains mind, but all peculiar faith starts with the reverse and necessarily ends in perjury. How horrible!

The world must stop the mere temporal policy of peculiar faith, and let rational religion have its noblest sway. The character of religion is desecrated, to dub peculiar faith by that name when all is so clearly disproved. The world cannot discuss too rationally all that is religion.

Carry conservative reform to the right point—far enough. This is a world-wide question.

What, freemen, reject rational religion? What were your free constitutional institutions for, but this in part? If any country do not positively assert her rightful claims to rational religion, assuredly she will be cursed with peculiar faiths. There is no failure. As the Jewish councils made Mosaic bibles or found them at convenience, so did the Romans make testaments, all patch-work. These characters not only endorsed those demoralizing lies, but ask the world to do so.

As great as was the creation of our noblest of all governments, because God-given by our illustrious ancestors, the most illustrious of all in the pages of heraldry, our nation now is equally concerned in the preservation of the most difficult of all—all solvable by religion that recognises the highest of morals, virtue and intellect.

Rational religion carries rational mind, while peculiar faith assumes faith. Religion decides on justice universal, before she affects any position, and rules out all atheists and polytheists as most superficial in most positive demonstration of their reckless ignorance or want of principle. Religion sustains the wisest statesmen, the deepest, soundest original thinkers, the firmest friends of rational mind, all the true and faithful conservators of the world.

Religion alone, gives infallible orthodoxy after all the false pretences of churches What is the statement of ignorant preachers worth, when they are not competent to proper analysis?

You must have all practicable of rational religion, to keep the world, mind, man, nations, right in every respect. Let the whole world be triumphantly upheld by the consciousness of what is right, righteous, and religious, that is the sublimest consummation of all things. Uniform protection, the only practicable and available one can be given, is only given by rational mind, morally as physically, by all the conservative principles of religion.

What is the weak point in Monotheism? There is none. They are all strong, as long as the Universe and the God of that Universe are bound reciprocally by it. If God as God is eternal, the duration of that Universe is eternal. Astronomers will correct their pretended discoveries of extinguished stars. It was their extinguished ideas resting on an extinguished bible. Nothing has been sacred to this thing of peculiar faith, that has made and extinguished stars therefor. The light of rational religion presents the civilized mind without fear or reproach before God.

Death is the effect of sin. What folly and falsehood the peculiar-bible propagates. Will any advocate in his senses, pretend to deny the omnipotent facts of creation, where death results from organization and its inherent laws.

Rational religion, monotheism, is in favor of justice, honor, principles, in the best of good faith, that supersedes all other faith. Religion demands the rightful expulsion of all priestocracy at once, by enlightened public opinion, all the reserved rights of rational religion meet, call for the necessary regulations of the whole world, on the best unity and polity of design, just after God's requisitions and express ordinations.

Religion is that which binds all rational beings to their duty, all to their God of the universe, and that rules out all peculiar-faith and bibles, and their priestocracy. Instead of sending sectarian or peculiar faith missionaries as those of christianity, to proselyte the world to their peculiar education, which is most vicious: Monotheists request that missions be sent to suggest the propriety of the world's getting rid of all peculiar faiths, and seek the most rational, the only religion.

"Whatever is, is right," takes precedence as God's attribute. The universe of God, his creation, whatever he did, is right. Man's actions must be squared by God's principles, to be right. God's creation bespeaks the universe and its conservative principles. Anything short of this, is wrong. Religion defines this position as the only correct one. All man's acts, so far as they conflict in antagonism with God's conservative principles, are wrong, and all his sophistry to uphold it, cannot avail.

"Whatever is, is right," calls for mind to have all in abeyance to this position of the creation, and that mankind's whole life should be one continued state of gratitude and love to God. Monopoly and usurpation seek to invade these premises, and apply them as their property, assume with their base sophistry all to themselves. The universal language of nature, is that of God—all peculiar, is that of man.

Who mistakes death? That is universal language.

Religion accurately defines that of God, not of men, unless they conform to the highest requisitions of rational mind. Deliver us from her half-way defenders.

Religion holds all bibles of peculiar faith in abeyance to its supreme conservative principles, to which all peculiar-faith advocates will have to yield, and they had better do it at first than last. Man has to do right, by the eternal standard of God, the great first cause, who is altogether right. That is the difference between the two. As God is perfect, He cannot be personified through less than his universal attributes. Any peculiar-bible that affects it, caricatures him and constitutes its most blasphemous impeachment.

"Whatever is, is right," makes religion right. She will give you all that is legitimate on earth, and the best earnest of the future. She will exalt you on principle, and raise you to glory. Hers is the voice of wisdom through the paths of science, and the ways of philosophy. She teaches a world to seek and secure peace and happiness, by unerring means.

The universe must be comprehended by a wise comprehension, ere criticism has claim on intellectual confidence. This world cannot furnish what is a universe problem, therefore monotheism introduces mind into the sublimest hope of immortal existence, to rightly appreciate its loftiest purposes.

RELIGION.

WHAT is the religion of rational mind? That which discloses the true duty of man to God, and puts down all base trading speculation of the world—the counterfeit.

Though the world speaks about religion, its age, and have not principles, all is worthless. Though the world prides itself on faith, and have not truth and reason, faith's masters, it has nothing. To have the right faith, mind must be faithful to truth and reason, and to have the best security for all such, it must have rational education. Religion is for just views. All must be just to the God of the universe, to mind, the whole world and universe. She establishes on the best demonstration, that the only safety is through principles. The bible of rational mind introduces the religion of mind. That begets the deepest humility, and the supreme unbounded confidence in the Creator, as the supremacy of science is from Deity. He who speaks against that, is base and blasphemous. Stubborn bible bigots will suppose that you are to take their bibles to get religion. Nothing short of the Creator will do, and we have only to improve what he has already given. Religion is a pure, perfect principle; when matured, the soul matures and rests there in the bosom of purity. Religion rests on the eternal sublimity of her sincerity and simple purity, abstracted from all the violations of reason. What is more precious than woman's chastity, man's integrity, the world's humanity, mind's religion?

Religion strictly teaches mind to beware of all violations of principles, lust, drunkenness, avarice, and envy, as they produce murder, crimes, adultery, poison, all the misery of mind. How do we get righteousness? By grace and mercy of God. How the profoundest humility? By the deepest confidence in God, who is known by the best analysis that philosophical science discloses, to be so exalted, as to exclude all pretensions of polytheism. The deepest analysis gives the best confidence and humility. What can be said of Messiah righteousness? That it is as heinous as self-righteousness; both are self or priestocracy delusions. The religionist is to seek proper compliance with the requisitions of wise laws to promote sound morals, true duty, and the highest civilization,—to leave the world better than he found it. The mighty question of true religion is kept in abeyance to a union of church and state, the policy of empires, of power despotic in government. Peculiar faiths, their mouth-pieces, misrepresent all the qualities of Deity. Talk of them, when God is surely proved by his creation. Who would presume to libel God by bibles of tradition? We hardly know ourselves, till indisposition or sickness teaches us. Do we know of order, harmony, till we feel disorder, derangement? We are then for law, order, religion, and the Creator of all these. We do not know of organization till we know of disorganization, and we must then appreciate the Almighty Organizer of the universe. The world needs the broadest position of morality and religion, but not out of any peculiar bible, for its writers did not know them at all. The very idea of peculiarity kills all.

All owe a gentlemanly deportment to civilized society, and are under the highest obligation to offend it least by thought, word, or deed. The world must seek to maintain the soundest public opinion, to be universally conservative. Religion is the only thing that suits that, to create the world morals.

Those who have power have no mercy, if they have no principle.

What is religion? We only know some say, as others tell us. What are freemen with cultivated minds, and not know this subject? Have you ever investigated it? No! Why? Because my preacher tells me not! Is your preacher your master? Force of arms or device of sophistry is not the way to settle questions of the world to be civilized. Religion is the supreme wisest intellectual and moral power of the world. By religion alone can mind progress to one uniform standard, as to present virtue as uniform as mind can present it. The world will be better sustained as self-balanced.

Let us see where religion is, that is the good faith of truth and principle. Are you after religion?

All the wise, true, and good are after nothing else, and that in her purity and excellence. Religion affords supreme protection to all. Religion sees that you are accused, does she teach the doctrine of non-resistance? You are innocent? Then act to the promptings of an honest mind. Face the world and at once invoke, challenge the worst, defy on your position. Innocence can triumph over the world certainly. But do one bad or suspicious act, then you may be suspected for the worst,—as for instance, an adulterer. You will not then be too good to be charged as a poisoner and murderer, especially if the accusers have any hold of you for any such crime. In being an adulterer you become a perjurer. Religion leaves nothing to contingency.

All peculiar faiths are the work of man, but religion is the work of God. Religion exists, yet man affects other faith. He thinks that the bible of tradition has it! The greatest mistake in the world. Well may we say what a mistake; and then base men have taken horrible advantage of it. The fact of correct observation has been needed. Mind must exclusively rely on the justice, greatness, magnanimity, goodness, and all the essential attributes of God.

Man is a creature of social, moral, and religious feelings, of course the gift of his Creator.

To have the right cultivation, we must have proper education,—a true, practicable, rational knowledge of science, &c. Religion sustains the reality, not the romance of virtue, and calls for the tribute of praise and thanksgiving by appropriate benevolence to the destitute, proper deeds to the world. What an enviable fame would the good citizen get, to die aiding the helpless and destitute. Such will strive to succor the distressed, relieve the afflicted, protect the defenceless. Adequate reward will bless the mind that has principles; the curse of those destitute of them will be certain, as principles vindicate themselves.

All have more religion the more civilized,—this is an indisputable axiom; the less civilized the less religion, as the crusaders prove, &c. What more glorious measure can there be for the soul than doing justice to religion on the proper principles of mind? As having a free and intelligent mind in the glorious free agency of God, you have done justice to the investigation of this subject on both sides, as wise persons will not possibly put any bibles otherwise into the hands of their offspring, whose immortal souls have to be cared for in the most rational way. But the minister tells the world that the books that show up Christianity are dangerous. What do parents say? They do not investigate the books, for they are afraid. Afraid of the truth!

But have you avoided the subject? If you have, then are you and they traitors to the right use of mind.

But the world is afraid to oppose the bibles. Mind is crushed by the baseness of superstition. What clashes with preconceived constructions of the bibles, is what clashes with the priestocracy, deeply interested in their corruption; thus we do not recognise that God's construction is elsewhere than in his works.

You declare for such bibles, then you are at issue with God. Religion of mind progresses as mind is civilized. Peculiar faith, of peculiar education, usurps the province of mind, in assuming to dictate about religion. True devotion to God is inculcated by religion of principle. Benevolence inculcates the noblest acts under her auspices.

Religion is the most sacred duty, higher than bibles, creeds, and peculiar faiths, above all art. The God of Nature requires all adoration, worthy of the laws and principles of nature, of the purity of creation.

Mind is obliged to have religion, as nature has laws. The purport of religion is to lessen mind's and the world's misery, and teach the soul of man to look to a better future. The permanent action of religion must certainly revolutionize the ethics of the world.

Religion goes against polytheism, as atheism.

What is the best friend of man? Religion. What is that? A rational recognition of duty to the Creator. Who is the best friend to mankind? The Creator.

Man never can appreciate God all his life-time on this earth. The more he appreciates his works, the more he loves the architect of his own soul for its blessings. None can make idol of the work who appreciate the workman. Religion is the only thing that ever can impart pure devotion of feelings, of which the unworthy are deficient. Religion is the highest rational process. All the means of securing true faith are rational.

The great object of religion is to civilize man, render him fit for the human family, and adapt him for his mighty change. Religion looks to reason, judgment, sense, law and justice. There can be no religion of the heart, but of mind, that recognises all things of thought, word and deed. We can reach or embrace no part of creation, but by and through mind. As mind appreciates, priestocracy and peculiar or heart faith, depreciates.

Religion does not refer to the heart, but the affections, emotions and passions, the functions of mind. Such makes a person too religious to be in any peculiar church! The world should know its own powers through its own rights.

The religion of principles, is the object of all. Without principles nobody improves religion.

Mind culture alone, will not suffice for religion. It must secure the highest appreciation of all, and the practical illustrations. It must do its best practicable duty.

Religion commands all to avoid taking advantage of passions, emotions or circumstances, and characterizes the best class of the world, as doing the most good.

The mere men of straw, military and superstitious, will not answer for the light of civilization. The world needs religion, the true effect of which is civilization.

We have not to inquire about any man's faith, when we inquire has he cultivated his religion? What religion, it may be asked? He has and can have but one, and that from God. That cannot be mistaken, as faith and truth are analogous. As a rational being, we address you in all this matter. Religion, and bibles of tradition with peculiar faith, are two different things. Religion proves itself, but bibles of tradition disprove themselves. Principles only, can legalize religion. We should progress in the right views of religion. What is the true position of religion among rational men? Is it not rational religion? What is the most valuable element of religion? Justice to man and duty to God. Without it, one hardly knows how to begin action in the world, till he is nearly ready to leave it. What good does the world do him, then, temporarily, if not religiously? Why do not the people do right? Because they do not know, frequently, beforehand, and are victims of relative habits. They have little power of analysis of thought. True religion teaches that none should surpass in reverence to deity, who has the exclusive right to adoration of mind.

Is man an accountable and responsible being?

Then he is so only on rational basis, and on no other.

All morals are based on truth and reason, on no other. All religion is on principles, the most exalted.

When we begin to think, talk, and act on principles that are uniform, then we begin to enjoy the noblest, highest refinement and civilization.

True religion and morals must be upheld by the world's conservative patriots. The proper character demands trial, proper efforts and perseverance. It becomes the good citizens of the world to see what is the best protection for religion and their profession. It becomes honest patriots to inquire rightfully what is their duty and obligation. This inculcates chastity, eternal truth, avoidance of murder and crimes involving sympathies. To uphold religion, then, give God all due him. This is intellectual, religious honesty. The church-monarchical power and monetary influence, have prevented the just view of religion. Superstition and all its malign influences commenced before science, which is to eradicate them. The social world is singularly constituted, on account of money and power, ignorance and superstition. We know very well what malign influence of peculiar education is, and how it perverts mind. That is often a misfortune, rather than a crime or fault. But be it what it may, it should be corrected. The world is diversified, and needs the various best talents of honesty and truth, elevated science. As to faith, when rational, that is God's concern. Religious fortitude upholds the best resolves of mind and soul. Whilst she teaches us to exert ourselves for the best, we must strive to receive all as the best, and be best satisfied if mind do not demand correction. Who can appreciate civil and religious liberty, that gives the pure currency of thought the noblest reflection of actions? The world must have fixed just views of religion, as the only proper elevated standard of actions. What are the religious rights of freemen? The way to have them universally performed best, is to have universal knowledge on the subject. This business materially concerns all mankind, all minds, as they are the beneficiaries. How long will they suffer their rights of mind to be put in abeyance to exploded bibles of tradition and their peculiar faith? The most substantial, shortest road to happiness, is through the virtue, purity and innocence imparted by religion. The religion of the good when matured, will fill the world with its best position, rendering mortals most happy. Let it not be debauched by the bibles of tradition, and kept behind the age of freedom. We need the absolute conservation of social duties and relations. Be independent of the world, if you desire truth and virtue, true independence. How callous must be the world when it affects that some say; this is my belief, and that it may be perpetuated, however erroneous. Proselyte in good if practicable; correct and teach on principles; enlighten on science.

What is to protect man, but the great conservative social principles? If man infringe or encroach on social rights and duties, thus far is he injured, as others may do the same. If sophistry be admired, sycophancy must be practiced. Both are in antagonism to truth, as faith without religion. We desire religion that we can be pleased with, having affection therefor. If it cannot be a pure guide or light for safety, it is mere faith, worse to its friends than enemies. Religion demands candor and decision on honorable judgment, or silence where there is not certainty. Religion is the settled policy of the system of principles. Perverted is the wretch that would impugn religion or its sacred precepts. For universal brotherhood, the world should go as its greatest good, next to religion, the sacred indispensable duty to God. Religion is the moral sublime that requires well posting up in good deeds, thoughts and words. It is an immortal subject, to be taken hold of by all rational minds. True religion protects and commends itself to mind, for the world's purification, truth's verification, universal confidence. Public oaths can only be on the best affirmation, and that should be as sacredly held as the most serious declarations. Religion enjoins sanctity to words, as matters of fact not to be violated. What especial merit can any arrogate to themselves on the profession of religion, a necessary constituent of their minds? Rational education makes religion acceptable, and causes it to differ from superstition. What enable us to get the right advantage of the world?—Principles. The highest obligations are due society and religion. What has religion to do with party spirit or peculiar faith? Religion recognises the obligations of justice, as ever paramount. The world must go for the law of God, nature, mind, religion, reason and truth, and if all the bibles of tradition are antagonistic to them, they should be at once excluded the world. Why prate about religion, when it is essential to all. It cannot be too cultivated, as evinced by civilization and character, the wisest and most intelligent legislation, freedom of enlightened speech and press. The common interests of the world are not alienated, unless the sacred rights of the people were basely violated. Religion is not for suppression of legitimate passions, as monks teach, but for their legitimate enjoyment. You need the only religion that rational mind can ask for, rational religion, and that you cannot mature without rational measures.

We seek that basis which is competent to build up what is right, not merely exclude all errors; to look up to country, parents, and the world, to do all that justice requires.

But the ostensible reason for peculiar faith, is on account of man's sins. Now that is an utter defiance of mind's analysis.

Religion has an identity with mind inseparable therefrom, and comprehends the whole duty of mind.

It is a constant inspiration of God's principles, directed by a true analysis of mind.

Sin is an accompaniment of man's nature, either untaught or uncorrected, and negatives as evil the proper result of principles of conservation.

Do the people actually know what they want or need?

Have they rightly analyzed all that is necessary?

Do they know what analysis of the subject is?

In their excitement about religion, they may look to a Messiah, but no true masterly analysis can affirm this, the pretence of a profession that thus seeks profit.

What is religion? The best duty of man, to God and man.

How does man show it? By enlightened mind and the most comprehensive reason that takes in the compass of all practicable principles, instituted for the physical, moral, and religious state of the universe.

What mind lacks of civilization, it lacks of essential religion. Then rational religion is a science the most exalted and cultivated.

The most energetic powers are most potent of good, if rightly directed, as those of steam, while the innate powers of mind are analogous for good or evil, by analogous direction.

Religion is then a self-regulating system, to prevent the necessity of paying forfeiture for any delinquency, if it did not soar to the most ennobling emotions and object, an eternal homage to the worthiest being in creation.

Assuredly religion is the true foundation for avoidance of penalty, that must requite for duties unperformed, and errors committed, the noblest guarantee of reward for duty done. He who violates any principle, must necessarily pay forfeiture, and has to make restitution.

Religion teaches the general avoidance of all suspicious persons and matters, that may corrupt if evil.

The best command of the elements of nature, an ever present subject, presupposes a proper knowledge of her, then religion to master her duly, must be the science of sciences.

This world's beauties and virtues are too often read amiss, by an unthinking and ungrateful people.

Their construction is libel, their appreciation is too often subversive of reasonable benefits.

Mankind seeks to improve religion that belongs to all minds, not to peculiar faiths.

We appreciate what religion is, not by feeling alone, but by enlightened conscience when it can refer to reason, for it requires a rational, not fanatical conscience, that towers above the animal feelings.

What is religion, then, but a binding again the mind that had become perverted from the innocence of infancy, and had to be rebound in the purity of enlightened conscience?

Religion is then the action of mind consistent with the philosophy in life, or to act best the philosophy of life.

Religion is the characteristic of mind in its noblest condition of life, and exerts her full sway on the human character as the right impress of God.

All religion improves the mind and soul, through inherent principles that guide reason, proportionately to the cultivation; and none can perfect the conscience that does not full and equitable justice to both.

Faith that represents religion, but draws back from mind and reason, is unworthy the respect of either, and incapable of perfecting conscience, but on the contrary, must pervert it.

Neither peculiar faith, bibles of tradition, nor their professions, have anything to do with rational religion that stands on the merits of the Almighty.

This is a paramount question, not of bigotry and preconceived notions, the off-casts of ignorance and prejudice, but of religion, pure, vital, and rational.

Bibles of tradition cannot reveal faith of religion.

How has all peculiar faith been revealed? By priestocracy. Is that worth anything? Not the reading. All rational beings desire religion revealed by God, that is the only rational one of principles, and can be no other.

But in regard to religion, we should go to the party best acquainted therewith. Agreed—who are they? The professors. Are they the possessors of true religion, or peculiar faith? Are they interested for the maintenance of doctrines that are right, or professions that are profitable, influential and powerful?

Shall we not go to mind that is universally endowed when sound, with the innate faculties and principles of religion?

When we are told to seek religion, then we must rightly seek to improve it as possessed by all rational minds.

All nations have codes graduated to their state of civilization, that characterizes their real state of religion, not the fictitious one of peculiar faith.

It is utterly impossible to destroy the true position of religion, as God has endowed every mind possessed by rational beings with its elements, and that has to be improved while mind survives in its present shape.

What then remains for the world of mind to do? To make religion a pure thing, peculiar faith must be abrogated, as the last has no reason or mind but sophistry, animal feeling and bigotry, the cause of fanaticism.

God designed religion to be universal, a covenant with mind from first to last in his own church.

The rite universal, is mind's appropriate cultivation in all the philosophical science attainable in the universe.

The Supreme requires no right impracticable, therefore he gives religion that is rational, to rational beings.

The circumstances of mind, and the context of reason, define religion.

The positive safe duty of man, is rational religion, and honesty and truth are the great corner stones.

All mankind has by the gift of creation, innate principles of religion that pre-eminently distinguishes man from the brutes, to be carried out by a correct, not peculiar cultivation of mind, else it is to be perverted by treachery to mind that may degrade nations, continents, worlds, a universe of nations.

Thus many lose sight of purity of conscience, from want of cultivated mind, that is liable to further degradation by continued perversion.

The Creator alone is the fountain and object of all religion. His perfect unity constitutes its purity. None other can be, else the creature is equal to the Creator. All religion must be pure and genuine, else the faith is wrong and useless, and the practice is inconsistent and hurtful.

You either seek true religion or the reverse.

If the first, it was instituted by God for universal good; it will bear and court investigation through reason by rational mind.

If untrue, it is impious blasphemy, and ought to excite the voice of all good citizens of the world, in denouncing it by a general condemnation.

All mankind must have faith of some kind, for good or evil.

If we do not have the good, the evil must and will predominate as paramount.

Mankind has the innate principles of religion, from the Creator.

Ours must be the right culture of this invaluable trust fund, as ours is the harvest.

A consistent faith will insure good and consistent practice.

All rational minds seek the purest religion.

What is it? Is it peculiar, or universal? Investigation of truth only decides that it must be universal to belong to God, as all that is peculiar belongs to man.

Many think that faith will do, whether truth sanctions faith or not.

Does religion consist of faith and practice?

Let us analyze the first, that the second may be just and righteous.

Is the faith free? All is under truth and reason.

What is the only test for mind that is to be operated on? Reason. Can there be any other at all? None other with wise or honest people.

What has reason then to do?

She has to operate on facts presented.

But a part may be unseen?

Then her aids, analysis and analogy, alone can act for universal safety, otherwise a blind and dangerous hypocrisy results, and such errors as the history of mankind truly shows are more dangerous than a state of ignorance, for the state of the first must be crime, that of the last comparative innocence.

The book of knowledge is the Bible of Mind addressed to the understanding of mankind, and the innate monitor, Conscience, that is universal to rational man, will disclose on due and adequate investigation, the rejection of the bibles of tradition.

We must then adopt the light of mind and reason now, at once, and forever, as the only safe and sound-minded system. All others are those of the monomaniac.

Mind has the faculty of religion to be cultivated to elicit conscience, that can rightly face the Universe.

God initiated all minds into religion by innate endowments.

Religion that is true, upholds the Divine dignity of God in universal, not peculiar powers.

Religion knows what is law, and makes friends through the foundation of the law.

Wise legislation, one of her best aids, must cover all the grounds of deficiency in man's codes.

Have we a system of religion instituted that answers the demands of the whole world, that suits mankind in its most exalted character, and causes it to be united in one universal brotherhood?

None short of the true belief in one Almighty Creator of the Universe, clothed in all power, can answer and fulfil all such.

It is conceded that all nations have, as all rational beings or minds need, religion in elemental endowment. The great object is to give it the right direction.

True religion must be that of civilization to suit the whole world, and must be that of science and philosophy that support civilization the highest, all of which were written by God in his works, and stamped on mind. The bibles of tradition were written afterwards, thus proving themselves counterfeit.

Any other than true religion, is mythology.

We know God by his works; we do not know his word than by his works of the Universe.

Shall we be unpopular, to seek analysis of our religion?

We seek to establish religion, morals, and government, to meet the world-wide benefit of mankind.

To understand religion, is to look to the genuine resources of religious knowledge, and that promotes practical piety and vital religion in the minds of all.

A true conservative revolution will cut down atheism, polytheism, and all sectarianism.

Then we shall have no pilgrimage to pay devotion to the relics of the pretended dead saints, or to the absurd notions of ecclesiastical dictators, by penance or folly, finding the God of the Universe omnipresent.

And then we shall cut down the false pretences of the priests, who were the real beneficiaries of those pious frauds.

No less shall we attain, when we abolish auricular confession that creates the greater sin of the priests.

When one fraud is substituted for another, which is the gain?

Neither phylactery nor the priests' pretended praying off sins, nor their intercession for pardon, can avail one iota.

Man's must be the exertion, and by right actions.

Let us not mistake true religion.

Is it absolutely necessary to have a priest to obtain pardon, to confess the sinner and cause him perform the penances which are imposed?

Which is the greatest sinner of the two? The priest, of course, for he blasphemes God's rights, and swindles man's.

Does he do this at his own expense, or yours? This is no child's play, however fraudulently he acts; for, although he gains money here, he atones for it afterwards.

Shall even self-constituted councils decide that people should request "intercession of saints reigning with Christ in heaven;" when the omnipresence of God excludes all such as useless and absurd?

The faculty of religion is universal to mind that is rational, as sense of Deity is impressed on mind. It is a perception of cause and effect, and is a universal conviction that is perverted as mind is perverted.

Religious principles were instituted by God himself, elicited by deductions of reason.

Education must be rational to command circumstances, otherwise, peculiar as the result of circumstances, it perverts the principles of religion and misdirects them to self-interest.

It is enlightened, liberal, and just reason that is to free us from the rank errors of superstition and idolatry.

Life presents a perpetual struggle as to orthodoxy, never to be decided but upon this principle.

Religion has to steer clear of atheism, and polytheism of man and bibles, therefore must bow to the majesty of God by the fidelity of mind.

The beauty of it is, that all trinities of church, state, and the military, are the absolutism of polytheism and atheism, and all such are elegantly excluded by rational religion.

The brotherhood of the world is hastening by all legitimate means of truth, honesty, and humanity that bless mankind, to advance the principles of religion. Let a benevolent commerce carry all these throughout the globe.

Our religious persuasions bind us to show proper actions and morals, manners that decide for all rational beings who revere God and respect man.

If morals be not exercised, that individual has no practical religion. Theology is a free and rational subject, and ought to be discussed fairly and rationally.

There is as much reason now for the world to investigate as ever, the purest principles of religion.

How are all to be saved? As rational beings, by the influence of God's gifts that fell on all at creation, and gave to each the innate faculty of religion, that is a conscience that should be enlightened by the ways of wisdom, virtue, truth, honesty, and sincerity, with all the elements of thought and science to best meet the varied grapple of the world, and look in all its deeds to God and his pure attributes and none other, as worthy and competent to do all for mind.

All the office of a vicegerent is assumed, usurped, and affected.

God manages the managers, and sincerely rebukes such to death, for abominable blasphemy.

Thus, what is called the skeptic's acts, are the most worthy of the world's notice in the justice, efficiency, and sufficiency of God who created all, and is equal to its government as proved in that of the whole Universe.

The faith of religion is accompanied by truth and reason.

While religionists rely on thoughts, words, actions, and works to be recognised by God as the best practicable evidence to those interested, the advocates of peculiar faith refer all the time to their faith, and speak of works as intended for man's not God's appreciation!

Religion by profession is a silent manifestation of God's principles, while peculiar faith is noisy and a tell-tale for worldly speculations, a blustering bully to crush the world.

Religion glories in rational faith, that is approved of by God and man.

If we do not possess the best rational faith, we are liable to the impositions of fanatical faith at all times, for which we have to thank man worship. The sooner we get right in religion, the better for liberty and freedom of mind.

Whoso is opposed to religion, is opposed to God.

Whoso is opposed to superstition, and peculiar faith of all kinds, is for God.

Where dwells practical, vital, rational religion, but with those who adore the living God!

What else is opposed to God cannot be religion, but must be superstition and man-worship.

What is rational is just, and what is comprehensively just, is religion—the highest duty to God paid by rational mind.

The highest position attainable in religion, and that proves it, is that which brings rational belief and action all the time, as this best refers to the best standard—an enlightened mind. In whose keeping is religion?

In the minds of men who adore their God—Creator, and not in the hands of those after the order of Melchizedek the priest, who received the tenth of the spoils of war of Abraham, who gave this power to take tythes, and to realize the salary of millions therefrom, by the imposition and blasphemy of peculiar faith—priestocracy, who enslaved the world by their false pretences.

Let religion have none of the habiliments of sordid inducements. The dynasty of the priestocracy has nothing to do with religion, that is too sacred for this vulgar clan.

The greatest humbuggery is carried out under the pretence of faith, that cannot exist unless rational; and that excludes all base pretences.

There can be no uniform system of religious principles on the doctrine of peculiar faith.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

A DISCHARGE of duty most faithfully to enlightened conscience.

Ought we to have organized associations to carry out its principles? That may be very well, but God has taken care of the elements, and man carries out its practical benefits throughout the world.

Truly religion is all over the world, where mind is, as there God can be truly represented. Civilization supreme can best impart its blessings, and expel the vileness of the dark ages from the world.

Do you seek pure vital religion?

Avoid all the errors and vices of superstition.

Then mind has to decide between them, by truth and honesty, humanity and facts of benefit.

All nations of the whole world are elevated in ratio to this mental elevation, that gives moral elevation; that is clear, certain, and proved.

All should seek correction of religious opinions at once; as all the errors, vices and violence of society have the elements of its destruction for the vindication of principles.

They are to be corrected ere ruin strikes down the whole.

Let us rid ourselves of all such, to exclude the pirates of society in general and particular, individuals and nations that must be rightly checked.

Our ideas of religion do essentially refer directly to the Supreme Ruler of the universe, on recognition of its organization, whose first cause is immutable as he is perfect; but man is changeable, as he is imperfect.

The fault is in the individual mind, referable either to disgraceful ignorance or bigotry, that pretends that the Great First Cause cannot be read by the eye of science in his creation.

The more correct the science, the more correct God's attributes can be thereby, and only thereby, portrayed. All others are false pretences, unworthy the rational mind of the world.

We are all accountable beings to the one living God, to whom the highest, purest principles of religion present the true emanations of mind in its loftiest aspirations.

Can there be any more genuine conversion of mind than its purest rational connection with the best reverence to Almightly God, in whom it justly confides with the most genuine Humility.

The bible of rational minds asks of you, a reasonable being, to reason on this the most reasonable of all subjects, otherwise to be silent, that strife be not recklessly engendered, where peace can be maintained.

The sacraments of religion, as prayers, are good actions.

True religion seeks to correct all wholesale errors.

In the great school of the world, the whole full duty of rational man is to mankind, and must declare the true issue of the whole religion to God.

What else on earth can it do to correct these low characters, assuming to themselves the benefit of man-worship, excluding Deity from his rights.

Religion makes everything responsible to right principles. No priestocracy of peculiar faith can stand this test.

One peculiar system supplants the preceding as deficient, or the subsequent goes to aid the prior.

All good citizens need proper systems of government and religion; no peculiar code suits, as the code of God is supreme, all-wise, and universal.

We need a high morale for the bible of rational mind, that ancient records cannot give as adequate to the civilization of man and justice to Deity.

All the ancient systems of peculiar faith must be universally rejected, as inadequate to the morale needed at the present day.

Then nations will not seek to prevent others doing what they should do at home, that is, secure a government that give the blessings of constitutional and religious liberty.

The justice of the bible of rational mind does not stop at what is forced by rational law, or popular correct opinion. It institutes all that is right all the time, and commences at the commencement, rejecting delusions of the world, and what are too often miscalled time-honored customs, deeming all unworthy of freemen; adopting none but reason-honored, the wisest suggestions.

This code places it as the height of absurdity to take a half civilized people and make them and their institutions examples for all time to come, as models for morals and ethics of science and faith, when rational mind knows them to be preposterous.

Religion leads rational mind to view all things correctly. It teaches us that a supreme intelligent God rules nature and mind, and that materialism is utterly incompetent in the universe, and that all are in abeyance to Almighty God.

The principle of causation is ever present to rational mind, to correct the endless theories and speculations of the world, that otherwise can be perverted by atheists and polytheists.

This destroys the advocacy of all bibles of tradition.

Religion is due to the constitution of our nature.

He that resorts to peculiar faith divests himself of religion to that extent as he that resorts to small acts and cunning has no great parts nor wisdom. The sword or sophistry is the only means of propagating peculiar faith; both are by absolutism.

What honest and truthful republican can adopt any such base means? The light of religion is by rational instruction, and must be science, philosophy, reason, and truth, to reach the mind successfully.

Neither skepticism, infidelity nor peculiar faith can stand before the tribunal of rational religion.

Mystery is excluded by reason, that appreciates the right and virtuous power in society.

Genuine religion speaks to universal humanity, and cannot exist in the atmosphere of peculiar faith.

She establishes social relations on the right basis, exempt from antagonism; and refers to the virtues of self-government, and reliance on Deity alone.

She discards all mysticisms of peculiar faith, and all such systems.

She adopts mind as the universal agent for the universe, in regard to its relations, and thus establishes its only legitimate responsibility.

She enables us to enjoy the present, and be prepared to receive our change for other spheres at any moment.

She considers the principles of safety are to be duly estimated in the capacity of mind, and that sin is the negative of good, the antagonism of conservative principles.

She enables mind to dismiss its superstitious views and fears, and estimate the idea of hell-fire and brimstone as old as the volcanoes, and no doubt originating therefrom; and that volcanoes, so far from being the evidence of a world's conflagration, that they are actually safety valves.

Satan, who is considered the god of evil, and enemy of mankind, extinct anyhow, has no locality if hell has no rational existence.

Would the atmosphere of the earth actually suffice to destroy it by conflagration? How can that be accomplished? Let the wiseacres' generations decide, as they have tinkered at all such things the lifetime of superstition and false philosophy.

But new stars have appeared, and old ones disappeared. What astronomer can pretend to more than that they are performing their revolutions in their mighty orbits.

What astronomer can pretend to assume the perfect knowledge of the splendid science of astronomy?

Religion teaches us to inquire what would God want with angels to deliver messages on this earth, when principles perform the functions of the universe, representing a perfect omnipresence, as quick as thought, over the whole universe?

With such powers as electricity, Deity can move the universe, and with principles he can command the whole, as they can vindicate themselves if not obeyed.

It is mind that acts, all the time obedient to those universal constituents, as principles can only be addressed to that faculty, otherwise there could be no responsibility.

God at first did all most munificently, that is falsely claimed for Messiahship all after pretences of man.

Religion is a necessary indispensable constituent of mind, and should be pure.

She considers good actions as prayers, and necessarily constant protection without hypocrisy or partisanship.

Conventions of mind may seek to perfect the standard of religion—rational religion—but at present that is impossible, unless rational mind could burst forth in its sovereign maturity of intellect and excellence.

Mind, in its inquiry for what is best to be done for society, wishes the best good faith sincerely carried out, else social qualities are mere pretences, and show the fragments of principles.

The best organized code must present liberal, enlarged, and just views, social, moral, and religious, as much as needed by enlightened freemen, that exacts enlightened public opinion and sentiment.

We need pure and fearless actions, as pure and enlightened views, else we only realize a very small proportion of our rights and interests.

It is not by faith, but by deeds and actions all the time, that mind's excellence, the only thing affording us cognizance, can be fully tested.

It is almost impossible with the finite mind, to define exactly for all future time, any exact code of morals and religion, as the progress of mind is upward, and its excellence and worth advance in its general science and philosophy.

It is for that reason that we must discard all that accords not full and fair principles.

Religion embraces professions of rational faith, and due performance of correct actions, as exact as science, and lovely as philosophy.

Upright, truthful, and honest conduct before the world is the best morals and religion.

The rational view of religion is the only best one in life, otherwise a reckless abuse of reason in sectarian faith may beget an analogous one in regard to God. You cannot serve God and Messiah at the same time, as Mahomet, Christ, or any others.

You cannot have religion and peculiar faith at one and the same time; the thing is impossible for genuine purity.

The least that the bible of mind can propose, is mind's best reverence for God of the universe, who is worthy of all praise as the correct standard for mind to exalt its purity, and promote by his omnipotence its most correct appreciation.

The cause of religion is sacred and holy, and belongs to universal mind, with an enlightened conscience. Who dare pollute this sacred function of Divine right?

We shall never establish the safety and peace of the whole world on the equitable basis of civilization until we recognise the true principles of religion, that God has instituted.

True religion secures a universal brotherhood, the greatest universal prosperity that secures itself most successfully to individuals.

Religion has existed from and along with first created human nature. God does not exact of it sacrifices of victims—human or brute—as burnt, or blood, or mind offerings, but he does require the pure excellences of mind.

All that tolerate and practice all or any of these sacrifices are not his genuine adorers.

Rational religion does not tolerate or practice ceremonies that do not constitute religion.

A want of true civilization prevents the perfection of the bible of mind—the universal code for the world. Its completion must be sought in the mighty future.

In the analysis of the universal condition of the earth and man, we find that man's first simple hunter state shows a rude one of society; where the wife is vassal, and man may be cannibal, with the grossest idolatry and superstition, as well observed by the Honorable John Quincy Adams.

The second state—the shepherd or pastoral, exhibits polygamy and idol worship.

The third evinces the state of agriculture, and the title of the soil begins to show the rudiments of better society: and the fourth, the citizen seeks to complete civilization, where science and philosophy can flourish, and religion triumph.

The difficulty has been from vassalage of mind, that by force of education bound to customs, has engendered castes in all countries.

Peculiar education is one of the most dangerous things to mind—the commander of the world's elements, and the aspirant to universal immortality.

Books of Tradition, Bibles, or any other as they are called, can then never do to rely on as authority, for they reflect the state of barbarism of their age and people.

The grade of anterior civilization in any of the four states of man,—the hunter, shepherd or pastoral, agricultural, or civilized,—is not high enough for mind that seeks the best lights.

The mighty soul of the world of time and sense, is enlightened intellect.

Mind, in the best state of civilization has to guard against the vitiation of a morbid taste, to which too many books cater.

Civilization, the highest state of man's existence, has to look forward and upwards for the noblest organization, and can never look backwards with justice. Paramount rights should be held to, as worth all the balance.

Wise laws, and those well executed, do away with much ferocious retaliation.

If we do not have wise, legal, rational institutions, we shall suffer by those assuming to take law into their own hands.

Not to properly resist injuries is to invite them.

We demand wise and just laws—national and international, and thus we render evils, in redress, the least.

How is it, that though all possess the innate principles of religion, that few can believe in miracles, prophecies, and mysteries?

Because religion is divested of all such trash.

The minds that are rational and duly educated are so constituted, that reason only can prove to them all that is required. They must be hypocrites to own knowingly any other power.

All can be rational religionists, while the few affect to be spiritual, yet these two cannot be separated.

All the faith that can be given as evidence of things not seen or spiritual, is no less rational than of things seen, else it is irrational and fanatical.

Philosophy, not priestocracy, should introduce religion.

Genuine preachers are not politicians, but must adopt analysis of Nature, which is obligatory on all rational minds.

The organization of industrial labor, legislation, and improvement of religion, are to promote universal happiness that no peculiar people can appropriate.

The confined limits of pastoral and rude society in which the bibles of priestocracy originated, cannot begin to meet the wants of the world for labor, legislation, and civilization.

The mighty circumference of the globe must be embraced, and all conservative principles adopted.

We must address ourselves to the Universe when we seek the immortality of the soul, and all the means of self-preservation.

The religion of civilization cannot go back, when cultivated mind goes forward and upward.

There is but one true way of obtaining proper knowledge of God, and that by the purest reason.

Revelation is only tradition, both false, if not conformable to the law of reason.

Rational mind must subserve the purposes of the whole, not a part of the world.

The religion of all countries of the whole world, is that due one eternal God, to properly support alone the foundations of civil society.

A mediator implies a division of Deity's rights, a gross absurdity, not to say impiety. How can that be religion, in any sense of the word?

Religion and civilization accompany each other, and give no sway to inordinate passions, but direct them in the legitimate track, requiring as the best guarantee for man's deportment, the most effectual responsibility.

No code of religious belief that puts off responsibility to another world, can be effectual.

The day of judgment, if deferred beyond the grave for indefinite time thereafter, is too long delayed.

The speediest is the most effectual of the two, as it meets all the functions of mind and soul.

The more successfully the world approaches uniformity in science, the more it succeeds in civilization and religion.

Mind well endowed and imbued in principles and manners, will do the promptings of humanity, philanthropy, and patriotism, of course, religion.

The most effectual help in this world, is that emanating from self, aided by God.

He that asks the respect of the world, must first respect himself.

Of all this before God, man must show himself worthy.

Pure religion ever addresses mind, the beneficiary, to secure the soundest views.

We need the only true great and sublime truths of religion, and never get them short of the only pure exhaustless fountain of creation's God, the sublime Creator of the Universe.

If you deny this position, you expose your vulgar ignorance and stupidity in belief of impossible things as miracles, that reverse the order of Nature.

The true gospel is what mind directs under reason's sanction, but the people are excluded from that by reason of peculiar faith, are libelled in their divine rights and are not justified as their own vindicators, but treated as children and slaves.

The word of the God of the Universe addresses the enlightened and accurate reason of mind.

Revealed religion, is by the revelation of rational mind.

Much is yet to be revealed in the progress of science and improvement of mind, that must finish its readings in the Universe.

The works of God and his best creation-gift, enlightened mind, teach mankind better than all other means.

What other than mind has claim to sacredness of character in this analysis?

No nation can have true faith but in the government and religion, that emanate from reason.

Good and evil are manufactured, as mind is enlightened or perverse.

If rationalists are right, absolutists must be wrong.

Is not religion engrafted on mind, pre-eminently superior to all professions?

Pure and upright religion belongs to mind, properly nurtured in no faith but that of God.

Who can create any system of religion?

There can be only one orthodox, corrected by time, subject to reason's sway, not man's notions or notion's folly. That is the only one that can be catholic.

Such demands free, independent, and honest opinion, to convince the world of the justness of the faith advocated.

God addresses all rational minds to preserve the deep truths of duty, and none are left destitute of principles, or entirely to themselves.

All the Universe is operated on by God's inspiration constantly, by or through conscience, the vigilant monitor

God addresses minds all the time.

The bible of God is the bible of enlightened mind, whose aid is necessarily invoked for a world's age. Who, and what the authority is, what the whole documents and circumstances are, the Universe proves. Study it as to be mastered, on eternal principles.

Church membership is a fictitious advantage, and religion has nothing to do with peculiar faith contamination.

Religion elevates the standard of public morals to the most exalted capacity.

Religion is mistaken by the advocates of peculiar faith, for the inspiration of sanctification as an impulse; feeling, instead of reason, acted on through mind or soul.

Religion invokes all the aid of principles to meet best and most successfully, the trials, difficulties, misfortunes, and evils of life.

She teaches that mere revenge may degrade and injure her followers, whereas principles vindicate themselves and give the highest, the only moral victory. Any systems or creeds of peculiar opinions and faith that are antagonistic to the progress of just principles, are hyenas in society.

To meet the wants of the world and the majority of minds, we need a proper comprehensive code of religion, not peculiar faith, that will satisfy the whole globe, as mind is so organized from its constituent faculties, that reason must hold the sway, else truth and sincerity cannot abide. Such code will exclude the licensed tyranny and corruption of society.

But religion is not philosophy, the peculiar faith people would think.

It is the highest state of philosophy that recognises the accountability of all rational beings to God, and rendering due responsibility of itself, thereby proving its innate faculty available by the mind's inherent powers.

All enlightened minds will seek to be saved by the true salvation.

What is to save not only the world but the Universe? is the earnest inquiry.

Who can do so? None, but the Creator, who appreciates their wants, and provides for their preservation on universal principles.

Providence eternal, ever living, never dying God meets the points, and decides the whole question. Why are there so many stupid errors about religion, in every age of the world?

It was the base self-interest of the priests, and the degradation of explosion to the faith-notions of the profession, that caused its death-like support.

But let rational mind reflect.

Nothing can be done on earth without mind, then it is palpably absurd to say that reason has no hand in religion.

None but faith-jugglers can pretend to any contrary idea.

So far then as God and his attributes are proveable by his works, so far is religion proveable, the highest of all kinds of rational faiths.

The laws should take cognizance of all cases necessary in a free country; none being above the laws as above morals and religion, the supremacy of principles.

Man should not be so regarded as to permit false positions to create his own wrong and injury.

Those who reject reason in religion, are unwise and unreasonable. Are they honest men?

If mind and reason be left out, folly must be surely adopted. Pious frauds cannot supersede God's religion.

Philosophy is the height of all wisdom; it is the binding of common and proper sense with the best learning, the best and exact knowledge of science.

It constitutes then the most perfect code for religion, that venerates with the loftiest adoration, God, as perfect and pure, who could not be less concerned for man's preservation than for his creation.

As God created, he has to preserve man in the circumstances of free agency.

As to any other solution, it is man's work and pretences.

Mind and reason eminently meet all points and all cases practicable in religion.

The God of mind and reason cannot record these paramount claims to be superseded or discarded, by any minor ones, by books of tradition that have false science and system of faith.

Children, infants, show depraved and perverted minds, from perverted minds and depraved examples for generations. Now the only thing that can timely and properly counteract all that, is by proper cultivation of that very mind. That is, essential. But were it not for the bible of Moses, mind could know nothing of God! This is the modesty of false pretences, with a vengeance! The whole universe rebukes the infamous pretension.

The school-boy by causation or the commonest principles of cause and effect, can decide this question fully and satisfactorily, that there must be a great first cause, and all the rest created beings.

But the priestly machinery has been sprung upon mind in all ages, and instead of one great first cause, mind has been forced by brute force and ignoble government, butcheries, poisons, inquisitions, proscriptions, excommunications and all manner of ecclesiastical tyranny, to look to the number of Gods, whether of millions or Trinity, that best suited the reigning dynasty of the priestocracy, whose immediate interest was directly involved, including their cliques and foul crowds who have licked the dust off the feet of degraded priests, like men putting themselves in harness of brutes and asses, to haul harlequins and actresses about.

The world can see, if it choose, the amplest reason for the exclusion of the God of the universe by the world's priestocracy, as those of Egypt, and burying moral force, brutalizing mind in all respects, causing it to worship idols and animals.

All such creeds and bibles, just as bad from remotest antiquity, had been debased, deformed by horrid depravity, animal sacrifices, excommunications in this life, and eternal damnation in that to come. The potential power of priests, arms, and curses rarely forgave, so that the most reasonable of all reasonable propositions, the plainest and most direct truths to mind, have been degraded to its deepest perdition, enslavement and mastery.

Religion is necessarily a science, the exactness of which will be the work of civilization.

Rational religion meets the case of all rational beings, and institutes for them the order of universal brotherhood and union, that embrace the security and dignity of all mankind, causing it to look through creation to the Creator.

Religion causes all rational beings to rely on consistent conduct through life, and innocence as the only safe position. It is the comprehensive tuition.

An honest belief or faith can only embrace the result of God's attributes, the proper bible faith of rational mind.

No other bible itself can exist as true, therefore its peculiar faith falls off certainly.

The majority, fortunately, of the world at no time, has received one such faith, and it is reasonable to believe, never will.

All minds that are sane, believe in God with genuine faith. They thus prove themselves rational beings. But the most outrageous action is to arrest the advance of mind by condemning all the rational codes of religion to bibles of tradition, like arresting all constitutions of correct government that are never to be remodeled, because the first has been written. Can God or his religion be booked at once? Are they both substantially appreciated in the dark days of superstition, ignorance and pastoral ages?

Can the world be civilized in one day?

Does that accord with all the facts of the case?

Science the best and perfect, and philosophy the most exact alone, enable us to see that our construction of God's attributes, mercy and justice especially, do not clash. When the Jews were the peculiar chosen people of God, having their lights and all the world else blank, then justice and mercy clash.

Then we can plainly see that mind's imperfect views, such as these, clash; and that prove to a certainty, man being wrong. God is all wise and just, and gives a consistent religion. Then mind has to seek it of God, by the lights and requirements of mind's concentrated attribute, philosophical science, and cannot ever possess its first elements from a degraded priestocracy.

All rational beings are created with innate faculties of such religion that is elicited to mind by reason, that proves mind above all brute matter, and reflects a possession otherwise never appreciated.

The will and faith must ever follow reason in religion where freedom of mind abides. Reason can never be dictated to by the will and faith, which would be absolutism.

The great religious question carries in its bosom the solution for future blessings of the wide world.

The only fair, honest and honorable test of true religion, is the best performance of duty to the unity of the only eternal Supreme being. A belief in more, shows Polytheism, a detraction from the universal attributes of God.

What available prayers can wise and good men have, but their best communings with God, to correct themselves, not expecting to change God, but reform themselves with virtuous thoughts, words and deeds, doing as well as wishing the best for their country, and securing by good conduct the glory of such deeds.

When the empire of unity triumphs, then freedom does so. Religion does not, cannot, rest on sectarian peculiar faith, but on conservative principles. Such are adopted by rational religion. How eminently characteristic are God's liberal principles! They have no brute force, no compulsion, no blue laws and codes, and black ages to protect, no mysteries to conceal, no inquisitorial anathemas to enforce. All is gentle, kind and persuasive, through their legitimate basis the most lovely.

True religion is worthy of the most unbounded confidence and esteem of the world, whilst peculiar faith is unworthy the respect of slaves, and the sooner rejected the better.

Religious elements invariably and universally refer to innate principles and faculties at creation of each mind, while all the pretences of peculiar faith refer to the teaching of particular and partial dogmas, or especial tenets at subsequent time on the capital of religion.

After all the peculiar educations, God has erected one universal standard, the Universe, to disclose to mind, its brightest jewel, all that is rational.

Worthy citizens, begin at the point of peculiar faith, to feel serious about religion which all rational minds possessed.

But what have preserved them already from the ills and snares of the perverted world, but vital principles and God, their author, who are ever present to mind?

In the case of rational religion, principles govern the whole platform for mind, through reason up to God.

Religion asks the best recognition of intelligent minds.

Man's faith is laid in mystery for sinister purposes, but mind's, that is, God's religion, is anything but a mystery, as it is connected with the performance of duty, as plain as reason, and as honest as truth.

Resolve religion into its primary elements, and we must recognise truth, honesty, virtue, as all other constituents of a good conscience.

What have mystery and faith to do with these, that the better understood the better for the world?

Religion is to be cultivated with all upright intentions, but all the seeking to eternity will not improve it, unless on the right basis. The Almighty, who, as the Creator of mind, the beneficiary, must be the dispenser of grace that he alone created.

All kinds of faith, but rational, are incompatable with true government of God, mind, or liberal principles.

The world's fund is for mind, which, having the fund of due cultivation, presents the solution to the Universe in the harvest of time of true religion.

Among the worst tyrannies of the world, is the proscription of rational discussion and equitable decision about religion.

If mind's position be right in religion especially, what cares it an iota for free and fair investigation with rational discussion? The best rights are there rightly promoted, instead of abridged.

Religion therefore seeks all such, to best establish its paramount claims.

Innocence and purity never sneak from the contest in the conflicts of faith, certainly never get rid of the arguments by any but fair and honorable means, and leave abuse to the unprincipled opposition that needs it.

Public opinion enlightened must be paramount, as the people's rights are paramount.

Intellectual people seek to improve their religion inherent in mind by creation right, from the right source, by the right way, and at the right time, functions that cannot be filled except by the Giver.

Of course they cannot find any in any Messiah, as that is absurd and idle.

No Messiah short of Deity, could save himself at the last trying moment from the sin of blasphemy, how then save others by that heinous sin?

The world needs in religion an intellectual audience, tribunal or jury, to give a righteous verdict to God.

Most of the people, individually, lack several gifts of mind, by lack of its proper cultivation, in being able to analyze what is religion. The most are not competent in phrenological developments or mind, time, ability, to remove themselves from habits of thought, prejudices of education, customs, by want of maturity of science.

Then we must protest for anything but a fair and impartial analysis of this mighty question, as no man can be depended on from weakness of human nature, the ignorance and corruption of the age. Then, who can be satisfied without his own best exertions in this whole matter?

But the whole world seeks the mighty gift, religion, and where does it find it? Is it the gift of priestocracies and their peculiar faith? Or is it not the endowment of God at creation's birth, already possessed, but to be improved on for life?

Innate faculties of religion distinguish rational beings, the dignified character of the human species, from that of animals, and render them superior to all animated nature.

Religion regulates the affairs of mind, that is in abeyance to God for man's happiness.

The only divine government is that of God, and all of men must be identified with principles constitutional, have the right means to remain enlightened as by the fountain source, rational education, and all pure educational influences, as the press, &c.

If government must be pure, what else can religion be? In her teaching and illustration, most conformity to science has to be established, as acknowledging the want and actions of mind.

If religion have any officers, their lives must be pure, else she degenerates into peculiar faith-trickery; but the whole people are the only officials. The claims of religion and ethics are verified as true, as relating to man by God, a paramount and universal, not peculiar divinity.

This characteristic, written by its Master's hand, on the Universe, does away entirely with peculiar bibles, people, or salvation, or messiahships, which doctrines have been forced on the minds of the people by various insidious pretences of priests, have been dove-tailed and are hard to be eradicated.

Sophistry that deceives the world in every age by her countless wiles, urges the false doctrine for the true, of which most minds, from peculiar education, cannot distinguish the difference, or are afraid to attempt the analysis, however sound their private individual skepticism. The absolutism of church and state, with all their powers, alarms them.

God, the guardian of mind, can tell how much of the world has rightly improved its religion, whether called pagans or christians, or any other name of sectarianism. He only takes the will for the deed.

It is time that no fraud should be tolerated about religion that can only be of God.

It is the bounden duty of the principals of the world to institute a code of ethics, to see how far mind cultivated and civilized can universally reach to protect the rights of all. It is high time that it be done, as it is due the world.

The right code teaches honor to parents and country, principles and God, above all.

The bible of mind teaches to regard the rights of the people paramount, those of priestocracies and hierarchies subordinate, and not to forbear in the presence of the world for absolutism.

Toleration of opinion with freedom, has perfected the great principles of true religion, that is incontestibly best secured by free and rational discussions in freest governments. The rational definition of man, then, makes him possessed of the innate faculty reflective of ideas of religion, that binds indispensably and innately to this Supreme Being, who has shown his supreme intelligence by thus engrafting into mind this inextinguishable faculty.

The certain consequence is, that the higher the cultivation of mind, the purer may be its religion.

Truly, then, is a brute animal defined to be a being without innate capacity of ideas of religion, or that has no faculty to develope or exercise them.

To this exact definition, mind, when perverted, is more or less degraded in part.

Then there is no cognizance in sincerity of any mediator, for there can be nothing intermediate to mind but its adorable Creator, consequently, all offered as such, as Christ, Mahomet, Paganic, or Juggernaut, Confuciusic, Bhuddic, Mormonic, or any analogous, are imposters, and blasphemous pretenders by their imposition. The Almighty shows his characteristic supremacy by preoccupancy of the whole ground through omnipresence, and his work is heralded by the Universe.

Thus the mighty question of mind is at once decided, and analysis declares the difference between the false position of peculiar faith, that is to be superseded by rational religion. In the first, we see polytheism deformed by man; in the last, the God of the universe portrayed in his master virtues. None but mind could see the God of the universe. Cultivated rational mind can see no mortal intercessor, as that is an imposition.

Reason teaches this, and reason is truth.

The religion of God is for freemen; free agency—free action—and ennobles mind.

Every person must attend to all final duty, ere life passes.

All things and works give a faith, in God alone.

All work into that universal belief; whereas all work out of peculiar faith, is unworthy of rational mind. You cannot drag a rational mind out of the belief in a God; you cannot drag the same into the belief of a Messiah, as you cannot drag it into an irrational faith.

All this is utterly impossible.

If the one be a principle, the other is antagonistical.

Now who has principles? their universal author, or the peculiar pretender adopting what is ready made to his hands? Conservative principles are concentrated in the right use and exercise of mind, that upholds religion as indispensable, but emanating from God.

Religion does not know anything of peculiar faith, but is sustained on rational faith, that is necessary, and must be supported by facts, truth, and reason.

What benefits accrue from affecting to feel religion, when peculiar faith predominates?

Religion is the science of God-morals, and is the obligation the most enlightened due to God and mind, from mind, the noblest jewel of the universe.

What, then, is religion? Let liberal patriotism, enlarged to the world's circumference, one of its duties, tell the wisest statesmen.

All the world's books—a world's age—will only begin the momentous subject.

This subject can never be booked; and after all the oriental dogmas, fables, and legions of myths are buried beneath the ruins of their crumbling temples, then will pure religion rise in her glory, as permanent as eternity.

We go for religion that must supersede peculiar faith. Where do we go for such religion? To rational mind, that belongs to rational beings, the emanations of Deity.

We must start right at once with truth and honesty, then manners of courtesy and politeness, kindness and love, bounded by no peculiar faiths nor globe localities.

Minds, properly constituted, will throw aside envy and sectarianism, for the noblest theme of religion.

All rational beings improve religion, as all such have it as a faculty—the more reason the more religion—the more improved and cultivated the better.

All must seek rational cultivation, that is truth.

There is no rational being that has reasonable mind, and having rational actions, relying on the best lights of cultivated mind, that can miss religion.

Mind has it in thought, word, and deed; the better the more civilized and virtuous.

There is no fiction in religion; that is a creation birth-right, and a life-tenure.

Religion proves itself from God, and is mind felt, and universally beneficial.

How does feeling of religion truly decide, when the feeling of peculiar faith is deceptive and fallacious? Every mind must weigh well the character of equivocal morals, and of the means giving diffusion to them; the mind feels assured on its rational foundation of the only supreme standard that the mind of the universe can reach.

The moral sublime endows mind with conclusive feelings.

Any religionist, so far from finding fault with rational discussion about religion, ought to seek it by all manner of means, to get rid of the errors of judgment, deliberately, unintentional or intentional, but otherwise unavoidable.

One outrage on mind is, that churchmen, members of any character of supposed power, should exclude such improvement. Mind that is rational seeks rational decision.

The truest enjoyment of mind results in possession of religion, that can only be appreciated as rational, as joy results from even enthusiasm, but much more from rational grounds of truth.

Mind needs a universal religion, to give God alone his power and rights, and mind its duty.

Some persons, bigots of course, are alarmed at the bare mention of authors who have destroyed the foundation of their creed. There is something in the thing, not in the name. There was as much religion in Rome the ancient as in Rome the modern, flourishing in its horrid inquisition, illiberal and cruel excommunication of persons for opinion, and dishonest confiscation of property. Which massacre is the least sinful, that by gladiators or that by inquisitions?

The walls of a Saint Peter, who flourished a saint in name, rise towering to God's mighty solar system, in the richest and most gorgeous architecture; but can all such reach the mercy-seat of the Almighty, as soon as if its costly prices were wisely dispensed to the suffering poor? This then is part of religion—duty to mankind and mind, that must be cultivated rightly, and humanized to civilization.

But few minds, where it is eminently the duty of all, investigate rightly the important points of religion.

The most important acts of one's life are, to pay due respect to religion, and be sure of the power to whom it is paid. How idle to spend one's life in superstitious worship, or anything short of pure adoration of God alone.

Religion appeals to mind's noblest and highest duties, in the use of principles that have done so much for the universe, but have been wofully overlooked for man-worship.

Religion is rational, and appeals to rational beings, through rational principles, and excludes dupes and hypocrites in faith most positively that has no particle of foundation, and bigots who affect to rule society by pretences.

Rational religion is the only one possible to exist, as all the rest is mere peculiar faith—the child of superstition and man-worship—the counterfeit of hypocrites who resort to smuggling.

Does not the world demand of mind not only a just but a generous—not only a wise but a liberal exposition of its capacity for religion? Religion is the true duty to God, that depends on nothing else than philosophical principles to its proper development, in reaching the right start—the Great First Cause.

Without analysis, some would suppose christianity was religion; others, that Mahometanism, and several that Mormonism was religion. Very clear of it all.

They have not the dignity of the name even; as they are all superstition and man-worship; all humbugs, having no underpinning of religion. Was the predecessor of all these, religion? Was Judaism aught but priestocracy, with all its machinery? Judaism, a miserable sectarianism, was preceded by countless myriads of sectarianisms.

The history of the world shows that one species of superstition has succeeded another—the polytheism of the moderns that of the ancients.

For centuries the christian peculiar faith was struggling for existence and power, till the power of the state, (then a monarchical autocracy,) of Rome breathed into it vitality. Mothers in seeking religion for their children, can only desire the best upright views for their tuition.

The liberal wise do not want superstition, or that which is connected to absolutism, to enslave and debase the human mind. Feelings short of rationality will never decide religion, that is certain, nor mere peculiar education; nothing short of the light of philosophical principles will answer. Principles, then, for ever!

All rational beings wish to be right about religion, not to be enslaved by superstition and the absolutism of its Church power, State power, and all its other malign powers.

Religion is the most endearing of all, the most sublime of civilization. It preserves the noblest elements of friendship, and extracts the most beneficial results from the mirror of eternity, giving the solace of the first, and the wisest teachings of the last, to which it is not in abeyance under its own triumphant principles.

It teaches mind to discard pride, but adopt an elevation and dignity of character.

It realizes the treasures of experience of life, and forbids their burial. It respects the real objects of generosity. It considers it absolute perfidy to impose knowingly on the world the interested and partizan acts of peculiar faith.

Peculiar faith is concealed, monotheism, is open and unpretending, and the purest monotheist comes the nearest of having the least cause of repentance.

Religion can never justify vassal slavery to faith.

Analysis of philosophical science proves religion due the God of nature, and disproves any peculiar faith.

Peculiar faith is sectarianism that has nothing to do with religion. The province of religion is to render mind correct and better, and to free it from contingency.

There is but one true religion having living witnesses to attest it. There are two paramount points: the first is what shall the affectionate parents especially do for their offspring, if they do not have religion?

But all rational beings have it by creation's birth-right.

The main point is its right improvement.

God has given it and mind to man. Mind must improve its free agency under the circumstances, the conservative principles of its creation.

None but true religion and its best improvement, will answer for the best civilization.

But as to investigation of religion, this is the last and least thing done. But little of absolute facts about religion, is investigated. The words of an interested and ignorant priestocracy, who neither know the nature of the God of nature, nor of mind, are taken for granted.

The main point, the object, the God of nature alone, is absolutely sneaked out of, and the parties are intentionally deceived. Religion is the comprehension of sacred duties, moral and intellectual, paid to the sacred Supreme, who has fashioned the universe in perfect wisdom.

Mind only needs a suitable audience to approve.

You inquire what are you to do for religion? You have it, and have only to exercise the principles essential to its proper cultivation, to approach the nearest to God.

But the word of God is essential to carry us through life. Where is that word? In the purest recesses of an illumined mind, that has been enlightened by the most exact philosophical sciences.

We consider it the deepest impiety and blasphemy, to consider peculiar faith-scriptures as the word of God.

All need the living and essential principles of religion. Whether bible, law or constitution, morals or mind are respected, good faith is the essential of religion, their essential.

Some affect that the obligations of society are not attached to the highest duty of God. How can we duly respect God without duty to society of the best kind? The most honorable duty is implied, if not pledged by all its members, for the greatest good to all the greatest number, the foundation and essence of society.

What does God need of man? Implied duties of his position.

The world should be now thankful for the present age by which the light of truth is extracted from so much darkness. Conceive it, citizen, to be your noblest prerogative, to perform deeds equal to those of God in similar circumstances. Reason is then the mighty fortress of mind, against which the adverse currents of life may beat in vain. True religion inculcates not the conformity of principles to thy peculiar faith, but thy peculiar faith to principles; then thou wilt be obliged to adopt monotheism or rational religion.

Religion dwells not in the heart, but in the mind, the soul of mankind. What is religion but the payment of duty we owe to God, to whom all such is due?

How could we pay all, if we divided it with usurpers and priestocracies? Religion in the practical universal sense, is truthful faith and consistent action, not as a small part of one division, sect or denomination, but as the laws of God dictate. We wish to be right in religion. We depend on a moral and intellectual force.

Moral force to be available, must be rational and intellectual, to reach the foresight of results, and exclude ignorant fanaticism. Right religion is for intelligent freemen, but peculiar faith suits vassalage of mind. If there be nothing true and right to advance, science above all things is expedient, to maintain the principles of justice and mind. It is the province of religion to rationalize and generalize for this world, all her purest benefits. What is religion but the most sacred duty that mind owes and pays, to the adorable Creator of the universe, who sublimely holds sway by mind influence?

Anything that detracts from this, is a false and corrupt position. We have no bad feelings to any peculiar faith, but feel bound to do justice to rational faith, in good faith to our own souls. The highest obligations of society insuring proper actions, involve good faith, and that is religion. Religion cannot compromise her dignity with the peculiar faith of all bibles of tradition.

Any individual that has not truth, honesty and reason, has no showing of religious dignity.

There are various systems of faith, but can only be one of religion, as truth and principles do not clash, therefore it is the diamond among trash.

But these faiths had their martyrs, and so has atheism had; that proves nothing. Juggernautism, martial ambition and the evil passions have had millions of theirs. Martyrdom, then, must yield to reason in all analysis. But you have the true faith because you have the bibles of priestocracy! Because you have the bible of tradition, it no more follows that that entitles you to religion, than your being in a nominal republic secures you honorable liberty.

We wish all to go as far as the farthest legitimately advanced in religion. As to conscience, that is wofully perverted the world over, by peculiar education. Who is to set it right in religion? Priests, who have not improved the elements already possessed?

We might as well ask sharp lawyers who are partizans besides being proxy and agents. Priests are peculiar faith-lawyers. Can the world be set right by such? The conscience is at the mercy of the world whether fanatic, superstitious, or dishonest, as the adverse circumstances may decide, and can be only freed by liberal mind fund of philosophical science that imparts the right rational education. The exalted state of civilized mind, will make bibles of tradition an obsolete idea, and will establish the true progress of civilized religion.

No bibles of tradition can take precedence of the great inalienable rights of mind. Order and justice of the whole world are only obtained by properly cultivated mind, not by erroneous bibles from unprincipled and wicked men. Honorable men must go for the dignity of principles.

What power, gifts and magnificent elements of greatness has the world to rear, her noblest elevation, and yet she does not appreciate them.

What a sophisticated state of the world exists, when subject to perverted mind.

In these enlightened times, we can have reforms of organic laws and constitutions, but minds made vassal to the most degraded absolutism, miserable bibles of tradition.

Is the moral and intellectual force of mind to be broken down by bibles of tradition, the nuisances of the world?

No such bibles can over-ride moral and intellectual force that upholds social and political order.

Religion must embrace a moral and intellectual force, that to be valid, must embrace all the inherent principles, else it is not intellectual and legitimate.

It is high time to decide between peculiar faith and religion, the pretences of bibles of tradition and the principles of bibles of rational mind. These are world-wide questions for intellectual solution, and no bible of tradition can take us out of this life's difficulties, when the base is wrong, and all such are miserable failures because they are false pretences plunging us deeper into quagmire.

Mind that radiates the best of civilization, will do the work the best and only best.

But you, bound to custom and its vassalage, can never lay aside man's pretences, and refer the great vital functions of principles to God.

Are not restraints and obstructions put upon religion?

What does that worse than peculiar faith, engendered by the bibles of tradition? As hope must be attended with possibility, religion looks to the practicability through God's attributes. She never places the God of the Universe in all manner of equivocal positions, as a peculiar god of man's creation!

Pure society is what the world needs, and that only pure religion gives. The world needs all religion that it can get, but no peculiar faith.

All that you want is religion, not false bibles, as the bibles of traditions. All the world needs in all religion is good faith, and nothing less, avoiding as it must, fanatic absolutism. No man knows what God said, except through cause and effect, that are appreciated by only what reason, truth, rational mind and honesty say.

Whatever system is God's, that mind can understand; hence, all lie that say, we cannot get the idea of the God of Creation from the Universe. We cannot get it from any other source. All such people must lie knowingly.

The greatest good to all the greatest number, involves all that belongs to society and religion, mind, and God, and courtesy to freemen.

Religion teaches implied honor in society; no half way action. Would she hesitate to accord to woman all the rights of soul that belong to the other sex?

To relieve the world of persecution, bigotry, false faith and doctrine, religion speaks through rational mind. Jew, will you for the sake of superstitution, still circumcise children? What can you promise yourself by this odious and degrading mutilation? The God of the Universe never did this! Your little peculiar God that was so fierce against the heathen in the conclave of priestocracy, did only as the Jew priestocracy dictated. Are you still enslaved to such vassalage? Grace, conscience, and mind, all go together in religion. These, not circumcision, give the hope of a religious man. Spare your children in this free country, this degradation. Do not enslave, debase their minds, mutilate their persons, or desecrate their rights.

God alone makes religion what it is. Society is to be instituted on the great principles of God, not the dogmas of man. Religion starts no subordinate question, but prepares man to meet all his duties as he ought, while peculiar faith disqualifies him all the time from commencement to the end, as he violates the first elements of religion towards God at once. The very moment peculiar faith advances, the systems of sectarianism begins and their elements of warfare are let loose. Religion begets the highest sense of duty, and recognises all's well that ends well.

She gives peace and equanimity, serenity of mind, to all that wish to secure the best moral certainty, and feel resigned to their situation and position. What can we do better than rely on the Author of mind, grace, mercy, and happiness, and its permanent abode? Let us seek that point where pure religion is, as she legitimatizes the whole elements of mind and its nature, to God and man.

What avail religion, if morals be deficient?

Mind only wishes such system that it can thoroughly, rationally, and most consistently believe in; that can bring no tinge or blush for its advocacy, but the world's satisfaction for its most substantial adoption. Religion demands a most rational investigation, to have the most rational decision.

Then, look at the best bible of mind.

As to the heathen and Jewish priestocracy, all missed the true appreciation of religion and morals, as they were more or less removed from civilization.

Religion gives us the clearest view of life and its duties, and its platform is the only constitutional one of the world and mind, that renders the possessor and improver as good as practicable, knowing that he is right, and that the foundation, as the only one, cannot be shaken.

The world's organization on universal brotherhood, must and will prevail to a practicable extent. Have you looked into this thing, of religion that depends on pure and honest truth, above suspicion?

If we do not succeed in religion with mind, we cannot in anything else. Religion is a theme that no menial critic can say aught against, as he cannot do so by principles. As we have a system of constitutional government that legitimately carried out will answer the demands of civilized mind, so let us have a system that defines religion to which we may entrust our lives, fortunes, and sacred honor. Let us have no cause for distrust.

The pure religion of God is commanded to man, by the luminous disposition of rational mind. The supreme love to the God of the Universe is proved and demonstrated most clearly, by the love of mankind in one universal brotherhood. This is the religion of rational mind and civilization. What can uphold better the dignity of rational mind?

Religion is not contaminated by priestocracy.

Integrity and conscientiousness are ornaments in the religious platform of God Almighty. Good habits, laws, and principles, are its most worthy assistants.

Religion gives an exalted state of belief in God, not in mortals. We discard the bible of tradition to establish religion of the highest and purest order. Religion must be consistent to be rational, and asks for correction by rational discussion, unlike peculiar faith that precludes it by inquisition or proscription! Such sneaks from all proper responsibility, at the same time libels religion. All laws and acts to do the greatest good to the greatest number, that is to all, must be predicated on those principles that are immutable.

But can any refuse this sublime subject? What can be more important to harmonize the world's interests and feelings? It can furnish world-staples, as love, honesty, and truth, that constitute its essence. What better is there? Is there any bible but that of mind? Prove any other to be the word of God. This proof, will secure its suitable reward, for it embraces the munificent works of creation as the legitimate comprehension, and secures the due reverence to God, the Creator.

You become excited for the first time about religion, when invoked by the priestocracy, and seek to get what you only have to improve. But you adopt for granted, by impulse, not rationality, and you become committed. Nine-tenths do not investigate, or change to the right point.

Now all the world should first investigate by the bible of mind. There are some things above the world's criticism, as that of religion, that will revolutionize the world, no matter sects, creeds, and opinions.

The only union of religion is that to freedom, as the greatest theme for each individual mind.

In all governments of the present age, the sacred rights of all citizens will secure the only purity in religion. Religion should give universal harmony, but peculiar faith disorganizes the world.

The necessities of the world require true religion.

What is really practicable for man in this life, to obtain the most happiness? To attain the best position through the virtue, intelligence, &c., of rational mind.

Religion is thoroughly rational, and induces principles as the rule of action the purest, not fear, as peculiar faith has it. The principle of religion is involved in the elements of science and philosophy, all concomitants of mind, the beneficiary.

Let the world start right, about religion. Let the first step be correct. She teaches mind to avoid everything that will make it principal or accessory to crime. While religion must be inherent in the human mind, peculiar faith must be expelled the world.

All the religion that the world has is right: but all its bible peculiar faith is wrong. By mastering principles, you may master all the contingencies, and rule the unprincipled demagogues, agitators, and dictators of society, assuming to know what they do not.

Let truth and honesty advance, no matter about the words of religion. What but religion presents the right sound opinion and sentiment, most beneficial to the world? What a poor thing if God had not bestowed the gift of religion, in all existence and age, to rational mind, that improved improves its state of religion, but had left it for fraction of existence and age to the contingency of Messiahship, that might have been unknown to the majority.

But how is it possible that mind should have possessed religion without revelation of God? That is the only reason that it does possess it in its purity. If God had not revealed it to mind, who could? But mind is so helpless! It is so in an absolute state of ignorance; but we must not merely reason from the past, but from the present and future, as regards the full knowledge of science.

At one time the world, by the dogmatism and despotism of peculiar faith, could only get to peculiar gods, as the Jews and Christians, who were and are all more or less polytheists, having two, three, and four gods of peculiar characters all of them.

The true God, in perfect unity, has been unknown to most of mankind, to the present times, by perversion of mind.

How beautiful and sufficient is the system of religion, that is God-gift—a creation's birth-right—a fore full and satisfactory thought; whereas all others are contingent as after-thoughts—utterly ridiculous, absurd, and imbecile. It is the duty of all rational beings to analyze religion and mind; to know what mind requires. The analysis of mind gives us the analysis of religion. Do we go for religion? That is the reason that we go for a correct bible of mind, to attain perfect religion.

Impressions are everything that cause peculiar faith, and supersede facts. Now if the facts are not verified, of what avail or rational use is faith? Of course religion must take precedence of all bibles of tradition.

We ask for the sacred deposit of religion, to be kept inviolable. None but she gives right impressions in time in this world. A good intention of the world's mind is to aid in all good undertakings, not exclude them.

Religion, as truth, must take precedence of faith, and cannot conflict at all with truth before rational minds. What is faith worth without faithful rational evidence? Rational mind reveals religion, that teaches us that we have certain duties to perform, any how, in the greatest comprehension; that we must not speak undeservedly of the world, nor do it ill, much less think ill of the same. We must correct it—better it—do not make it worse; that is, we must act thus to ourselves. Religion is the high conservation awarded by Divine power, that protects all, and interferes with no speculation. She gives the efficient responsible power to endorse our actions—to have the proper and safe position.

The majesty of intellect is in religion. We only ask for all the legitimate fortitude of religion at the last final change. How shall we meet death?

By religion, that teaches that principles vindicate themselves in retributive justice. Religion makes all principled, then they must act consistently, and conform to immutable laws. This prepares the way for universal brotherhood.

The paramount question with the world is, what system or code will give the greatest number the greatest amount of morality and true vital religion, the best essence and element of happiness? Nothing but rational religion will, to be the true one. Then how can we best appreciate and secure it? Free rational discussion is the only way to attain all, in its purity.

Reverence the highest cause, as to discard the bibles of tradition, as most irreverent and usurping.

True religion never has been rightly advocated.

She involves justice, while peculiar faith flees it under the special plea of faith.

By the authorization of religion, principles were made for all—the great conservatives to mind in all ages of the world. Religion puts us on the safe, the right side.

If honesty be one of the pillars of religion, peculiar faith then cannot exist at all, as it is untrue, a part of superstition. Religion makes all things right, hence the good must aid in the majesty of all proper laws and social rights. There is no black-letter God-written code of religion, but there is the counterfeit in man's bibles of peculiar faith.

Do I object to religion? never, whilst my mind recognises duty to God and man. If the people do not have religion, they must have superstition, its substitute. They, in their ignorance, were never known to be without the last, therefore all should have rational religion, the more civilized the more rational. But none of this admits bibles of tradition, Christianity, Mormonism, Mahomedanism, or any other peculiar faith. If you start such system, that begets more, and keeps the world always wrong. But religion established rationally, not peculiarly, begets more rational religion, the more the people are civilized.

With the true faith of religion you can have no sects, no polytheism, idolatry of man-worship, or images, atheism, no speculation or trade, for all will be between one's conscience and conscience's God, proved by action to man, proved by social good.

It is not only not wrong, but absolutely right.

Religion teaches to think first and last of your Creator, exclusively so as Creator and Preserver.

You can get the only pure religion from the purest fountain, which nature's God gave thy mind. He is represented by mind and conservative principles, as the powerful agents in the universe.

Religion gives a social faith and confidence. It enables all minds to wish all the world to prosper, then it may prosper with all.

This position enables mind to see that the Creator of the universe is properly represented, not in a peculiar, but universal perfect power and character.

This is his character, support it godly, religiously.

No master's words, but God's principles, declare his own religion. The organization of the world's circle is to counteract wo, to comprehend happiness. Religion is national and universal, never sectional, but as lofty as patriotism prompts, to secure the order, peace, harmony and happiness of the world. It eschews pride, but ever adopts high-mindedness. The mighty functions of time and supreme action over all, as the optimist, are hers.

Right and wrong, virtue and vice, sectarianism and religion, are not arbitrary distinctions, but have their lines of demarcation.

Among the beauty and munificence of mind, is one of the crowning virtues, forbearance; that includes a host of virtues that ripen the soul for eternity.

If rational faith be wrong, what faith, then, can be right? Matters of government have been submitted to the people on constitutional properties, why not religion, that would institute the proper energies of moral and social duties? Religion yields the inalienable imprescriptible rights of duty by reason of creation. She alone, in the solution of the mighty problem of the world, gives the excellency of enlightened civilization.

This enlightened age should insure, on the best security, the most enlightened system of rational polity, for the most enlightened civilization. This is to render all satisfied, correct, and happy. How are the true ends of life attained? By the best of self-government. What is government for? For the best interests of society, by a proper inherent protection of its organic bodies.

The highest attainment is rational freedom, that confers its principles to nations, illustrated by enlightened and refined civilization. The blessings of all are the highest practicable steps. The teachings of pure religion will cause God to estimate mind, as the noble character acting according to the best of its nature, not in reference to the traditional legends of obsolete bibles.

Who are infidel? They who know not religion, but should know that it is the highest duty to the God of the universe, and nothing less. She knows no God less than the Creator of the universe. The bible of tradition and religion! choose ye between them, as the one is distinct from the other.

It is the least of evils, the best philosophy, to resign ourselves to satisfaction under matters of equitable government, though they particularly bear on us whilst they correct greater evils elsewhere. Religion enjoins this much on us. Would you individually keep yourself forever in a passion for what you cannot alter, and which benefits others as the least of evils? To analyze religion, we must analyze the universe, as its relations can be comprehended by it.

Religion is not worship, but adoration, if rational, it has no peculiarity. Man is necessarily a moral, religious as intellectual being. True religion must and will meet the whole demands of conscience. Peculiar faith subverts them.

Religion directs all the affections legitimately, maintains the best equilibrium of mind in support of duty.

She has no burdensome and expensive ritual, no gorgeous priestocracy, no ceremonies and rites, no miracles, no prophecies, no mysteries, no pretensions, but all glorious realities of mind.

None but rational religion has ever been in all kinds of times, and all ages of the world, in all states and conditions of mind, for its creation's birth-right. It is the perpetual religion, that had a contemporaneous existence with mind. Man cannot invent religion. Mere faith carries with it self-delusion, whereas rational religion carries with it satisfactory truths.

Why should there be penalties for society? If no more, the Supreme law of society, that of self-preservation, requires it. As the Creator is the one great Supreme standard for the universe, so religion must be the supreme standard for public opinion. What can be worse than a vague, miserable public opinion, based on no supreme conservative principles? The world, then, suffers. This helps to bring on irretrievable ruin.

Is the bible supreme over religion and mind? Rather, are not these supreme over the bible of tradition?

You seek to be pure with the best? Yes. The bible of mind comes to aid in the perfection of that purity. Why should there not be freedom in religion? Does it belong to anything but mind, the beneficiary? Some seek to act on mere temporal policy, to do the thing of intrigue and concealment, so as not to be found out! That is not the safe position. Do the thing of principle, on principle, to defy crimination of the world. It is not the being found out, but the competency to triumph over vice.

The noblest view, the highest value that is practicable by duty, is inculcated by religion. There can be no sanctification in peculiar faith, as religion only admits justification through grace, and mercy for hope.

We see merely one-sided views in the pulpit.

Rational discussion is the only fair position about religion, nothing short of it. Hers is no negative, but a positive position. The rational takes precedence of the irrational; it is not cold nor deficient, when it is the only thing expedient. It is the creation of God, the substantial reality for the embodied soul, in all its duties and affections. Ours is to build up and expose the subtleties and sophistries of the presumptive substitutes. The great defect and error in mind of all, are the partial action as to our duty, religion—it lacks legitimate comprehension. There is an awful vacuum in morals and happiness, only to be met by mind in its wisest actions of legislation, rational education, &c.

What a singular idea that classes of people are sanctified, have gone as high as faith can carry them.

Now let us correct the priestocracy. If mind had attained perfection in science and wisdom, it were all right, but as we know that it is otherwise, it is all presumption and assurance.

The world has to adopt principles sooner or later, if it adopt justice. The world will not be right till mind be right, well educated and cultivated.

Reverence God's principles by reverence to mind.

In seeking after religion, we go for truth, to which faith and fable are in abeyance. One of the great secrets of life, of religion that imparts mental satisfaction, is to have no antagonism with the world.

How can the world avoid that? By the adoption of principles. It is rational education that teaches and enables individuals and nations to look to themselves independently. But for this, an insidious world will use them to the end of their lives.

Religion scorns the idea of idols or images in any respect whatever; it seeks not rites or ceremonies of faith, but goes in for the realities of mind.

Religion is rational, not cold, speculative philosophy, being part and parcel of all rational minds.

There is but one thing worthy of the name of religion, the pure adoration of Almighty God. Who had this? None connected with priestocracy.

Religion seeks the exclusive pure empire of God, who is universally supreme. The great essentials should be correctly appreciated in the world.

The social organization requires the perfection of religion in practice.

Religion is the best kind of law and justice, for the whole human family. The reverence due to God, and the paramount obligation to religion, have caused this work to be written. It is practical religion that is worth anything to the social relations of the world, that yields no individual hypocrisy, no rational aggression, no unnatural crimes, no world's distress.

It is of the utmost consequence that man have religion, and disavow all peculiar faiths for the best of reasons, universal brotherhood, that cannot be established without it. See the state of all peculiar sects that have deranged, dissociated and demoralized the whole world in all ages, and that cannot possibly be reconciled because they are peculiar.

Religion is all trust in the God of the universe, and the highest, most virtuous duty to society.

The elements of religion are in all rational minds.

The world has the best of reasons for rational religion to secure a universal brotherhood, to stop all the degradations of pretended prophecy, that may be any and everything that human piracy can make it. Pure religion is confined to no locality nor age, neither to sectarianism of Polytheism, Christianity, Judaism or Mormonism. Before Christ was even thought of, for thousands of years since mind's creation, religion necessarily existed as a part of mind.

The Creator managed all this by forethought, whereas the priestocracy has interpolated their puny peculiar faiths, most spurious coin of after-thoughts.

The great question with the world, lies between rational religion and peculiar faith, which may be Christianity, Judaism, Mahommedanism, Mormonism, but not religion.

To reach this, revelation of the universe must be appropriately studied, and the proper adoption made. All the revelations of peculiar faith or tradition bibles, can never reach religion, the essential principles of which are the birth-right constituents of every mind.

The great question then is, rational religion or none.

Peculiar faith makes many revelations all peculiar, and many peculiar assumptions. Rational mind has rational faculties or means to attain its happiness. If God has designed a future state of existence for mind, most clearly it is improbable that the perfect Creator should have given several revelations to the world, and all so imperfect as not accomplish his object by a majority!

All persons ought thoroughly to know religion, none peculiar faith. The main great question you and the whole world are concerned in, is religion. But all the bibles of tradition do not present the meagre pretence of justice to mankind. We may well say, what a libel on justice! Let it not be forgotten that morals, laws and government, of the right cast, are a part and parcel of religion, that no peculiar bibles ever yet presented.

As reformed faith advances benefits to the world, so will rational religion complete the position. Religion teaches the adoration of God alone, in his purity.

What is sin? Any thing antagonistic to God's immutable principles.

One of the most abominable is that of the priestocracy, to render God's government divisible. This is contemptible. There is no legitimate ability to trade on the capital of any peculiar faith offered in the world.

Religion is to carry out the highest obligations of civilized society. The whole question of religion has never been truly solved, and the balance has been ignobly surrendered to peculiar faith, an unscrupulous usurper, which has to be discarded as a preliminary solution by mind, ere the world be rightly brought to its relative and absolute position. The first English settlers of New England assume to have emigrated for religion, not for bible idols.

What promotes the first? Assuredly, not the last. Then the world is in error, enslaved by peculiar customs and habits. Religion bespeaks the purity of intention, and the intellectuality of design.

As to sectarianism, religion is not divided. When there is the spirit of division, religion is not there. Religion has no sectarianism. Wherever we see the last, the first does not exist at all. In the place of the bible of peculiar faiths, she uses what is available all the time in her utilitarian processes, in law, order and morals, establishes the noblest institutions practicable for the world, and has them most faithfully carried out.

The Jew, Christian, Brahmin, Bhuddist, Mahommedan, and Mormon, are personally friends by direct commercial and world-interests.

Are these to be annihilated in useless and dangerous faiths, that never were worth an iota to the sovereign people, being mere devices to uphold dynasties oppressive to the people?

They seek to know what to be at. They must adopt, what rational men only can do. The whole world of peculiar faiths must lay them aside, and unite on the only platform practicable, given them by God, who is the eternal standard. The question of religion rises above all peculiar faiths. I go for the soul of religion, not the form of peculiar faith. The mere intellectuality of man will not do in all this matter, much less his opinion founded on the authority of other people's pretences. It requires the soul, the mind, and its best functions, to make him what he ought to be. Mind has not accomplished its mission, till it has solved the mighty question of religion through its highest rationality. With that, peculiar faith or its advocates, have nothing to do. But the term of religion some affect to be a re-binding again, as if man was ever cut loose from his existence, or the Author of his existence. He may adopt any absurd notion about faith, and affect to be under its superstitious protection, but that has not absolved him yet from abeyance to the Author of his creation, whom he thus constantly libels.

The world needs a sound, healthy, public mind. It can be only on the conservative principles of pure religion, not of peculiar faith, the highest, most refined civilization. Religion commands mind to investigate with reverential duty, its position, and not let the world plead in vain for necessary assistance.

She institutes all the proper offices of life. She requires all to treat the world courteously, but all must protect themselves against its machinations. Religion is that which unites the moral Universe, but any peculiar faith, Christianity, Judaism, or any, separates them wide apart, and renders them hostile! Citizen of the world, think of these things. Let the world master the subject of Monotheism, and then it will see the full benefit of rational religion.

Religion teaches all the social, civil and individual duties, the filial and parental, and all the kindred relations. The obligation to poor relations, sisters and brothers, are paramount to empty monuments that last but for a time.

Religion is essential to the cause of the right faith, or view of God's facts. All the peculiar-faith bible people are squatters on the legitimate premises of religion. This great question of religion ought to be satisfactorily settled before the world, that bible bullies may no longer blackguard those who choose to think rightly. The world should see a speedy end to all the pretences of all peculiar faiths.

So great is the intrinsic capital of virtue and integrity, that the whole world affects them when not inherent; therefore the standard of religion establishes the position.

Religion has ever shed its divine light more or less on mind, according to its cultivation.

No sect appropriates religion or its principles.

When we see human nature in its proper theatre, the trial of soul in matters of interest-absorbing transactions, then we can appreciate the character of the man who suffers none to excel him in good deeds, courtesy or politeness, the result of enlightened and liberalized mind, that looks at truth all the time.

God immutable, immaculate and infinite, ever must regard such characters with due consideration. Religion counteracts the most evil, and renders the suppression the main object of greatest good, to the greatest number, the whole. The world then has to combat most effectually the capital sins of pride, envy, anger, voluptuousness, avarice, idleness, gluttony, ambition, if it seek that happiness of mind that best insures the happiness of soul.

Religion promotes excellence, and enlarges the intrinsic capacity to meet the facts and circumstances for a successful mastery, and turning to the best account of mind here, of the soul hereafter.

Religion teaches the world to abhor the degrading sophistry of peculiar faiths that sneak from all manly views that look to principles. She teaches mankind to faithfully claim that their soul exclusively belongs to God, the sole creator, that they will not betray, traitor-like, but do their duty to all, country, friends and family, and be above all meanness, even to its shadow.

Let the world be rid of the horrid iniquity, the false position, the degraded prostitution of sincerity before peculiar faiths, and resume the God-given religion.

Suppose all the time, means, and pains devoted to peculiar matters were properly, at once and forever, given to all that is religion and universal brotherhood, the world at once would be in a fair way to progress rightly, by rational education. Religion permits only the proper independent resentment for self-preservation, and all that must be in the absence of principles of one side or the other.

If a person acts untruthfully or dishonestly, surely religion will not passively permit him to prosper thus. Reformation to be potential in its comprehension, must soar to the influence of conservative revolution, as much above the attempt of a Luther, as that of rational religion is above the pretences of peculiar faith, as much above passive toleration as universal temperance is above partial drinking.

Religion teaches the world never to be identified with other peoples' weaknesses, errors, much less their crimes. Religion is God-gift to mind, and is inseparable therefrom. How is man to be a gentleman?

Will peculiar faith, that alienates mankind, perfect that character? Religion teaches all to remember, never forget at any time the refined courtesies of life. You cannot make religion out of peculiar faith, no matter how you fix it. Religion is the highest, fullest, most complete performance of duty to God and man, in its primitive purity. Let the conservative principle and soul of religion prevail all over the world, let it have full scope, to increase the beauty and loveliness of expansive Mind. Religion allows of no equivocation in regard to the equity of Justice; her advocates respect wise laws, order, honesty and truth. Hers is the abiding spirit of supreme Good.

The question arises, why not have mind to come up to the defence of property, without lock or law, as religion is for world-usefulness and correction? It is because peculiar education perverts the mental organization, and holds the world in abeyance to it. Peculiar faith has usurped her rightful possession, and cuts up the world into fragments, whereas religion blends them all into harmonious universal brotherhood.

The highest of all rational codes is that of religion, that has no contracted sectional but broadest platforms. People should see their way clear under the highest code of religion, and be fearful of doing any thing wrong. The sovereign people should be now held responsible for the correct position of this whole matter. Get religion, say the peculiar faith priestocracy. But what was mind about previously? That is the great and vital question. The true secret of religion is the legitimate government of the passions. Religion tends to make perfect gentlemen, and the world most peaceable and friendly. The world cannot contend at all about religion.

Come, reader, let us have the mighty question of religion settled; it can be done certainly by the best of truthful and good faith, the best of faith decision.

Religion requires mankind to pay what they owe at the time and way, patriotism to their country, brotherhood to the world, religion, instead of peculiar faith, to their God, their highest parental, filial, conjugal and social duties. Religion is to make us most contented, happy and most extensively useful. Religion, the great law of nature and morality, is incompatible with peculiar faith doctrines of Jew or Gentile. The priestocracy talk of spiritualizing religion; that is the highest duty on this earth for individual, social, national and world morality. How will you like people of the world to be deceived, deluded out of the only practical part of true religion, for all the false pretences of peculiar faith and all its priestocracy? What are either of the last worth to you?

Religion is attractive and lovely, but peculiar faith is odious and contemptible. The mass of the people have mistaken peculiar faith for religion.

Gratitude is a great action due from man to God, and should be paid to mankind for the indebtedness to God. Citizen of the world, let us understand each other. If you are disinterested, and not the bigot of superstition and peculiar bible faith, then you must be a rational being, and if we both possess rational minds, we must agree on the rational principles of religion, the highest duty known to rational mind.

The whole world should seek the best and highest individual, social, national and world morals with religion to man and God. You ask for the purity of society, the chastity of your wife, the elevated justice of the world, the universal benefit of society? Then you should have acted all your part to promote such excellence, such exaltation. All this is pre-eminently embraced in the holy precincts of religion. Say what you will of this kind of government, and that kind of peculiar faith, still is there that highest Supreme Tribunal established in this earth, where a world's justice can be dispensed but with religion? None but pure religion can establish it. That spirit never yet has been instituted by all peculiar faiths, whose whole elements are not competent as they are not inherent.

Because one disbelieves in the peculiar faith bible, that so far from exempting any rational beings from duties, social and rational, obligates them more.

When the acts of nations become to be scanned as individuals by the world's tribunal, whose enlightened opinion will become appropriately potent, then morals and religion will take precedence as omnipotent agents for mind. To keep the world happy, at ease, contented, and in the progress of mind's light, is the part of religion, but peculiar faith seeks all it can for self, conspires and combines with despotic union for collusion to deceive, enslave and render mind benighted.

I give credit to all mankind for all the religion they do possess, and that is Monotheism, or Rational Religion. The right soul throughout the world can only be rightly maintained by rational religion. The world needs religion; it demands the action of the legitimate direction of all the holiest matters, also the exclusion of even the means of useless popular excitement in peculiar faith, the agitation of impracticable and hurtful world measures. Why do I come out so strongly? To adjust the whole rights of mind, religion as due the Creator, to whom the only exclusive reverence is due, all else is blasphemy, impiety, sacrilege. The world needs the great vital principle of religion. I know none but one religion, monotheism, one society, the universal brotherhood of civilized, refined mankind: all others are of the devices of man and will be finite. Religion rises equal to all the demands made upon it, whilst all peculiar faiths fall invariably below their dignity. Religion bestows universal and uniform protection to save the world from antagonisms the most. The great world questions to-day are not whether we can reach all at once the solution of the weighty matters to be accomplished, but whether we can progress in laying all proper foundations upon rational principles and no other.

Religion obliges men to do that which is right, to take the loftiest character and action, without compulsion. She causes man to honor himself by advocating God's unity, all that is exclusively due it. Rationality connects us, with due appreciation of Deity. It is she that teaches us to duly estimate that adversity has made the world more virtuous. The religion of rational mind bids us put ourselves beyond the reach of vice. Can there be any improvements on truth and reason?

Religion comprehends all legitimate pleasures. But what has the laity to do with religion? Every thing, as universal property of mind.

But is it not the peculiar property of the priestocracy? That at once decides their claim not to be religion but peculiar faith, for religion is universal to rational minds.

The priestocracy may arrogate all their peculiar faiths as monopolies to themselves, but let them not diffuse one iota of such poison in popular minds.

Religion has permanent principles, that cannot be appropriated by any cliques or professions. All that pertains to religion must be immutable as principles.

The doctrine of peculiar faith, ever variable and changing, is a libel on religion. Confidence most rational binds us to the Great First Cause in genuine humility, and this constitutes rational religion to God, the supreme and universal standard, who is the author of principles for a universal guide. The God of nature is identified with nature, the rules of which are his immutable principles. The fixedness of principles is a guarantee, a bond of religion, between the Creator and the universe. Without such consecration of immutability, the whole would be subject to reckless contingencies and wrecks. What nonsense to forsake principles, that by religion bind all mankind to their Creator.

Atheism and polytheism are deficient in all this, for want of justice to the pure author of our existence. Religion as most philosophical, depends on the best science of rational principles, to become most rational.

She influences all rational minds, in ratio to their rationality and the appropriate rational education. If it were not so, why are those religious and good not possessing peculiar faith?

Nothing can obliterate religion from the universe. Let the mind be engulphed in all the horrors of barbarism, it will be impossible to keep it there, for the God of Religion indited it on man's soul for the noblest, most universal purposes. How often does much of the world affect that it does not concern them, to act their part in religion. Religion and its rightful state do concern the whole of mankind, and if carried properly and rationally out, would exclude all the equivocal state of morals, &c., growing out of its neglect by new doctrines and practices of spurious faith. If a man be of the right stamp, education, &c., all may be well. What an illustrious, noble theatre, had Washington, whose example will be honored the world's age. What an ignoble one had Moses and his priestocracy, to impose the deepest tricks upon the Jews for religion! The world needs religion, not Judaism nor any sectarianism, to exempt itself from crimes, faults and follies, that peculiar faith increases.

Let not superficial critics pretend that superstition and false faith were the only means to govern the ancients, when the God of mind gave the reverse as conservatives. The same might as well affirm that California gold mines had caused the world to sin, when it was the perversion of mind. Where was religion anterior to the institution of all peculiar faiths, Jew and others? Where it is now and has ever been, true representative of its author, God, supreme over all such pretences.

The Romanists pay more respect to saints, so miscalled, than they do to God, the effect of the vices of their peculiar faith. I seek to disabuse the public mind, and have all about religion right.

No peculiar faith or bibles, ministers, churches, or missionaries, one or all the aids employed, can begin to reach the main and vital question of religion, but they will mislead souls farther from the real and essential object. Dismiss all these as trash, and let the soul confide in all its deepest humility in its creator. Do you wish to be right? Then you wish not to be a bigot.

Religion is pre-eminent justice in the best of good faith, towards the God of the universe and man. It is most essential to know and premise what is religion, for the converse carries in its face fraud, untruth and dishonesty. The world has only very partially thought correctly on religion, as it has recklessly and heedlessly submitted to the mercenary speculations of an avaricious priestocracy. However it may have been duped for thousands of years by the advocates of the false position, it should not be ashamed to amend. Gratitude in all things is due from mind to its Creator, who is pre-eminently characterized by love, wisdom and perfection. The world has been too long injured and deceived, by peculiar bible sophists. The sooner mothers arrive at the most correct conclusion, the better for their offspring. They might linger for them in doubt and uncertainty, but for the universal care of the Universe Creator.

Religion is the consummation of correct knowledge and duty, to man and God. Principles are universal laws of nature, immutable and eternal, inviolable as equitable and just. Never violate principles.

Religion is one of the loveliest of matters, and the individual may feel all that he may expect to realize from rational actions and feelings. Religion governs minds, thoughts, words and deeds—is the only legitimate government adapted to mind's organization. She cannot vary, but has unity as principles that are universal. Religion calls for all the legitimate advancements of rational mind, the properly conducted unrestricted range of discussion on all apppropriate subjects that will advance mind to the right point. Churches should be public arenas for this purpose and nothing less, to hear all sides to secure the right one. Religious fortitude can be defined, a firm maintenance of the best appreciation of the religion of principles. The question of religion is one of mind, that holds faith in abeyance to truth, and forever decides the world-wide agitation on rational principles, that of free agency. This consigns all peculiar faith people to non-existence.

Mind is in its legitimate element, when it is under principles. What system then, gives principles? Religion. We then have to investigate this superb, supreme, sublime subject, to reach the most legitimate conclusions.

Atheism allows mind to grope in the dark after a creator, and of course gives us none of his principles. Polytheism gives us false doctrines and positions, and both mere hopelessness. What is the difference between these two? That is of little consequence, for they are worthless. Of course all mind's circumstances the most elevated require the exercise of principles, and if mind be corrupted by peculiar education, it is most corrupted.

What a sacrilege are the peculiar faiths of polytheism entailing on minds. Being failures they permit it to run riot in vice and crimes, rather than concede the right instruction to monotheism. She teaches the true secret of life, to seek to be always satisfied, with the best the safest done. A virtuous life is the best insurance of happiness, especially in society that is so mixed as to excite distrust.

The progress of religion is arrested by the prejudiced bigotry of old exploded bibles—that of course must be put down.

ANALYSIS OF MIND AND ITS FUNCTIONS RESUMED.

Mind, well constituted and organized, well balanced by appropriate cultivation, can never surrender paramount principles essential to its vital enjoyment, or immortal action in more exalted spheres.

The due cultivation of mind is requisite to resist the fascinations of temptations, the deceits of sophistry, the various forms of superstition, and adhere knowingly to the protective benefits of rational rectitude.

Above all earthly considerations is the absolute necessity of mind eliciting the wisest national and self-governments, most ably sustained by the wisest legislation, to best effectually repel all malign dynasties.

Faith, reason, and truth, how recognised by mind? Faith is an act of the mind, to satisfy which we adopt the solution and test of reason to secure truth, by analysis and analogy.

It is impossible for it to be otherwise, from the very faculties with which we are endowed by the God of reason.

We cannot adopt faith on unreasonable testimony, as our minds are not so constituted to elicit truth.

All truthful faith must be sincerely embraced to be faithful to our highest rights, else the result is most hostile to our highest interest, misleading us into difficulties and dangers.

The proper functions of truth and reason require faith to rest on rational and proper testimony.

Mind is for ever the analyst, self and free agent to proper attainment of its security by reason, of facts under its cognizance, or solution through analogy.

Faith is not for assumptions, fables, and legends, as our tyrants to enslave or terrify, but the true friend of humanity on rational testimony to satisfy.

Faith never can go beyond reason—if so, then the richest functions of the mind are at an end.

Reason holds faith accountable and responsible to the functions of mind, else God never gave reason nor conservative principles to the universe, as they are useless if not appreciated by mind for its good.

It is impossible for faith to triumph over reason; the minor or less would then be superior to the major or greater, an absurdity and a blot on the assertor's mind, a libel on Deity and his best gifts, the foul blot of fanaticism and superstition.

As all faith comes through the mind, all bibles as trustworthy must be the bibles of mind, amenable to reason and philosophical principles.

All others are the bibles of miracles, prophecies, and mysteries, all of which are inconsistent with reason and truth, and cannot possibly arouse proper faith, suitable for free and intelligent minds.

All such bibles are the works of insidious masters, and not of soul-ennobling principles.

No traditions of faith, ancient or modern, that are obsolete, obscure, or contradictory; partial in time and space, and peculiar in all; that appropriate phenomena of nature supernatural, unreasonable and unrecorded by God's works; peculiar endowments of mankind with prophecy limited to the exposure of science that explodes superstition; language misunderstood and liable to a multitude of misinterpretations, mistranslations and misconstructions; above all, mysterious of themselves, giving man's mysteries for God's elaborate and perfect wisdom: subject to contingency in hearing and excluding the constant monitor, an enlightened conscience, that teaches the perfection of the Almighty, whose noblest attribute is unity, from its highest duties of ever watching at the shrine of the soul, and substituting irresponsible proxies for hire and gain; holding up their best lights and examples as universal corruptors of the people, by broken faith, repudiation of honest debts, termination in idolatry, murder, theft, adultery, and hypocrisy; imposition of mortals, born and dead as mortals; speculating in impiety and blasphemy offered for immortals;—can have a proper claim to confidence, or the sincere faith of mind endowed with reason, to supersede God—immortal and supreme over all, by the mere pretences of men!

The functions of mind are to secure reason, guide of rational religionists or monotheists, believers in the one living God, and his principles conservative to his creation. This position is absolutely necessary to exclude the demoralizing doctrines of atheism, that pretends to a universe without conservative principles, physically, morally, and religiously; also to exclude those of polytheism, or belief in any plurality of gods; which last doctrine must have various antagonistic or inefficient dogmas, with analogous appreciation of mind, all of which must finally be referred to the supremacy of the only Great First Cause of all, whose conservative principles are paramount to all; and certainly to exclude any system if indifferent to the conservation of legitimate, social and religious duties, relations, and virtues.

The doctrine or belief in any number of gods, infinite, trinity, or more than one God, is alike embraced in polytheism, all equally demoralizing and hostile to the unity, supreme rights and character of the Great First Cause, the sole creator of the universe, and by right of genius, the exclusive proprietor.

Any such faith necessarily introduces chaos and confusion into Deity's government, a vile usurpation on God's rights.

Such faith gives imposition to mind, and blasphemy unto Deity.

The conception of such impeaches mind and its best qualities.

The results of all such faith are proved by the history of the world to have been demoralizing, and productive of an immense train of corruption and evil.

Those who adopt such doctrine knowingly, present a corrupt doctrine of faith, not sustainable in any moral attributes of exalted social relations.

This confusion is plain in the world, from dreadful conflicts of false faith in all ages, acting on perverted mind, embittered by deadly feuds, animosities, strife, hatred, malice, injustice, reckless shedding of the blood of millions, sparing neither ages nor sex, outraging by exile and banishment; and exterminating with the most ferocious fanaticism, the most vindictive butchery, murders, tortures at the stake by fires, and the most savage warfare on rights, reputation, and mind.

The only remedy is through reason, representative of truth, that refers to the unity of the Great First Cause, and erects on this, the only foundation—the unity of one brotherhood of the world, for whose universal benefit and stock, universal principles have been given by the Creator.

Through man's life, from youth to matured age, what else protected him all the time but these very conservative principles, adequate to representatives of Deity? They were in existence from the foundation of the universe, that was chaos but for them, that silently and sublimely operate, physically and morally, and none but the Creator is the wiser, but through mind, his inspiration that recognises and performs what is necessary.

The atheist denies the existence of a God, then he denies the principles of the universe, whose wisest organization utterly condemns him, and of his own vital existence that he cannot violate without penalty.

The atheist must deny these incontestible proofs if he deny the First Great Cause.

Is the mind of such a being sane?

Let a derangement exist between the relations of the sun and any of the planets belonging to his solar system, and the physical principles are clearly proved to be existent; but the wise and sound mind has already, with sublime contemplation, recognised these principles, in the prevailing order of such spheres, and especially in the sublime harmony of the universe.

Much more do the moral principles apply, when we see the derangement of man's nature from his vices. Then physical, moral, and religious moral principles prevail, and must be recognised by all wise and sound minds.

MIND—FAITH—THEOLOGY.

MIND then has to assert its dignity, independence of Feudalism or feudal vassalage, light, right, beauty, strength, greatness, goodness, patriotism and wisdom, to resist a blind and fanatic faith.

Faith, religious particularly, must be addressed to reason, to claim mind's belief and truth's assent, otherwise it universally merits its supreme contempt, for enlightened conscience is ever excluded by blind relief.

Freemen know no other avenue for honest men, ever since the days of American Independence, when freedom of government gave freedom to reason, and independence to truth, on all legitimate subjects, of which religious freedom is pre-eminent.

Theology is then ever free for discussion, as any matter of mind in all its bearings, from thought to action.

Mind demands proper reading of reason's language.

But the people are certainly lost, many affect, if they do not have faith of peculiar character.

Can any people be saved, without honest, that is, rational faith? Such faith is not peculiar, but universal. Those who do not believe in some peculiar faith, are damned! And yet they are to be saved by faith, honest or dishonest? Faith they must have!

Was there ever such imposition on mind?

Is the world to believe in religion, but what is rational and honest, to have consistent actions?

The sublimest system of religion calls for faith on its merits, without which none can exist.

For want of faith, the soul is to be damned, yet she is not to call upon the only Sentinel on the watch-tower of her liberty and salvation, but is to cast her off most absurdly with ignominious surrender to seducers and speculators!

Can the conscience and reason of enlightened freedom exist and flourish in any such faith?

The greatest variety of peculiar faiths may rise up, all intended to deceive and beguile the people, unless all such faiths are made subject to the majesty of reason, truth, and principles, that are the only safe protection for mind.

The more diversified faith in her various peculiar systems, the more is that faith to be scanned by reason, for if mind do not consult reason in this labyrinth of mere opinions, what else can it consult rightly and justly, to reach the only one of truth?

There is no safety in any peculiar faith, without reason.

What mockery of wisdom and religion, to exclude reason, the noblest attribute of mind!

What treachery to the noblest treasure of the Universe, free agency of mind! Free agency of mind cannot exist, without reason, a position that excludes the responsibility of mind, of soul.

Where can there be a juster and wiser faith, than in reason that characterizes truth and justice?

Such faith is the friend and beneficiary of mind.

FAITH FROM UNIVERSAL FACTS.

THINGS seen do declare universally the character of the Creator; the hand-writing is there surely, not to be counterfeited.

The systems of the Universe do declare their soul and first cause, which is name potent enough in character for mind, just and true to his exclusive attributes.

Analogy of philosophical analysis gives us the balance in the process of freeman's highest state, refined civilization. This is omnipotent faith, to mind progressing in the knowledge of science and thought.

Let none with the picture of iniquity resulting from peculiar faith and its attendant evils, arising as a necessary consequence for refusal to God his universal attributes, impiously and blasphemously mislead himself for the best years of his life, after a vain and particular faith that is to injure creation, marring its brightest lustre, and libelling its Creator.

Let none die, as millions of good citizens, thinking of adopting a faith, that their enlightened conscience refuses to their dying breath.

But let them, as worthy citizens, know that their Creator as great in preservation as creation, is fully competent to do all for his purpose, despite of all the legends of systems of man's opinions and libels.

Then all rational minds have the essential and inherent elements of true faith of rational religion, that honors, if rightly directed to none but the living God, and blesses the soul that it honors.

All rational beings are bound to one faith, honestly woven in their nature, by the God of Nature.

The only saving faith, comes from the Supreme Power.

Is faith competent to go beyond reason, then mind is competent to embrace a position beyond the great first cause?

This pretence, would expose a universal imposition. Any tradition of this character, carries on its face the clearest evidence of its own destruction, and the means of its own refutation.

The constituent elements of religious faith refer exclusively to the Creator of mind.

THE GREAT FIRST CAUSE.

DEITY AND HIS RIGHTFUL ATTRIBUTES, FUNCTIONS, AND PRINCIPLES.

The great first cause, is Supreme and Immortal God of Nature, to be recognised by enlightened mind, and best appreciated by soundest reason.

His names may be as diversified, as mind can portray God's supreme excellence.

God is Creator of the Universe and its eternal conservative principles, that vindicate themselves for his supreme power, that is Almighty, Omnipotent, and Supreme Ruler of Creation. There can be no other God, as all else are his created beings.

God's function is creation, to which all others are subordinate. His functions, attributes, and principles, render him omniscient, knowing all things in time, space, and eternity.

Omnipotent, existing throughout and occupying time, space, and eternity, the perfect Creator of the Universe.

God is not peculiar, but universal in his attributes.

God's excellence is unmistakable to enlightened reason, through which his only language is addressed to all created minds, that approach nearest with their essential qualities, to his best appreciation.

God's excellence is eternally proclaimed and vindicated in all his works, through which he alone communicates his qualities, and unveils his attributes.

God's presence is veiled to mortals, and can only be approached in a better, future, and more elevated state of excellence, through immortality, the exponent of the soul's worth and character, and of its blissful fruition.

God's word is the Universe document recognised in the tablets of mind, to be enlightened by reason as worthy analyst of the Universe.

The court of conscience which declares mind enlightened by reason, can only take cognizance of any affirmation or tradition of faith, on the just principles and proper analysis of truth. All others are preposterous and unjust in the sight of Omniscience.

Among God's Principles, written by the Immortal Hand of Infinite Wisdom, that the finite finger of mortals cannot counterfeit, are Purity, Justice, Mercy, Goodness, Benevolence, Immutability, Perfection, some of his attributes.

God's power is indivisible and adequate, therefore excludes any participation of his attributes in every respect. God is too powerful to need, as his attribute, Omnipotence, or Almighty, implies, and too great to admit any Vicegerent assistant or Messiah, mere creatures, but his conservative principles, that embrace universal good, and exclude its negative partial evil, ministers alone of his excellence, and exponents of all others as impostors of blasphemy.

Under those principles, the means of universal inspiration, mind acts on mind.

Man's crude opinions and insidious dogmas have superceded principles, and Messiahs with their minions, priests, preachers and devotees, have invaded the province of the Almighty! Superstition enslaves minds and renders them vassal.

God's goodness and purity created good in its amplest extent, which is only limited in enjoyment by the operations of mind, that creates by perversion its negative, evil. The goodness and purity of God, exclude the original or subsequent creation of spirits of evil, as non-essential to his magnanimity or greatness, and antagonistic to the goodness of his soul, and the supremacy of his Omnipotence. Much more do these attributes exclude any seduction by sin from his pure presence, into which impurity cannot enter, of any beings, especially blessed souls, and happy in that blessing.

God's purity and immutability in that purity, are the best guarantees of immutability of happiness to beatific beings, that otherwise would be liable to temptation, transgression and expulsion, consequent thereon at any duration and period of eternity. There can be no greater libel of Deity and imposition on mind, than the code of machinery of devils, and the necessity of messengers or angels and messiahs in the universe of the Almighty, supreme in his perfection. Mind, inspired by the wisest philosophical science, can only appreciate the first elements of Deity's genius, in the sublime magnificence of the works of his universe. The very equilibrium of its sphere silences in the profoundest admiration, mind. Mind yields all its aspirations and intellectual claims of the loftiest ambition, in due voluntary submission of humility at the shrine of his Creator, beyond whom it cannot pass, and has to invoke for the solution of the mightiest problem, the self-existence of God, the gift of higher intellectual organs, and a nobler, an immortal position.

On this earthly theatre it is our duty to seek the right appreciation of Deity, for superstition that has such deceptive impersonations of religion, enables corrupt priests and preachers to libel Deity's attributes.

God's noblest work is the honesty of mind, and its immortal capacity for truth and happiness.

God alone, is the confessor of his creation. It is he that permits the mind to commune in the silence and solitude of its musings, with immortal hopes. Who, sinful mortal, shall usurp this sacred place of the Most High: who shall presume most blasphemously to his holy office?

Who shall, destitute of principle, excommunicate God's people: who can foolishly arrogate this Supreme function? Such presumption is accursed.

God's essence is universal good; its negative is the position of penalty to mind, delinquent in duty and reverence. God's holiness of purpose must be recognised by mind, in the various deductions of reason, the means of truth. Devotion to this recognition, resting on God's immutable principles, the essential laws of the universe, bespeak respect to nature's rest, both of mind and body, that sustain injury by their violation. This is the supreme principle of humanity and philosophy.

One day is as another with God, who created all, and their light that reflects his supremacy, but the effect of various labor, mental and physical, from business of appropriate character, even of vital existence, must cause respect to the principle of rest.

The functions of sleep and advantages of general repose, establish a universal necessity for conservative laws for the mental and animal economy.

The present seventh day Sabbath, by habit, seems to fulfil the object generally, for humane and philosophical purposes.

The observance of many, not less than seven, distinct Sabbaths, all claiming origin from peculiar authority, best establishes their direct emanation from man, and incontrovertibly proves the peculiarity of his Bibles, characterized by tradition, that reason does not sanction, since truth is not antagonistic to itself.

God could only have had one universally over the world, and that would have been unmistakable to mankind in general. The sanction of refined civilization furnishes the best universal code for humanity.

We will find in the end that it is wisest and most humane, to reserve not less than the seventh day for rest.

It should be justly kept inviolable for man and beast, and no business that can be rightly avoided should be started on a travel just before that day. Do not hunt for stock or game on that day, for pastime. Let all have its best benefits.

God's purity and goodness, his attributes, require a superior goodness and exaltation of all, that have knowledge of superior cast, illustrating the universal purpose most consistently identified with the mass of mind on earth, advancing in one mighty phalanx, sustaining itself in eternal progression, and approaching in its improvement by proper results, the Divine character of its Creator.

The code of social and moral relations require as a paramount duty, that mind and conscience be enlightened at the right time and in the right mode, to establish its best attainable condition and position.

Mind's professions of rational religion, are from innate faculties, universal to mankind as rational beings, proved by conscience, that elicits in proportion to its successful cultivation at the right time, mode and natural capacity, the most successful possession.

Mind's professions of religion should be with God in direct reference to its best light, pure and unsullied by trade, speculation or power, and its actions towards the world, should be consistent and uniform, kind and just, in all things.

The certain and immutable principles are conservative for the religious moral as physical universe, hence the indispensable necessity of a correct faith for correct morals, all for correct rational action.

Knowledge is then power and virtue of mind, and the eternal result must be to universal good of creation.

The conclusion is irresistible, that mind's mission to the universe, has to develope these fixed principles in time, and apply them in their best solution to space and eternity, to secure in full man's highest blessing, the best purpose of the Almighty, who created nothing in vain.

Rational religion, that acknowledges the unity of a Supreme immortal first cause, rests with the mind, that should be embellished in all the loveliness of wisdom.

God's attributes, functions and principles, by which he brought creation into organization and being, keep it in eternal preservation, securing the universe in its perpetual action, and regulating all in order and harmony, represent him, and are his sole and sufficient ministers.

In all ages of creation, they are the pioneers of mind, to pilot all who are incompetent to decide best for their own good. Under the circumstances of moral free agency of mind, God is not heard by those who act vaingloriously for themselves or traitors for others and their own minds, while affecting to benefit the gullible sovereign the people, that can be easily coaxed into an immolation of itself, the tool of tyrants and the sport of menials, perverting most abominably conservative principles, all God's capital, by their deeds the veriest libel of God and mind. But God must be heard, and the people have to return to the right point, to listen to reason, the brightest inspiration of mind, to secure God's holiest blessings.

Then it will be perceived, that is the messiah, all-sufficient in its mission to do God's designs, and perfect his purposes. Elevate it to its loftiest powers and inherent capacities, that the soul may use its best capital, the life-gift.

God's works cannot be mistaken, all the time and space. The workman is characterized by his munificent works. Who, in sane mind, does deny them? Rational faith reaches a point, in looking at the attributes of the First Great Cause, where the mind submits, impressed with the magnificent truths of God's creation of his universe, beyond which we cannot go by reason of our finite, earthly, mortal faculties, and want of data to reveal to our view.

Where the data stop reason is arrested, as truth stops, and imagination can do no good, then the virtue of humility, that teaches mind all confidence, all trustworthy faith in the Creator, places the soul in the bosom of the Eternal, who is sublimely triumphant as the God of nature, its ruler and organizer. In the Creator exclusively, then, created mind is estopped, and analagous principles are only to be embraced for life, and those only referable to God's attributes that are undeniable.

Mind rejects and impeaches all else, not compromising with imposture at any moment.

God stands alone, sublime in his majesty, that none others dare approach, much less fill in his universe.

In regard to any rival power in seduction of souls, if we refer to the origin, we must estimate it as fable too.

The mighty elaboration of God's purposes needs no angels, much less fallen ones, whose misfortune in the presence and place of purity, by transgression, a violation of eternal conservative principles, producing the most remarkable of all phenomena, revolution of conservative principles themselves, implies the most absurd imbecility of God's highest attributes, not only in permission of this horrible outrage, but incapacity of reducing this dangerous and opprobrious rival, too often successful in getting away souls from God, to even decent subjection.

Our respect for truth, ever consistent with herself, and reverence for Deity, cause us to discard such absurd credulity, not entitled to the name of faith, and all its nefarious propagators.

These are the vile heresies to mind that condemn them as most contemptible, to reach the object of priestocracy, who violated all that is sacred in their heaven, and polluted it by their treason.

We must believe the God of the universe is a perfect being, and we must not permit one single idea to invalidate it, as that invalidates our most perfect confidence in every respect in him.

So perfect is he, that his central residence is holy and pure. All souls that reach it, must be sanctified or they cannot enter, the best gaining soonest the appropriate prize.

The transcendent magnanimity of God puts him above the seeking to estrange fallen souls or render them desperate, much less befoul his own high character by a penalty machinery that destroys the highest objects of creation. His magnificence is in his munificence, and that can never be better displayed than in the elevation of the soul.

Mind in its feebleness should be modestly silent, and bow in wisest humility to the majestic supremacy of God whose ways, presuming to define, it may libel. Their god of peculiar faith thus portrayed and caricatured, never was the Almighty God that reduced chaos into order when he was incapable of checking the worst of all disorder in their heaven, even where harmony had previously been established. All such, are priestocracy abortions. Such God-portraitures are unworthy the esteem of mind, and justly condemn the authors as degraded blasphemers. Now the attributes of Deity, creator of the universe, will admit of no such construction, unless language be changed. The creation of the Almighty proves conclusively his full supremacy, beyond which even mind cannot go, and less than which it should not presume to stop.

The idea is the essence of sublimity, of supreme majesty. Nothing can be more conclusive, for this idea concludes all; the universe and creation stop there in sublime silence.

His immutable power and essence are forever.

But, then, who knew there was a God or his name?

Who needs being reminded of the sun of this solar system, when his light and heat prove his presence? All the suns and their solar systems are effect of a great First Cause, the name, sublimely stamped on the whole universe.

Mind on the principles of its own action, that of ratiocination, or in tracing effect to cause, knew there was a great First Cause possessed of characteristic attributes. That is all that honest minds can know, or believe can be known.

We can more highly appreciate his character, whose universal attributes convict all the advocates of peculiar faith by principles that irresistibly lead to one universal rational faith that will shame them for their plurality of gods, or for the exclusion of the Creator from his creation, the greatest of absurdities, as corruptors of mind.

The difference between polytheists and atheists seems to be this, that the first only give the Creator partial and the atheists give no power to the God of nature, but all to nature. The first admits only part of a Creator, and the last admits none, both taking a wrong basis.

God is universally great and sublimely supreme; his universe and principles are his eternal agents and prophets, expressive of the living God, whom mind, God-endowed with free-agency, immortality-seeking to all ages, disposed to do right, cannot mistake.

God will amply guarantee for future bliss on the conservative principles of his loftiest attributes, otherwise none can be valid or safe in his august purity.

As it is, there can be no unity nor elevated morals in any faith short of unity, for society never can reach higher in the very highest of all others than the fragments of a disunited brotherhood.

Such will be its state in time, never prepared for eternity by the very constituency of its elements, that run them into quicksands and quagmires inextricable and irremediable.

Take all the systems of faith and its concurrent codes, and all, each and every one, past, present and future, or to come for all time, will fall short of conservation here, and eternal salvation, till they secure the proper conservative principles of an Almighty's attributes.

All wise men must observe and acknowledge all this.

It must be so, from the nature of creation.

All that we are, and can do, is by God; all that we can expect is from God, who supplies all.

God that made us, the First Great Cause, that mind and reason enlightened with just and true lights, declaring true religion, must exclusively adopt, is the true Ruler. He can never be superseded by doctrines of atheism, messiahships or any species of polytheism disguised in modern Trinity, or indefinite ancient numbers. The no-godism implies no principles, a radical and ultra want of system, order and harmony, policy, law and penalty, which is absurdly false to rational mind.

The polytheism or plurality of gods, a system that flourished in ancient times through the vitiated state of the priesthood, till the millions of gods have dwindled to three or four, is swept away forever, as the last but insidious absurdity, by the brilliant eclipsing splendor of immortal monotheism.

Let all their follies and crimes be buried with all their systems.

Potent reason reduces all necessarily, morally, justly, wisely, and rightly, to only the great first cause, that reigneth omnipotent and supreme in eternity.

What wise mind will defer the choice any more?

If any has renounced the Great First Cause, their case is a bad one, for he is the only God, being the author of safety.

If others derogate from his powers, they do so most unwisely, and their penalties will be in accordance with their irreverence. Every man's conscience must decide.

What one in his right rational mind, can reverence other than God?

Is the mind of all perverted, prepared to appreciate all the evil consequences of rejection of reason's God?

They do not, if they look at the results of the world for past time and the present age.

To whom but God alone, can mind, the only means of recognising the subject, resort?

Abscond from its maker, when everything before it declares his authorship, and by the only and best titles, the ownership?

Is that author, God, to be alienated by absurd division of his fee simple estate?

In what enlightened court of conscience, will this be ever done? Who is willing to endorse the consequent perjury? Clearly, no good and wise man in this universe.

The thing is impossible to be done, in the calmness of reflection of any intelligent mind.

Animal passions, ambition, avarice and fear with their horrid and blasphemous fictions, theatrical representations and legends arousing the best sympathies of human nature by false pretences of degrading sophistry devoted to the most iniquitous purposes, may do it for the moment, but never designedly and knowingly, unless humanity is degraded to her lowest depths and stupidity.

The very foundation of such absurdities, is well calculated to create insensibility to the general interest of the world, insincerity and all the train of bad consequences to society, that daily observation points out.

Pure and strong must be the popular mind, to successfully resist them.

The mind must be rightly trained, disciplined, and educated in all proper lights that look to the universe and its conservative principles all the time, eschewing all the absurd subtleties of a credulous and most ignorant age, as angels; world of spirits, good or evil, and peopling the air.

All rational minds have inherent faculties of ideas of a first great cause, but tuition has to instil any other secondary cause that must be forgotten and eclipsed in the resplendent glories of the first, by the regular process of nature, the exponent of God's creation.

Nay, more; this secondary thing, a rubbish of blotches, is perpetually clashing with the good of the first.

There can be no wonder when it ends, having the elements of its own destruction.

The whole world, moral and intellectual, is conscientious in the belief of a great first cause, who must have proper attributes. But a part do not carry out this principle in full.

Millions cannot be sincere in their professions of belief short of God, for they leave all other faith, and their conduct proves their absolute sincerity, and the agreement of that whole faith.

Unity of faith in the eternal first cause, would unite every mind in the bonds of proper affection.

There would be no repugnance of sects, as they could not form themselves into being; their depravity would be apparent, and their antagonism to God most clear.

The scimitar of the Musselman would not have to meet the sword of the Christian, for the crusaders of the last could not point to any tomb but that of mutual enmity, nor would hierarchy in all her varied tyranny of absolutism disguised by siren sophistry, ever seduce the world freed from its sophisticated pretences, its sordid trade, its desecration of sacred things by speculation. There could then be no ruler but God, whose watch-word is unity for all, and no ministry, no mission, but the pure light of mind.

Mind would have credit for construing his attributes, reason for appreciating him, wisdom in the confirmation.

If the peculiar faith-heaven be pure, Deity has full possession of his attributes. Of course the creation of the devil befouls heaven in the quagmire of impiety, and dwarfs the original purity of the Creator who has to be perfect to organize the universe.

If by man's libel, intellect and reason, the proper sentinels would then face Deity with the rankest impiety, contradicting especially the attributes of purity, all his power and knowledge, all goodness and mercy.

That which is worth all the rest, fixed principles, would be of no avail, as a perfect failure is thereby implied in place of a governor affording adequate protection. The polytheist's god, is necessarily imperfect, as we have a creature fallen and degraded, then exalted, to be the eternal rival of his Creator in the seduction of souls! To what will not the corruption of priestocracy lead? To the most consummate contradictions, ineffable, stupid, suicidal destruction of all the principles of reason and logic. No wonder that the peculiar-bible powers that be, expel her on all necessary occasions.

In this bible doctrine, we have two creatures endowed with peculiar powers. Everything is peculiar in this peculiar machinery. Where is the true piety towards God the Creator? Monotheism originates in truth from God, the most elevated views of Deity, when we refer directly to him alone.

That shows a manly spirit and a freeman's duty, and religionist's character.

Where does any other view tend, but to make man a poor menial? Not a freeman nor like an honest man, to face an honest and truthful being, but like an abject petitioner, he demeans himself to mortal, an impostor and a blasphemer. No, never does enlightened mind endowed with reason, take its religion second-handed; never goes to inferior vicegerents convicted of direct imposition by all the laws of nature ever true to her God, mere earthly beings at best, in abject submission to the basest practitioners of false pretences, exclusive of the people from their God, when we can appreciate according to the lights of the age and our intellectual ability, God's attributes.

Sublime is the Creator's greatness by mind, that must reach reason to obtain its greatness in rational religion.

No sound mind can or will dispute this plain proposition.

Sincerity in God's creation must reign, as the test of his attributes. A messiahship, is a substitute most absurd.

The universe and mind are made as God willed, not as botches wish, or as dreamers speculate.

We have hardly begun to rightly estimate the object of creation as wisely directed by God.

Who are the witnesses of the living God? The whole universe appreciated by mind and reason, as clear as the sun beams.

Any other, is false and contemptible, if peculiar.

All the first recognise the universe as proclaiming a great first cause, worthy of all the reverence of creation.

None but a very ignorant, deluded or perverted mind can begin to assert that any bible of tradition can meet the dignity of his attributes.

Cultivated mind has to be employed all its existence, to meet these demands.

It is mind that has to seek that which is worthy of universal esteem, and embrace it with the worthiest affection.

It must be in the acts of all minds that aspire to true rational religion.

The attributes of mind declaring innate elements and capacity of religion for its originator, honor the attributes of that power, and cultivated intellect requires the superseding all arbitrary means that tend to exclude that mighty quality of divine power.

While the sincerely religious minded, with feelings of superior reverence from constitutional organization, are to be duly estimated, at the same time they are to be appropriately enlightened as to the object of that reverence.

Reverence, to be honest, must be orthodox.

If God needs a messiah, then he is only part of a God, and must be inferior to him who aids, that is clear.

No prior occupant, with full fee simple rights, divides titles.

God's creation cannot refer to any higher than himself; if he were not independent of all messiahs and creatures, his creation would be independent of him.

What are the pretensions offered in competition with God?

Those of atheism and polytheism, that is, no God, and several gods or substitutes in man—hero and idol worship.

Who has to take cognizance of these paramount subjects?

Mind, the beneficiary, has to recognise these pretensions. If mind has the function as it has to adopt, it has the undoubted right to discard and reject the same.

How does mind reach the true issue, truth and fact?

At the tribunal of reason, over which God presides.

There can be no other.

If there were no God, the universe could have no conservative principles, and all would be confusion. Therefore, the universe confirms most conclusively the existence of both.

Reason is the only power to prove conclusively that such principles apply universally in order and harmony, refer to the Great First Cause, and command mind to refer to principles and their first great cause.

If there was plurality of gods, the Great First Cause commands them absolutely on his conservative principles, as he is a perfect being, and must have perfect rule.

Messiahships make most foolishly imperfect rule, and are at most analogous to the exploded notions of plurality of gods.

Can any past remnant of peculiar faith, perverted views of superstition, be rightly modified, and made eclectic to religion? That would be most absurd. The attribute of immutability of God forbids it altogether. God's laws are immutable as he is, then they do not and cannot change; but mind changes, and the error is in it. Man should take heed that all such be not libel, knowing the same to be error.

God, as universal, not peculiar, in all his attributes, comprehensive in his universal government, matures his munificent schemes in time, and will carry out for individuals also this last great attribute of mercy.

God alone must be perfectly worthy of adoration and esteem by the whole universe, that he made and sublimely governs; and merits mind's true subjection, in its most profound humility, to his sublime glory.

All the universe could not eradicate the genuine devotion of a rational mind from its Creator.

All the universe could not create a genuine elevation of a rational mind, knowing the true position of things, for any Messiahship.

All the bibles of tradition and peculiar faith manufacture and create so small gods, that rational minds are not satisfied to adore them.

PRAYER.

Come, pure religionist, and indite yourself prayers, that are to be offered up by you, seeking purity at the shrine of purity.

You approach an unchangeable God, who has unchangeable principles and attributes.

If you really seek to effect a change, that assuredly must be in yourself, for there is no need of God's character changing, that is impossible in the present order and harmony of the universe. He is pure and holy. He giveth all practicable blessings desirable to goodness, on universal principles. You surely do not seek to change these.

God reigneth over the universe, and must consider all.

But you are a sectarian warrior, and in battle array with the very banner of a faith, that of itself, if true, must inculcate principles that insure peace and universal friendship, that rebuke you to all eternity.

But, alas! that banner is sectarian, and with all your crosses of Christ, as you are about to engage with your sister that came from the same parent stock of Judaism, which sister of the crescent is about to wield the scimitar, one or the other must be wrong.

God cannot be the author of war, however mythology had war-gods, especially to indicate his own religion, that is indicated by the ennobling triumphs of mind, that respects itself as it honors God's conservative principles.

But your gods invoked are peculiar; then as they are the fictions of your priestocracy, to them belongs all.

You cannot pray to the God of the universe to defend you and the cross or crescent.

What does the God of the universe know of either?

What right have either of you to believe that?

If you of the cross seek a mere sepulchre, that sign to him unfortunately is one of bloody warfare, piracy, and bloodshed.

But if you seek the conquest, as you did of Asia and the world, to prostrate it at the feet of peculiar faith, that victimized its foolish partizans without compunctions of conscience, then assuredly he, as the very author of justice, cannot grant your disgraceful and ignominious petitions.

God knows it not, no more than any other standards.

And here comes the other standard of the crescent, no more holier than its sister, but now carried in the defence of country and fire-side, that if not rightly won from possessors now passed off the stage of life, at least are possessed as rightly as by the ancestors of the very people expelled.

Many a bloody conquest, by Jew and Gentile, had been made alternately of this land before. It was one of the dark and bloody grounds.

The issue, you see, is decided by your address in the hands of justice against you, by a tribunal that respects no mortal, save as they respect conservative laws, that give the firmest action the best prayers.

You may have displayed all heroic valor and dauntless bravery, still the more just the decision then. You were the victim of fanaticism, or of the world's pirates.

But it is reserved for posterity to conquer that country by the light of true faith. Monotheism fights no bloody battles of the sword, as she wields the universal empire of peace.

In what an awkward state is God by the prayers of opposing armies placed, by mind's perversions.

Mind has to retrace all these errors for their correction.

It is the commotion of the world, but serene, no doubt, is the Creator in deciding justice, and all this is done by the agency of principles.

All this comprehension of justice is to reflect for the good of all, and retributive justice will be conspicuous.

National tyranny has remote effects, that come home for many generations. The world's history is full of it, and presents the sublimest philosophy, their correction by rational religion.

You can then commune with God, whose mercy is responsive to merit; and in that you must be particularly correct. You must address principles, pure functions, and attributes, by pure thoughts, words, and deeds, as prayers.

Do we not believe in more than one God?

We cannot possibly, and retain a rational mind.

Why is that belief necessary for polytheism, when God, the God of nature, Creator of the universe, is all powerful, knowing, and existent, with all the full attributes to the universal demands of creation?

His attributes, characterized in bold relief by his works, prove that he alone is the only true God.

All others are counterfeits, and mislead mind.

We now ask you, does thy intellect tell thee that thou shouldst expect justice?

Then do it yourself by just appreciation and its rightful action to the author of justice.

Let not God's eternal principles be monopolized by usurpers, as their thoughts and gifts, when reason decides, and principles are vindicated before God alone.

Do we ask to have truth revealed to us, and neglect the God of truth?

If the world wish to obtain the full benefits of truth and principles, it must speak the first at all times, as disguise and ignominy follow falsehood, and the severest penalty comes for the violation of that and the last. The whole truth and principles are embraced in rational religion.

Man's just actions will protect him from unjust and unwise laws, fanaticism, bigotry, disunion of our country, craftship in its criminal guiles, nominal professions in peculiar faiths that abound for speculation by millions who follow vicegerents that are dead, instead of the ever-living God.

All that believe in God alone, truly possess a correct religious foundation, that if rightly cultivated, may lead to the speediest true happiness. Such actions without pretensions that are perfectly useless, must be worthy of God's regard.

This character is written of God himself in his own writings, as taught by enlightened reason. Will God lead us into temptation? That idea involves a libel of God. God is a perfect being, and will do nothing derogatory to his exalted God-head.

And as to the devil, he has been proved a fiction, an imaginary being, however preachers and priests assume him as part of their indispensable machinery to be an existence, dealing in brimstone, the product of volcanoes, to terrify the timid, to secure successful extortions.

This character involves in the same category his residence, both of which must be ideal.

Eternal and pure adoration is God's the Lord omnipotent who sways the Universe with principles, and regulates all beyond mind's present conception.

He is the essence of true greatness, and his works are his prophets in the wide Universe.

God is the source and fountain of power, which is identified with the Universe, man included.

Mind is obliged to look to him or none.

What can the weak or incapable mortals do? All are nothing before God, who knows our wants, and could only supply them all. His providence was prescient, in conservative principles.

The creation of the Universe presupposes nothing less than God's exclusive mastery.

It is idle to suppose any other plainly mortal, as plainly an after thought of vulgar minds.

God's actions are good and perpetual; the evil of man is finite.

The creator is alone and unapproachable, except through the introduction of correct principles that lead man to his God. All created beings are then alike in this respect, and eternally condemned is all bible tradition. Their innate faculties necessarily refer to their Creator, for if mind had no inherent ideas of a God as taught by his universal works of laudation, elicited by action of mind on mind amid which are bibles of tradition, most imperfect specimens of exploded views, then we might as well say that mind had no existence, no functions, as that we could not get the idea of God from his works, his only sublime scriptures.

Most believe as it is their interest, without due investigation, and assent to a doctrine that there are no means of appreciating God without the bible of tradition in the face of God-proof, which position of itself necessarily cuts down the bibles of tradition, and all the advocates who have worldly speculation and profits therefrom.

But have we creatures any claim on God, to save and preserve us? His prescient and universal providence at creation, answered that question.

We have the highest paramount claims, for the Creator placed us in his creation for his highest purposes, and recognised us at the creation, placing his recognition through religion in all rational mortals as his creatures, we may rightly expect what may be due essential to creation, by knowing what is duty.

We know no one else in this matter, as we can only know God by the creation, and if all give God his due, not make him a demi-god as possessed of part of his attributes, the balance being usurped for another, who proved by his death his mortality and consequent incapacity for them, they cannot possibly divide God's attributes as there is no plurality of gods.

Then we must perpetually look to God alone, the only one that had a hand in our creation, and with whom we can be acquainted.

God is immutable in attributes and functions, with principles capable of sustaining them, his powers, creation, and the Universe.

This faith is vital and rational, or else the God of the whole is below his creation, an absurdity that is criminal.

Rational mind may be beset with numerous temptations, but in its sanity and soundness never can it forget its Creator.

Its protection is mind's all in religious, moral, and intellectual culture, a finished education of that kind.

If God be not the supreme, there will be peculiar results and peculiar faith, which will disorganize the Universe, and demoralize the world results.

There is a supreme retributive power somewhere in the centre, operating to the circumference of space, else the self-decisions of the world would work its end.

WHAT IS GOD'S BIBLE?

His works displayed in the Universe, that impeach and discard the Bible of tradition as paltry and contemptible, that advances all the time peculiar faith, and no true system of religion trustworthy of mind. Can you not easily appreciate why you cannot defend the bible of tradition?

Because it is anti-God, and therefore of perdition, proved by its workers of iniquity.

God's bible proves that religion must embrace the whole range of science and philosophy, as far as all such refers to God and man.

The burning presence of mind's inspiration, towers over the dreamy notions of a mere substitute, or even worse, a counterfeit.

No mortal can put down God's works.

Who would wish to discard any that were right?

Those that are mortal and wrong will put themselves down.

We only seek as good citizens to expose the errors of such, and as all rational minds have more or less the seed of religion, being endowed with its innate elements and principles from their creation, they should have the right direction and instruction to reach the balance. Principles are only needed to do that.

It is for mankind to sustain the severest tests of sense in the Universe, of adversity and prosperity, and remain true to their Creator and themselves, to investigate all this, and to undergo all not only without the least murmur, but with the most appropriate appreciation of Deity's motives, justice, and mercy.

The God of principles, Creator of the Universe, and Preserver of mankind, God of mercy, glory, honor, and happiness to eternity, needs nothing to increase his power, and can permit in justice to his attributes, none to divide it.

It is impiety to suppose God incapable of preserving all of his creatures, or that he needs delegating his power to any who are almost clearly incapable of using it. This attempted reflection on God's character, only impeaches the libeller.

The Creator's honor cannot be put absurdly into the safer keeping of the creature.

Our reverence for Deity is so great, that we cannot permit ourselves to expect a division, much less a delegation of his power.

With no bias of schools, education, uninfluenced by profits of faith, mind must necessarily come to this position, that the great and sublime Creator of the Universe directs all by the sublimest science, and that there is no need of any other than his own Almighty preservation.

Who can affect to dictate against the adoration of God—Deity—whose character is only appreciable by attributes, functions, and principles, that are eminently displayed by his works?

If any bible of tradition be against this moral code, the only rational one of universe-ethics that cannot be overlooked, it well deserves to be discarded.

Why does not the world come at once to the point, about God? Why refuse him his full and proper adoration? Has it strayed too long from his fold for priestocracy? As God he has and can have no deputies, than his conservative principles.

All wise minds of every age of light must know that there is but one God.

What can it avail for more gods to be numbered? Who but the priestocracy is benefited?

One of the worst ideas of mind is, about God's attribute, immutability. It is man that changes, God is not mutable. It is man that pretends to translate God's actions, superseding them by his own feeble dreams and speculations.

Who can confide entirely in any being but in the God of rational religion? All else is made by fiction. What is any other worth? It is not worth the thought used. Is there any other but a partial demi-god divested of God's mighty attributes, impotent in his power and unworthy of reverence of enlightened mind?

Where would be the universe if the Creator were not ruler? The chaos that would ensue is in the mind of those supporting messiahships that are vain enough to claim a part of God's creation, and avaricious enough to speculate on it with the grossest injustice to God.

He that does not reverence God more than mortals, or their idols, mind or hand factured, is necessarily a deceiver, a degraded hypocrite.

God's attributes utterly preclude any copartnership, and necessarily include all religious duty exclusively.

All else is superstition the most stupid, and blasphemy the vilest.

Peculiarity is not the work of God, who delights consistently with his attributes in universality.

The first is man's device that must be referred to the vicious priestocracy, when analysis takes hold of man's actions.

What equity is there in ridding ourselves one moment from the sight of God's unity, whose eternity and uncreated self-existence, are unappreciable to all else that are necessarily creatures in the sight of this immortal, indivisible, the only eternal Being.

Our reverence leads us to the Great Creator of sufficient power.

Man must not in his ignorance undertake to limit God to man's circle and notions, to any absurdity, much less nonsensical sophistry, and still less of blasphemy, merely to get peculiar privileges by priest-works and craft.

Pagans will no longer sacrifice to the sun, seek to keep the holy fire, much less respect rain-doctors, when mind sees the false pretences that exclude the Living Almighty.

God's greatness and self-existence are not derivable, and in him after due investigation of organic truths, our faith is fixed.

God is not aided by others, as messiahships, that are in his way as useless, and must derange his system and position.

People do not begin to conceive of God's majesty. No wonder at their libel and slander in society. When we adopt reason we approach God, who is represented by reason, and is dignified by science and philosophy.

He who acts best on this light and knowledge, has religious cultivation becoming rational mind.

The Creator can do all necessary for his creation of himself, as he is self-existent. This self-existence proves his self-independence and sufficiency.

But what shall we do for the regeneration of man's nature?

None but God can renovate man's nature, and he is bringing it about in the process of civilization, science and philosophy.

So much for the world's charlatans, who assume the province of the God of Nature.

In this messiahs are nowhere, are out of place, as they do not deal in science and philosophy which were essential to our God's creation. Of course neither mind nor God want them at all.

The renovation consists in man's rightful actions, his life time. Thus messiahs cannot avail, in correction of man's nature.

As God is immutable and invariable, he is almighty. Who is to ride in the mighty tempest storm-cloud, and direct it properly, but he that rules all elements?

If vital principles be violated, we are burned, drowned, die or suffer physically.

We suffer the penalties of violating moral laws. Who can escape them, or rather, the Omnipresence of God?

We can be nowhere, that God is not; we can do nothing unknown to God.

Time is the gift of mind, that it prepares for eternity, by the wisest recognition of all God's institutions of the universe.

Let not God be robbed of any of his attributes, to be dwarfed a part of a God in his own universe, the result of his own genius and wisdom.

To know God, which we can only do by his works read by the science of philosophy, is to reverence him supremely.

Light and knowledge beget rectitude, that begets bliss. Whoever abrogates one part of God's unity, power or dominion, does as much for the creature's love, respect and reverence for God.

God would be imperfect, if he did not preserve mankind, after creating them by his Omnipotence in truth, not sophistry.

The wisest and perfect provision goes with wise Providence, that the Messiah-mongers belittle for God through their inefficient policy, as if God was to be troubled all his time with eternal labor about one world, when his universe, that is exhaustless, embraces all needful conservative principles. They act sublimely God's to the exclusion of Messiah's fortune, fate and destiny, by their order, direction and efficiency.

The inherent laws of matter, bespeak the Great God and an Omnipotent Providence.

The Supreme Being has all the time of vital existence, an overweaning influence in the universe, in regulating the conservative principles that characterize him an Almighty.

God's immutability is proved by his fixed, immutable conservative laws of the universe, that the wise see, and that position proves that miracles are impositions. Science of mind makes sad inroads into the bibles of tradition.

God's time disproves all prophecies, and these two facts proved beyond cavil, destroy all bible mysteries as impositions.

Man's libels of God must so recoil on himself, as to cause the modest to blush, and the presumptuous to be silent in works beyond their comprehension.

The bible of Moses libels the character of God, in making a space beyond reason for the postponement of man's creation, losing an amount of time of vast importance to creation.

The unity of God is one of his greatest attributes, and declares to the world that all polytheisms are a combination against the world's benefit, talents and truth, to secure advantage ground for superstition and man worship.

God has his own way of reaching the mind of rational beings, by light of science and morals.

To prove miracles, &c., militates entirely against God's attributes.

God is not the author of the evil on earth, that man's libel declares, when man's action accuses man.

All tuition must refer to God, the author of principles, that radiate and influence all the circles of the universe.

His sovereign power supersedes all.

What but most imperfect appreciation of Deity's attributes could have devised angels and messiahs as messengers and agents, instead of obvious conservative principles?

Any order of spirits of beatific beings is identified with another state of existence, and clearly incompatible with ours.

A rational reliance on the noble attributes, functions and principles of the Creator will best perfect rational mind.

His works are his ever-living witnesses, with all harmony in the microscopic and telescopic universe.

God is a perfect Creator, but tradition bible writers, as bungling botches, have caricatured him. God never created original sin, the negative of good actions. The future penalty may be, negative enjoyment compared with the good.

None are perfect but God, a holy being, with functions, attributes and principles indivisible and identified, and mind has no innate inherent elements of ideas of any other, especially a mere creature.

Too many minds cling to obsolete ideas, made so by exact science, of no existence and actually feigned, but they actually contend not for these brainless phantoms, as much as the self-interests of designing priests. Sinister policies, under all names, may mislead and pervert mind unless it ever decides all questions on the only safe, which is the only rational basis. As the patriot freeman looks to his government, so much more all are to respect and adore their Creator. The idea of God alone meets all the immensity of creation, shows proper purity to do away with the terrors of hell, the machinations of the devil, as all fabulous and inconsistent, promotive of the delusion of mind by the machinery of the ignoble priesthood, who are not needed, if God alone do his own work: and here is proved most conclusively the vast difference between God and man. Ignorant and perverted man has to invoke the aid of messiahships, whilst God's works of the universe prove him, and only him, the Creator. So much for man's libels and stupidity. The perfection of God is beyond earthly appreciation.

His universe without limits, with all its beauties and principles of admirable character, elaborated in all the finish and skill of exact philosophical science, no doubt is everlasting. Much more, then, is the soul immortal, the greatest of all creation, cherished in the bosom of its Divine Creator.

God, as the Creator and President of the universe, must preserve all as his family.

He cannot admit any pretended adjutant that had no hand in this creation the important part, without derogating from his own respectability before the universe.

After all mind's best attainments in science, it knows but little if it knows not God and God's rights. If it knows not God's rights, it cannot know God's attributes. Mind, that knows enough to do full duty to God, is in the safest position of all. We must give to God alone the sole glory and merit of his principles, without which the universe could not move, and by which man exists and has his being. From God, the policy and principle, attribute and function of kindness, goodness and mercy emanate, and by him sympathy that unites mind to him is universal. God is infinitely wise and immutable. What advances the peculiar faith power, but utter and reckless ignorance of God's attributes and character?

All creation is led most certainly to Deity the Creator, beyond whom, as worthy of the sublimest adoration, none can go. This is conspicuous, and should have silenced blasphemers of messiahships, unless most stupid, as to what their sublime duty was.

The more difficult to create, the more worthy of adoration is the creative Intelligent Power, and the more is God self-proved. Philosophical science is to conduct us through creation in its analysis; all that reject her must be degraded. How insignificant, how degraded is faith without reason by her side, and the light of knowlege in her path. Our senses alone can recognise the facts of nature, and they are best disciplined by science. The senses giving intelligence rise above nature, and have his attributes innate and refulgent with beams of irradiation to the universe.

The attributes of God are purity, that prevents the devil-creation, omnipotence that prevents any vicegerent, almighty that supersedes priestocracies, and all their fancy corrupt stock of angel messengers, by conservative principles. People cannot analyze, else they would not commit themselves so seriously in impiety and blasphemy. Reverence to Deity will not permit all such. Duty to man, sinful and helpless in his ignorance, will not permit us to leave an omission of his proper protection. This is the highest as the purest ground of conservatism moral and intellectual, that does not leave its votary at sea without chart or compass, but still higher in the purest religion practicable, the most exalted duty and action.

On the true and essential merits of this vital soul-question, we must look into matters and the nature of things, where all the difficulties and their remedies lie.

Deity should be ever honored in thought, word and deed.

All should tell most concisely to the point.

Principles as liberal as the age requires must be advanced, to do full justice to Deity.

Sin cannot begin to reach heaven if that be the great centre of purity. By what standard of perfection can you try mind, but by the God of nature?

You are indebted for constant grace to God as to his bounties in existence, and your action in all such is as much a part of your religious as moral and physical existence.

If God be not your friend, who is or can be? Do not libel him. A reliance upon God's attributes prevents us from believing that the elements will melt with fervent heat. It is true God can create and destroy, but he is supremely consistent with himself. He is immutable and perfect, and cannot be aided by messiahs nor priestocracies that libel him by such false pretences. The great improvement of the world shows the exhaustless grace of the Creator.

We adore the God of the universe, and ask only his purest blessings compatibly with our merits.

Who gives grace, but the Creator of all mind and grace?

God is best served when best appreciated. Mind is bettered by the gift of God. The Almighty saves. The only peace is a right appreciation. The grace of God alone can reconcile all men to their lot, and to each other.

When that abounds enemies cannot be made, and where principles are obeyed, persecutions for peculiar faith must die out.

God's grace upholds us. In this sphere of existence, there is much speculation in peculiar faith, by which the world would be overrun, but for God's grace or principles. How shall we estimate God's blessed abode? Not by the name of heaven, a most imperfect conception, but the great centre of the universe, where purity and perfection are permanent. What consummate libels are met with in the bible! How much is pretended about God's wrath. Now, his mind is so balanced, his intellect so omniscient and his power so almighty, that it is any thing else but his wrath. This is the old tale of pagan superstition, and the bible is pagan. There is no sectarian dispensations or covenant that fulfils the design of mind, the demands of the world, or the obligations of the universe, as God alone in sublime science rules all in his majesty. With God dwell infinite knowledge, power, goodness, justice, mercy, love and perfection. You must not mar nor judge the world by your standard, as your education as one of the billion may be peculiar. There is only one standard in the universe, the Almighty, who conclusively, by the organization of the universe, presides in all its solar systems. What is the universal standard of truth, faith, reason, in a word, of mind? God the Creator, whom all rational minds must appreciate from the works of the universe as the centre of perfection, whose influence extends to the circumference, whose attributes, functions and principles are perfect.

But then all rational minds emanating from him, ought to be perfect. Their purpose is final perfection without doubt. Is not this full proof of the immortality of the soul?

But all things emanating from God should be perfect. Why are they not so as far as practicable, and in the nature of circumstances?

They are as God created them. To pretend that mind fell, is a libel on both. Who can give grace or mercy universal, in other words, conservative principles, but the universal author of these attributes and mind? The God of nature, and the god and devil of Judaism and christianity, are two separate existences; the first is the universal Creator, the last two are peculiar creations.

As God of the universe was most certainly never known to either of the aforesaid, the peculiar God's creation belongs exclusively to these discoverers. No enlightened mind disputes their rights, as they are exclusive.

There can be but one Creator, who as omnipresent, fills all space and time, and excludes all others necessarily. God would hardly occupy space with a hell, when his attributes could be better universally glorified. God's attribute of goodness, irradiates his creation. As there can be but one Creator, the peculiar God of Judaism is a fiction, and all its machinery necessarily falls, whether built up at that or subsequent time. This is the most certain and definite logic, unmistakably certain.

Principles are the avengers of God, throughout the universe. Define who God is. It takes the whole universe that exhibits his functions, attributes and principles, to comprehend that definition. We are obliged to take the decision of rational mind on rational data about God, not mere public opinion nor prejudices.

How has Deity emanated? He is in relation to this universe, its great first cause, and that relative emanation utterly precludes by want of data, any investigation of mind, his creation. Humility and confidence unite in his adoration.

God has not only perfect omniscience, wisdom and goodness, but he has purity, perfection and immutability. If we cannot reach the God of nature in systems, we must go as near him as practicable.

God is so perfect that he does not create evil, but good, the negative of which is evil. Is this attributable to God or man? The nearer right the world is, the least evil it has.

God does not require of us impossibilities; he does not make us responsible for our minds not reaching a perfect state here, while severe penalties, the evils for natural laws violated, prove the necessity of our proper action.

There must be not only the wisest world-legislation, and the wisest execution of those laws, but the wisest and purest self-government, to escape sin as an evil, the negative of good. God's character is the very reverse of peculiarity, for it is universality. It is very reasonable that you should construe Deity's attributes aright, when you, unjust complainer, become his libeller.

Some croakers are ever murmuring, not able to be grateful to God, to improve on mind's defects.

In seeking the legitimate treasures of the earth and immortality, we will see that only one God supreme can be admitted, and that all others are unequal and unnecessary.

In taking proper thought for all such things necessary, we perceive most clearly that all the conceptions of the ancients fell far short of just appreciation of Deity's attributes and conservative principles.

Universal creation gives mind the highest appreciation of Deity's attributes, and this supreme respect engenders the most profound love for that creation-author, and the most comprehensive brotherhood of man, surpassing all the vain imaginations of pretended bibles. You can have unbounded confidence in God. The spirit and principle of soul-existence, are love to God and man, that creates religion and universal brotherhood.

How can you ungratefully overlook, stupidly not perceive the redeeming qualities of preservation in your immortal Creator? This power that was so perfectly performed for thousands of years before priestocracy and messiahship, now to be crushed by their ignoble pretences! We adore the God that created our forefathers, not such a peculiar being as they in their imperfect science conceived of. As to love to God, the soul could not keep from it, as it has in its deepest humility, unbounded confidence in the Creator. What best teaches humility? The idea of a supreme God so almighty, as to exclude messiahship. So transcendent in his existence, as to estop the most brilliant mind at that point. But is not the difference too great, between God and mind, without intermediates? Is not God the Creator of mind? Why then ask such a question, as conservation is implied in creation. That question implies false delicacy and position. Besides, what difference is there in a mediator made by the fiction of man, and man himself? What virtue in such? We do not understand the art to elicit, the art of this world to trace effect to the cause that depends on us, as there is the latent cause in this universe of cause and effect, up to the great First Cause.

Man should be modest, wait for gradual development of mind to irradiate mind. One idea will illustrate the whole circle. Conscience, principle, soul and religion, all refer to the only Supreme standard, the great first cause. Christ could be no fixed standard; his mortality forbade that. How comes it that the God of creation is libeled as peculiar, when his every characteristic is universal? The mind of man can hardly appreciate his universality, as diffusive enough. The greatness of the Almighty decides his own character, and vindicates his unity by philosophical science and the facts of truth. None can usurp his prerogatives which are exclusive, unless the dupes are victimized and stultified by pious frauds. We must do justice to the supreme God of nature, in yielding him all the homage of an Almighty, competent for preservation of his creation; all else is evanescent.

Rational appreciation of God's works. creates rational love to him.

We look through nature to nature's God, through love to the God of love, who has transcendent grace.

To know what God himself has promised, consult his only scriptures, his works, his book forever fresh and flourishing the universe. The world is one of the cabinets of Deity. God is at once perfect. The universe is a demonstration that tradition-bibles are a libel on God. Rational mind has to be irradiated in the mighty circle of the universe.

If God were deficient in the least conservation, he would thereby be at once characterized as imperfect, and perfection would not be his attribute. Thus preachers and priests do not know what they are talking of, when they advocate messiahship, for that very word personifies God's imperfection.

So far from reason ever being rejected, that her highest efforts through discipline of experience, is indispensable to investigate most sincerely God's attributes.

The unity of God alone is for universal brotherhood; God is displayed in his sublime universe, and reflected by the mirror of science in the face of truth.

After all the false pretences of substitutes, who can appreciate all the preventions of injury in the conservation of Almighty Providence? That respects the moral as physical, the whole?

What mighty powers of periodical regeneration of nature.

God organized creation with the sublimest conception and wisest design that exalts all the time, not degrades the world. True faith must prevent the adoption of peculiar faith, looking to God, we cannot look below him to any pretender, impostor, messiah, nor can mind look above him.

The highest appreciation begets the highest adoration, purest of God's character, who performed the greatest elaboration in the creation, organization and conservation of the universe. When God spoke creation into existence, this was the intellectual, moral, and religious sublime, worthy of the God of nature. His whole work that we see, seems to have been finished. His principles are at work. Prophecy, his agent, time reveals, whose secrets philosophical science discloses.

Pray for others, says the priestocracy. Divide no affection, give the whole love and adoration that spontaneously arise from the sublimest conception of God's holy character and attributes. The self-righteous, say the priestocracy. Who but you are in this category? Who authorized you to act for us? Attend to your case by the best acts of your mind; you have no more grace than you can spare for yourself. Are your thoughts purer by divine excellence than those of others? Prove it. Actions concentrate words and thoughts. Have you a superior claim before us, provable? The foresight in creation of the rightful creation of this world in being saved without the loss of blood and life of a Savior, argues a perfect Deity, surely. Had such a Savior been necessary, the Creator had been imperfect. The matters of God are not abstractions.

Did the Creator possess the full and entire sovereignty over the Universe? Of course. Did he part with it by necessity? That decides the imperfection of God. Of what benefit was it to any less than God, if God himself was imbecile? But if not imbecile, of course he must have held to all his creative power. If the successor could do more, he could create and thus he becomes the creator himself, and that position conclusively proves his supremacy. But brought into the world by the function of procreation, his function could not be creation as his acts prove and confirm, hence we can only recognise one great Supreme, to whom all creation is subordinate. Of course there is but one limit and that at God, beyond whom this Universe cannot go, and this decides his supreme sublimity and grandeur.

God does not manifest himself in person, but is recognised through his works that are read by mind recognising science. What better proof can be given to each human being, than this position? Is there any honorable proof, that any person ever saw him the world's age? Must he be reviled as skeptic, because he asks for demonstration and proof conclusive on this essential point? Mind as honorable can asks for nothing less, and can yield nothing less if aught beyond it is demanded. As to all God's law and principles that are for mind, they are there still, not taken away or added to at all by any sectarian, for God gave them preservation. It is impossible that there can be in the nature of things, any other revelation of God than what he has given in the Universe. It is impious blasphemy to ask for more than the illustrious works of the Creator. The preservation of universal order, attests universal Providence.

The God of the Universe gave the world a greater munificence in its totality, and so of all its parts. Countries and people, the world and mankind, are cursed in any peculiar faith.

How do you reach the idea of the Almighty? Through mind out of his own magnificent Universe, and nothing less can represent him.

To not finally know God, the Creator, is not to know much of the Universe! That is not Monotheism.

Between God and man are principles. Did Christ originate any others? No; then he cannot supersede them. The most amiable idea we can have of the Almighty is, that his grace is universally, not specially diffused and effectual on merits of mind, without the taint of blood and murder.

The most appropriate name is the Great First Cause. We see the humbugs of the world nurtured by pretended revelation or atheism, that would be exploded by cause and effect arguments.

What truth has Moses for his narration, in the position of the earth? The polytheist and atheist who are the only ones besides the Monotheist, maintain a position of sophistry. Both stand on false data and premises. How can that of either be morals or religion, where there is no truth? The unity of design in the Universe, convicts both. This Universe is referable to cause and effect.

The atheist should comprehend all final or elementary causes, ere he disputes the First Great Cause. Their assumptions about the beginning of creation, will profit them nothing in the principles of causation. As candid, honest, and truthful people, they had better acknowledge their defect and inconsistency in all such premises, and as good and true citizens of the world, aid the Monotheist in the only tenable and upright position. The unity and preservation in creation, sufficiently answer both most conclusively. How absurd the idea with some sophists or their vassals, that if we admit the existence of God, we must also admit that of Christ. The last is in direct antagonism with, and detracts from God. God is perfect and needs no Christ's aid. The priestocracy needs the aid of such machinery, and they instituted all such for their especial peculiar benefit. But the sovereign people, not the priestocracy, God not Christ, are the source of delegated or original power, therefore truth, not faith, religion, not peculiar bibles, are to prevail.

The whole category of Christ, priestocracy, &c., keeps God out of view. What must be the magnificence of God's perfection? The Universe is an ever-present constant proof of its God, and that excludes all contingents as Messiahs alien to this principle. Infidels! who are they? not those who believe in the God of the Universe, in the oldest, the purest correct—the only faith. I advocate the supremacy of the unity of the God of the Universe, of religion that defers to that paramount obligation, constitutional liberty and rights of the world. God has given us a bible that Moses did not read, that excludes him, Christ, Mahomet, Smith, and all the functionaries of peculiar faiths, that yet admits them on the principles of mind. The difference between atheists, maniacs, and polytheists, is this, that the second cannot use their mind rationally, the first renounce the right use, and the last fall short of the rational use. The fault is, as to the mind of all.

What enables mind to do best on earth? Monotheism, directed by the wisest Creator. Man can never appreciate God through peculiar bibles, much less pretend to correct one iota of what he has done. Man's dispensations dispense man's extreme follies.

By what mighty intelligence and power has God arranged the universal cabinet of Nature—placed in the bosom of the earth the seeds of vegetable matter, plants and trees, preserve them for countless ages free from decay and exempt from vegetation, by non-exposure to the atmosphere, and the process of heat and light of the sun? The God that I believe in, cannot be libelled—by man. He is not in favor of priestocracy, when the last are a set of hypocrites. He never ordered miracles, prophecies, mysteries, nor repudiation of honest debts, when an honest, truthful perfection of his works, only honor him. He has no counterfeits.

The principles of causation, of cause and effect, unmistakably and absolutely lead mind to the Great First Cause, that necessarily excludes atheists and polytheists. Which of these two has the most perverted and ignorant mind? We must have most imperfect views of Deity to suppose him a perfect being, and for him to leave others to perform his functions! His principles do that. Both he and they are unchangeable. How can man think of addressing him, for the purpose of change? Man does it from the imperfect views of peculiar bibles. It is really opprobrious that God who created the Universe, exclusively as the Great First Cause, also mind and religion, is not paid by man, exclusive adoration. The wisest legislation emphatically follows the wisest appreciation of Deity, as all produce the best religion. The laws of nature if made right, are the ones to govern man rightly, most easily and successfully. How many things are there in the world, if we look at cause and effect rightly, to remind us of our duty. What a mighty contemplation of God Almighty, who towers above all ideas in the creation of principles and the Universe. How sublime the thought. The mighty unity of design, that none could ever carry out but the supreme majesty and unity of God.

The world has to go wholly for the unity of God.

Who can dare say, that God ever created an evil?

Who will libel him, and stultify his own brain?

The conversion of mind, is not without the spirit of God. That is exclusively alone effectual, and proves the unity of God. What would the world—the Universe—be, without the spirit, the soul of the Creator, all the time? All the religion that Christianity and all peculiar faith has, is from this source. All else is not religion. As to peculiar faith bibles, they all can be dispensed with all the time, but mind and rationality that gives the only legitimate purification to mind, must be upheld as God-gifts to the Universe. They embrace nothing short of refined rational education. How can the whole world be converted, but by pure rationality on rational education?

Such must bestow genteel, refined, gentlemanly, individual, rational world-feelings. For rationality to do justice, rational mind must be purely exempt from the malign influences of peculiar education. I cannot think that God ever created an absolute evil, as he is too perfectly pure and holy. The beginning of man is proved by the book of geology, that proves man the last of creation, the highest order. The more mind's intelligence increases, the more the Universe expands into greatness. Shall the conservative principles of the Universe be in abeyance to man's notions, ignorance, and prejudice? God instituted conservative principles for the Universe, mind, and body, and now whether polytheist, monotheist, or atheist, all the orders of faith that can exist, unless we blend the atheist and polytheist, and have only two in reality, have to adopt these principles. The polytheist has actually traded on this capital, and most ungratefully denied the true faith.

If the world assume that the sun or Nature causes all things that we see, it puts the effect for the cause, and stops very far short of all that is comprehensive. In regard to original sin bringing death into the world, it is perfectly ridiculous if we wisely and justly regard the objects of creation, the mighty functions of reproduction that would unquestionably cause mankind to overrun the whole platform of the earth's surface, if there was not a rational limit, that is, death. Creation would not stop reproduction, under its present position. All that about sin and death, is perfect legend. Preachers ought to stop all such.

Whence originate all mind, and all holiness of mind or soul, but from God, whose exclusive unity consecrates it and renders it most effectual by his divine grace? As to being prepared otherwise, is to get more and more unprepared. All this investigation leads us unmistakably to a supreme divine power, pre-eminently dignified in wisdom and consecrated in holiness, the appropriate standard for mind.

PROOF OF A GOD OF NATURE.

Let Aristotle, Xenophanes, Epicurus, &c., assert all matter to be eternal, still, as system and order are paramount, and principles are conservative in the universe, that universe is ruled by a Great First Cause, into whose Almighty authority all rational beings, duly impressed with his worthiness of supreme adoration, must, with humility and confidence, resign themselves.

By order, system, and organization the universe exists; without them, there is no universe.

He who is the limit of mind, causes mind to pay its most deferential respect to himself, the only standard.

Friendship, originated by such lofty intelligence, becomes the most exalted love, the more cemented on principles, that exclude all atheism and polytheism, however disguised by priestocracies, hosts, and trinities peculiar.

Philosophical science enables mind to prove our solar system, the order and regulation of that system; and enables us to embrace all systems of the universe, and its God, or Great First Cause, that originated, organized, and rules that system of systems, the universe.

The original of motion must have been eternal, and could only have rested in the Supreme alone, and thereby proves him the Almighty to a moral and religious certainty. What must have been the Almighty, to have created the universe!

The world reads, through philosophical science, the language of nature, that is universal and discloses her God; whereas books of tradition are those of men varying in sense and diversified in language, liable to misrepresentations, misrecords, mistranslations, and woful corrupt misconstructions, unsuited to mind as less exact in science.

Principles alone can elevate mind, the want of them alone degrade it. The bible of mind alone can impart those that hold mind on a balance and reputation of character at par.

The mind never can stop short of the Great First Cause, however defeated by priestocracies, with their sophistries and their superstitions, and above all by their polytheisms. Why not declare at once a Supreme First Cause in nature? That is relative only and only his exponent. Beyond the Supreme all is speculation, there mind is compelled to stop, where religion decides supreme duty due to the Supreme Creator.

Forethought will decide for us, that there is a God of nature, as nature only presents at best the elements. God is the prime mover, is the soul of motion, power, and intelligence.

Enlightened public opinion outruns book-knowledge in time, how absurd then was it to book by tradition God's word, that it takes the whole universe to contain.

The God that made our fathers is a different Being from any ever dreamed of in polytheism, however peculiar. The God of nature is a unit, sublime beyond the conception of priestocracies, who are ever distanced in all their ignoble attempts at their caricature of Deity. God stands alone intact, by all the vulgar priestocracies, the most corrupt of all dynasties.

The best of the ancients were ignorant of any responsible system of science, that explained the position of our solar system, much less that of the universe.

What miserable systems of the solar system were advanced! Tycho Brahe reversed the most correct view of our solar system, to suit the ignorance of the priestocracy's bible.

What did Moses, and all such priests, know of true science?

This is enough to humble the pride of sophists and dogmatists, and teach mind humility and an entire dependence on the God of nature, whose works alone can teach his attributes. All the bibles of tradition remove the mind farther from correct views of God. Modesty, humility and justice will make for mind its proper sphere.

The ancients were dogmatists, atheist, and polytheists, and of course had but little philosophical science, and could not appreciate Deity.

The facilities of the present age present a noble advance and progress of mind; enable mankind to become rationalists; remove atheism, polytheism, or any of its disguises as trinity; peculiar gods for peculiar people, with all the peculiar accompaniments of peculiar priestocracies; infidelity to God, reason, mind, principles, or any of their attributes.

God is distinguished by attributes, functions, and principles, among which is truth.

God cannot lie and be God. He cannot create and not preserve. Both powers are one and indivisible, embraced in unity, rejecting trinity. Preservation and conservation are identified with creation.

Creation must have had a beginning by the Creator eternal. This mightiest question is only partially solved. The very admission of the word universe, that none can deny with rational mind, discloses order, that premises organization of a sublime intelligence, characterized by the best attributes of supreme power and wisdom.

We infer most conclusively, by rational induction, these noble attributes. When we speak of nature we speak of the order resulting on matter by conservative principles. Matter organized is what we see of nature.

Who is the Supreme Organizer? Religion and morals refer again to supreme intelligence.

Matter alone could not form mind, that evidently needs morals and religion for self-preservation.

To say, that as the ancients could not appreciate God, that mind could not, is foolish in the extreme. The ancients could not begin to appreciate the system of systems—the universe; the moderns have only begun to do so.

Mind is on the progress of improvement.

Reason is the highest exercise of our mental faculties, and the more enlightened reason by exact science, the nearer we approach the God of reason.

All creation looks to the principles of causation. It is the right direction of motion, that rules the spheres of the universe, and that must rule the ratiocination of causation, and the attributes of matter, as mind takes precedence of matter.

God is an infinitely wise being, and self-existent.

The universe is infinite and uncomprehended by man, but God the mover, directing motion, is the comprehender, so much more above man, Almighty and Omnipotent God only asks the audition of reason, and if all the priests and teachers of polytheism were put down, then he would be truly adored.

The manifest proof of God is by his works universal, physical, moral, and religious.

Partial reason, under the pretence of faith, seeks the Creator in insignificance, and itself in blasphemy.

The Great First Cause is only known to us; we can grasp no secondary or satellite, that is totally inadmissible by the word and signification of Almighty.

There reason commences, in the universe.

The other volume for eternity has not been read, and therefore we must be silent in truth.

The universe involves processes, that involve principles wherever order and system are involved.

Neither atheism can detract from the Author, nor can polytheism add to him. These are the dangerous errors of the day.

The universal organization and order of the universe compel us creatures to eternal silence.

This is a sublime contemplation to the religionist, the rationalist.

The universe is a mighty constituency of solar systems, whose constitution was due to the originating power, to whom all creation looks as a perfect being, the fountain of all intelligence and power, the Great First Cause, the God of the universe, who is as much above the God of Judaism as the universe exceeds the little peculiar spot, Palestine.

Animated nature was created by its God, and could not have existed or been sustained and preserved independent of creative intelligence, almighty power.

As to the God of nature, we can only trace to him; and having no more data, are compelled to stop as all, with the direction of motion and creation.

It might be vain speculation to attempt more; we could not with propriety do less.

Nothing less than an Almighty could have ruled nature by systems, regulated by conservative systems that vindicate themselves and protect the spheres of solar systems, and those systems in one exhaustless universe.

Violate the principles of gravitation, and your fall proves the irresistible conclusion.

Human vitality can be injured and finally destroyed by fire, water, hanging, cutting chief arteries, poisons, mental disturbances, strangling; over these preside principles that represent Deity, who requires the full dignity of rational religion. The God of nature can be only represented by the inherent principles of nature.

They are the circumstances of created rational beings, who have to conform to them by free agency of mind.

The God of the universe has been libeled by atheists and polytheists—equally bad, by priests and messiahs-mongers awfully and blasphemously. Can you define God, the Almighty, who spoke nature into the creation of a universe?

What mortal can define the universe, a necessary preliminary? Let its matter be infinite as much as you choose, have prior motion and time its consequent, still the universe that embraces that matter is all regulated by system and order, which were necessarily directed by supreme intelligence. There can be no atheist nor polytheist if their mind be sound, honest, and truthful. The universe may have had a universe of difficulties, then the more a God that triumphs over all.

God can claim exclusive paternity as self-existent to his works, and full almighty capacity for their preservation. All the bible-of-tradition-mongers never understood God's works or attributes, else they could not have committed themselves to so awful a falsehood about God's universe preservation. If the Almighty Creator was not the Savior, who then was the Creator?

Be silent, then, ye degraded monsters of iniquity.

We approach the God of nature, and are duly humbled into supreme adoration of such adorable majesty.

We mortals have to ask of God another set of mental organs and data to reach him, much less proceed beyond him, whom we must style the Regulator of the universe, be the disordered elements in ever so great confusion and chaos. The name of Universe Regulator, then, surpasses Jehovah, or its prototype, Jupiter.

But do you back out from rational discussion, that involves legitimately the comprehension of the whole subject as found in the universe? So far from religious men avoiding rational discussion, they will seek it, and be indebted therefor for light and freedom of mind.

Providence is truly divine. Let no human being presume to be divine, nor desecrate the idea. How can he aspire to be saint, prophet, miracle or mystery performer, or expounder. This is not a question of bluster or boast; it is one of constant truth. It is the old regime of the priestocracy, often changed and varied in a new dress, but the substance is the same.

Need you ask about God's government, when you see how retributive justice follows in the wake of self-vindicating principles. Do you see in the western wilds and solitudes of America the reckless character calling himself a man, wantonly destroy a poor old Indian woman, a sex that his strong arm should have protected? He prides himself in the power of his right arm, and the supposed strength of his party, his friends, his father, who helped to corrupt his morals and deprave his religion, from being rational. But see him arrested by the Indians, who seek the most summary vengeance, and compel this party to stand and see it. Principles had availed, but justice now is executed. This wanton wretch has aroused and maddened the sons of the forest, and they flay him alive.

See the reckless bully in Texas, that murders as an assassin and resorts to a judge, to compel him to a mock trial, that he may stand ostensibly and nominally clear before his country.

That wretch there meets with summary vengeance, and atones with his life for all his misdeeds. Enough of similar instances could have been recited.

What is the proof of God, the great first cause?

The whole universe, that is all effect and cause.

To know what the universe is, mind must seek its proper analysis. All have a comprehensive adaptation, with design. What a diversity in nature, yet all promotive of one universal order.

The Creator's display is throughout creation by a diversity as rich, as design is demonstrable. This diversity is universal. The Almighty paints with light, writes with electricity, orbs his handiwork, the universe his system, with principles for conservation, and attributes for character. Law pre-supposes intelligence. We have direct proof of a God-presiding Providence, by the present operations of the universe.

All creation may look common after familiarity has been established, but all are on sublime conceptions of intellectual grandeur and system of principles. But the caviller objects that the distribution of this world's goods and possessions is most unequal, that many are wealthy and possessed of great if not unlimited power, whilst the reverse obtains with others. How many are worthy by dint of mind's merits, if not, matters soon return to their level. Your cavil reaches mind's vitiated perversions. The wealth of the father is soon squandered by the prodigal son, for others that may be meritorious to accumulate in the process of legitimate business, not of avaricious cupidity. All this proves defect in mind's operations. To scan all rightly, mind must understand all rightly. What blessings are oceans and seas, yet what robberies, piracies, murders and wars, may have been perpetrated on all, yet how many have been prevented by even the Mediterranean sea. To say that God authorizes such, is to libel him as the cause of evil. This is a world, not the universe scanned; contracted views will not do. Where are the potency, the innocence of mind, its sublime satisfaction and happiness? That must master all the elements of its circumstances, to carry out the principles of moral free agency, to their legitimate comprehension, to expel despotism in all its mind invasions. All the balance is but as the proof test of its character, triumph and glory.

God's omnipresence, omniscience and omnipotence, are as manifest as mind's functions are recognised in the body of man. Mind's functions have to subdue all the vicious elements of its perversion How do we know there is God Almighty? If we could not know any other way, we could not mistake him in ruling out all false gods, Messiahs, Christs, Bhudds, Mahomets, Moses, Smiths, Tinkers and Botches, Priestocracies and all polytheists and atheists, witches, ghosts, spirits, knockers, Millers, affiliated oracles, all the world-tribe legion, though they be Belial in character and what not in blasphemy, by the potency of his word—his work, cause and effect, that define him unmistakably to be the Great First Cause, and all others caused or created. Obey the voice of science, mind—real light of God alone.

All the bigots and their nefarious inquisitions have not prevented mind from reading God's word and works. How vain are the impotent, silly despots, coxcombs! Let the world be no more on contingencies. Have supposed great minds of the world overlooked God's scriptures, and acted the sycophants to man's? Then that proves them the greater traitors to mind. They are the real Judas Iscariots in the world's toryism and toadyism, caterers to absolutists and priestocracies, when they vitiated their excellent gift, mind. Play not false to your country, constitutional government, freedom, law, order, for the whole world. No matter what position the christian, mahommedan, mormon, or any other peculiar faith takes, they all kill themselves the very moment they lay a foundation in their bibles. Rational education enables mankind to avail themselves of the principles conservative of the universe given to rational mind, but not used by the ancient fathers. There are some persons, I trust, that hold bibles in abeyance, that they may honor themselves in the right supremacy. How much of the world at their own arbitration acquiesces in what is before it, without seeking to correct or make better, palpable errors.

The ministry of the universe address mind, as long as thought can be exercised. The proper study of all life's comprehension, presents a few world-problems for mankind to solve. There is but one proper way to solve them. Are you the adorer of the Almighty Creator, or the worshipper of a created, peculiar idol god? Choose ye this day whom ye will. If you be of the first, you are to all honorable persons a monotheist conclusively; if of the second, you are decidedly a polytheist, an idolator, irredeemably—irrevocably, by your own special providence, the acts of your own predestination, revoking most ungratefully your own God-given free moral agency. All should render the earth as attractive as practicable. Cease, polytheists and atheists, you vipers bite a file when you meddle with monotheism. In your existence you cannot touch one iota of it. Why do persons commit themselves to these two, atheism and polytheism? They must be seduced by the partizans without investigation. Their object embraces so much, that mystifies weak or credulous minds. Prosciption and ostracism in all the forms of despotism, have been in array for polytheism, perverting mind, bullying the world, robbing, pirating upon it. By the free moral agency of mind, God makes himself the modest President of the universe. There is now no reason for vain man to be more on earth, at the very height of his power and greatness. The very idea of peculiarity in God libels justice. God is not a just God, if peculiar. He is not omnipresent by the bible, as the Devil was his successful rival in his absence. As to monotheism, with all their effrontery the unprincipled opposition cannot say the first word or thing in truth againt it. Cause and effect rule out atheism and polytheism. A spiritual being, however etherealized, must be appreciated by its substance.

Atheism presents a headless being for creation. All our ideas are derived from the senses, therefore cause and effect carry us to the great first cause. Farther than this mind has no data.

Both atheism and polytheism beg their questions. Their bibles address the vilest passions, an ignoble faith, and not reason of mind. Such books are the best evidence against themselves.

Omnipotence and perfection of Deity are necessarily united. He is God in perfection, otherwise he could not be God enough to meet all the metaphysics of atheists.

All this pre-supposes perfect attributes. Such a Being atheism does not upset, such polytheism cannot know or adopt.

It is easier to believe in a perfect God, than in an imperfect nature-creator. One or the other stands in this relation to mind. Why, atheist, use mind for legislation if nature be perfect? God has unlimited, infinite perfection.

It takes monotheism to overthrow all the imbecile sophistries of atheism and polytheism. The perfect omnipotence of God absolutely prevents his change of nature, hence he is absolutely immutable, and possesses infinite faculties.

All peculiar bibles, as peculiar faiths of polytheism and atheism, are caricatures of a perfect great first cause. Where do you get conservation of the universe from? How can you prevent one system of worlds or suns from invading another? If nature furnished the means, what prevents the aggression of major or minor bodies? Is nature thus intelligent? You affect matter from nature, but whence do you get the principles of matter? In using terms, do not pervert language. The modesty of the inquiring mind is in abeyance to the future development of facts. Monotheism is the only belief competent to live in a universe of principles. Atheism is no belief, and polytheism like it, is absorbed by monotheism.

Monotheism will absorb atheism and polytheism, the only antagonists, because the last two have no principles. It is impossible for any God of miracles to exist in this universe. Where would atheism get a standard of morals, but from the sublime creator of principles? Where will the polytheist get a standard for the construction of his peculiar bible, and the formation of conscience? Are not all rational views commensurate with principles? Without a God, how will you fix proper responsibility? What is God but the President of nature? He is perfect in his immutability—why then prayers? If there be space, what created it? Nature? How and when? What potentiality could nature have? By all the best definitions could she be adequate to overleap herself to reach a high-wrought performance? The whole nature of things in the universe, not in one world, much less one black letter book or bigoted mind, should be wisely embraced to comprehend the whole category.

The harmony of the universe demonstrates a Creator.

There can only be three views at first, Monotheism, Atheism and Polytheism, and only one at last—Monotheism, as Polytheism resolves itself into Atheism, that resolves itself into nothing.

This is a universe of cause and effect, and as such, addresses itself to the highest, best intellectuality of mind, that cannot be violated in an iota, however spiritual may be the views.

The God of nature is certainly not a peculiar God of any people, as that presents the worst of all false pretences; he certainly never entered into co-partnership, compact or covenant, with any priestocracy. No abstract propositions will answer, unless the whole comprehension has the conservative elements of the universe, therefore all peculiar faiths practicable can never fill the first function of religion, no more than abstract nature, hence both Polytheism and Atheism are nothing.

All with the Almighty is self-evident. The Trinity is not self-evident. God created the universe in conservative principles physically, morally and religiously, but no Jew or Christian Jew bible.

God Almighty stands unapproachable and unapproached, sublimely apart from all others, most self-evident forever.

As to the change of this universe, God is immutable, and Peter was too ignorant to know, and too perfidious to be trusted. Would you go to the best appreciation of God and his universe by all the supreme lights of science, or would you trust to the fiction of irresponsible ignoramuses, the priestocracy?

But you affect to be close followers of the bible. Why, if the bible revelation is before reason, do you refer to commentaries made by reason? You plainly go to mind in preaching? If you act not thus in your mind rationally, already you act the part of insanity. Why is a man recognised as compos mentis by the law, that does not recognise him otherwise? Is not this a proof, that reason, rationality, governs? You trade on this capital until your peculiar faith is cut up by it, and then you dishonestly and ungratefully discard them and your God. A man that is honest, is so by reason of principles, not because of church or peculiar faith, that are all corruptions. You can make speculations of any doctrines, not of principles, hence you affect to sneak from reason and truth after you are exposed as malefactors and felons by them.

God has no superior or equal. But why should he, a perfect being, create the world with its apparently imperfect conditions? It is a perfect world. Had it been an absolutely perfect creation, it had not been a world. The speculation of Atheism, as Polytheism, is impotent and impudent.

What do you call nature? Prove it. Principles are immutable, is nature their immutable Creator? She is ruled by principles.

The Creator manifests himself to all mankind, lettered and unlettered, by his word and work of cause and effect. Polytheism furnishes the paternity to Atheism, for their disgusting pictures, caricatures of Deity.

The regularity of the seasons proves cause and effect to the Great First Cause, who is the universal providence that rules principles as their immutable president.

The Atheist overlooks the want of data for all of his absurd metaphysics, whilst the Polytheist does very little less, and more heinously in supplying his speculative trading, mercenary notions on the world, for the reality. Man has a plenty of facts now, to do right. He has to eschew the evils of both, and act as he can on the balance.

The Atheist affects by his assumption, that there can be no beginning of time. He certainly does not understand the definition, which is only the measure of planetary motions, and God could exist before all such time or space, of course. Time and eternity are relative terms, with the Almighty, emphatically.

The universe itself gives the fullest proofs of cause and effect, up to the great first cause, all that is needed by a sane analyst. But the Atheist goes into metaphysical speculations, as idle as absurd. The most amplified volume of the great first cause, meets all the demands legitimate of mind.

But the Atheistical metaphysician speculates in his crude vagaries about God's attributes, as his omnipresence. That can be most perfectly represented by his conservative principles, to fill the whole measure, and proves most conclusively God an Almighty, on fixed and certain position. His omnipotence, as omnipresence and omniscience, proclaim him Almighty.

When the Atheist asks mind to step beyond the great first cause, he requires it to pass beyond the supreme obligations of religion and reason, into metaphysics, the data of which are not given in this theatre. It is more than a universe problem.

The perfect justice of God demonstrates itself under the circumstances of his creation. His universe is not revocable, for he is immutable. He is the constitutional president of principles. The ancient devotees to despotism in all its forms, could never appreciate Deity in the purity of his attributes. They mixed up with their degraded and perverted notions, his divine nature. It is utterly impossible that the moderns can follow all such, with the lights of mind before them.

Deity is like himself, and mind has to appreciate it with the holiest rationality. He is unlike all the most incomprehensible of all creeds, the claiming nature and not Deity for the supremacy.

Man is not to create Deity, but must read what his magnificent volume declares.

None but a monomaniac can deny the great First Cause. Mind can comprehend its rational relations to Deity, enough to prevent the metaphysical speculations of the Atheist. Those presuppose the necessity of the immortality of the soul, as a universe problem for mind's solution. Instead of going beyond Deity, mind must not go beyond man, for instead of metaphysical speculations, it has practical duty in their stead. That is the province of mind and of monotheism to teach. God's conservative principles represent him an Almighty indeed, and vindicate him as the wisest philosophy and science demonstrate. All peculiar-faith systems are swindling speculations; all priestocracies are fanatics, a useless clique, entirely superfluous; all Atheists are monomaniacs: of all, the priestocracies are most dangerous, for they have ever enslaved mind in the worst of all its fetters, for their monopolies and usurpations; mind under the best constitutional liberty, has to extricate itself entirely from their grasp. The dynasty of superstition is theirs that commences in fraud, ends in bayonets, inquisitions, bastiles and massacres. Mind should never let these things be, while God is perceptible by his immutable principles that exclude all the blind assumptions about nature, over which his supreme intelligence presides, represented by conservative principles that vindicate it by or through themselves. Nobody in his or her senses can decry the presiding influence of the great First Cause.

Universal principles preside over nature, and they must refer to their cause, Creator, originator, ruler, president. The Atheist takes the effect, nature, for the cause; she is passive. Can nature create, vegetate, without the seed? The universe is a component of systems, that move with exact mathematical precision, and the systems of the universe are in abeyance to universal astronomical laws. What is nature? The Atheist enters into suppositions about nature, a crude passive agent.

The facts of the universe extend to the utmost perfection of nature, a perfect actor, an existence with the highest perfect intelligence, a principle ruler and creator. Nature is in abeyance to principles that represent Deity, the Supreme who gives self-evident proofs. The Atheist speaks not only of nature, but in his misconception and imperfect analysis of nature ruled, and that by conservative principles. That is certain, now, perfect conservation bespeaks, proves, demonstrates the highest, perfect wisdom. It is not simple nature, but nature under sublime intelligence and laws paramount to nature, hence a decisive proof that a supreme first cause rules or presides. An Atheist is presumptuously blind, or fanatically bigoted, and aids his father bigot, the polytheist. The severest agitation and conflict of society, is by sectarians such as these.

The paramount question is, is nature ruled? Of course she is, and supremely, else she could not be in the sublime form of the universe. Now is nature the ruler? What an absurdity. Then nature is subordinate. Supremes, not subordinates, institute principles. Nature is passive under active rules, as self-evident through the diversified seasons. If rules from a ruler that had not supreme power were offered, they would be subordinate to destruction, and all nature would fly into fragments. They must be active, to insure the appropriate security and inherent action. Whenever nature then is named, it implies a universe ruled, and nothing less, otherwise it is a blind nothing. Look at this physically, morally and religiously. Mind needs a harvest, and as the active agent representing the Creator, plants them, nature, the passive, operates to maturity. Nature is then the passive means, and cannot originate; otherwise new species, order and genera would arise infinitely. Now mind, if passive, might wish to all eternity, before its wishes were complied with.

Mind then is the especial providence that directs Nature originated by universal Providence.

The atheist contravenes all principles, when he makes Nature passive and active both at one and the same time, a contradiction in terms.

What are the fruits of atheism? not those of principles. To an atheist, time, that has a simple solution, is incomprehensible. Rationalism will kill all atheism and polytheism. Where, atheist, do you get the universe conservative power?

Is nature the passive agent adequate for all the Universe? Prove atheism, demonstrate it, or upset Monotheism. On what data can the last be done? The supreme intelligence is identified with the Universe, by all conservative principles.

What is the Universe, but the union of vast systems? How could these preserve their admirable equilibrium, but for a presiding Great First Cause. The denial involves derangement of the brain of the recusant. It is only a change of terms, when we know by the lights of science that principles conserve.

Peculiar faith-advocates assume that liberal education will make infidels and atheists. Do they understand their subject, I ask with due respect to honest and truthful motives? If they do, then I have yet to learn more of these savans. As to history, I must believe them mistaken—for the alumni of the most enlightened institutions that irradiate the world with science, as far as I know, are on the side of law and order, to say the least.

In their assumption against infidels and atheists, they define their own creed, that is, on pure analysis is nothing less than polytheism, not one particle beyond atheism.

As a Monotheist, I must ask on the noblest of all principles, that of religion, what creeds can there be but monotheism, atheism, and polytheism?

Then the polytheist, as atheist, has no tenable grounds, and both are swept away completely in their own vortex. What, then, becomes of the term, infidel? Of course, an infidel to polytheism or atheism, is one pledged in fidelity to Deity. Then necessarily, all present and future accountability is in abeyance to the supremacy of the Creator, including social, moral, and religious obligations.

Polytheists, as if to enhance their cause, tell us of the horrid abominations of atheism in France, but they must see all such in alliance with polytheism, the abominations of which are identified with a world's history.

As an offset to atheism in France, let the acts of despotism of church and state be truly represented. Who has not heard of the dreadful Bastile? the horrid massacres of polytheism? The French had been brutalized into atheism, by its fixed parent, polytheism. What better could be expected of either, when both deal in bloody revolutions, and not in the conservative one of Monotheism, exempt from dark and bloody deeds? The atheism of France was sown by polytheism, and the harvest matured in the blood shed by the first.

What was the condition of France, has been too much enacted over the world as their bitter fruits. What is the condition of Mexico? That of the finest country in ruins. Both countries were apparent republics, the one adopting atheism the relief from polytheism, the other the continued victim of the last.

Who were the conquerors, but one class of polytheists superseding another? But then, this is the work of Romanism, you may say. What is the condition of India, or Hindostan? Ah! but that was the ruins of the Brahmins and Bhuddists. Who completed it, but the Protestant English?

Polytheists, no more than atheists, have any claim to principles that are all conservative and of God, whereas atheism and polytheism are of bewildered and ignorant vulgar doctrines of men. The last especially, of the priestocracy, and to be exploded before the piercing rays of intellectual science. To appreciate principles is the work of rational mind, that must have rational education, the very jewel to be obtained in such institutions.

On clear analysis, what the polytheist terms an infidel, resolves itself into this, that such ferociously declares against those that conscientiously cannot believe his book religiously, and that the polytheist is an impostor. No, the polytheist has no right to the term of infidel, when his bible is untrue, as the polytheist is clearly and positively in the light of an impostor, before the light of the whole rational world.

Polytheists, are the peculiar faith world. Are rational minds afraid of all such schools? What, atheist, can you aspire to above the polytheist? If you get rid of polytheism, you are still amenable to monotheism. But the worst inconsistency is with the polytheists, who declaim against all others. How can they get rid of the whole offensive brood? By adopting the truths of Monotheism, and renouncing their whole errors. What nuisances are polytheism and atheism. All their positions are dogmas and assumptions. The world will get rid of the abominations of both, by first getting rid an important step of their whole priestocracy. They adopt the dog in the manger policy of keeping the world out of Monotheism, because it cannot swallow their peculiar dogmas. The world has to adopt one of these three. Polytheism blames the world for atheism, that she herself makes when she outrages monotheism. Is there such a thing as cause and effect? How far are they admissible? only just so far as peculiar faith chooses? Do they stop short of the whole comprehension? Do the peculiar bible advocates know what truth and honesty are? Do they not see positively and conclusively, absolutely, that peculiar bibles are incompatible with all such as with republican constitutions, human liberty, the noblest liberty of mind? What gives perpetual motion to the different spheres or spheroids of the Universe? Who bade time start, and eternity last, but the Universe Author?

All this was on the principle for that governed, of action and reaction. You polytheists complain of atheism, and yet with all your pretences and powers you cannot silence it or put it down. The world should examine, test properly all about monotheism, polytheism, and atheism, on their own intrinsic qualities, not on the pretences of priestocracies, whose voice should not be listened to an iota in this paramount investigation. The worst committalism and using up, is by one's own self, therefore, this premises the supreme caution of doing this excellently well and right.

Atheism is criminal in fostering the murder of mind—it does not do it justice, neither can polytheism. Both are murderous of mind. Who, then, wishes the follies of the priestocracy? The earliest rationalism on refined civilization the better, without monotheism, no mind is right, therefore it cannot be divested of its holy protection by the intrigues of polytheism.

Polytheism is as accountable as atheism, and both are opposed to monotheism.

Atheism may bring forward much quibbling metaphysics about an ideal something estimated Deity by it, but God is omnipotent in his perfection, and perfect because he can do all that is perfect, and remain perfect.

What a bigot monster of depravity is polytheism.

But, says the atheist, I go for nature. Does he go for licentiousness? Nature is only an exponent of principles, that bespeak a supreme Organizer and Creator. Let the majesty of principle, the glory of virtue be appealed to. You cannot mistake your duty, atheist, if you wish. There are checks and balances in the philosophy of the Universe, but in the meagre, contracted, conceited bigotry of priestocracy there is no virtue. The ipse dixit of dramatic writers is to be put down, that mind may not be imposed on always. There must be a self-motive power, the originator of perpetual motion.

What of Providence universal and especial? The first belongs to the function of creation, the last is identified with the action of mind and principles, his special representatives. The bigotry of polytheism and atheism is clearly demonstrated, with regard to monotheism and the highest injunctions of rationality, by the complete overthrow of such people as had not advanced in the science of the times, &c. They go backwards. Infidelity is anti-God, the poor metaphysics of polytheism and atheism, that fall forever before the divine majesty of Monotheism.

THE GOVERNMENT OF DEITY; ITS EXALTED CHARACTER.

Deity must elaborate and enjoy all that is excellent, possessed of his inherent elements of greatness, power and sources of happiness.

Must not then especial perpetual punishment yield to the superior government by rewards?

The first debases, the last elevates and ennobles character. The hope of reward, is identified with free agency, to raise mind to its best promotion.

But other considerations exclude the soul, and the divine purpose of its creation.

Human nature becomes depraved, corrupt and vitiated, from the corruption of the times, and the perversion of mind.

Much of it is seriously degraded and brutalized by the circumstances affecting it—some is debased despite of much effort to elevate it aright, hardly fit for vital existence, and yet as accountable and responsible, unprepared to die.

The conservative revolution of such character reflects the amendment expedient for mind.

Not only the counteraction of universal depravity, but the advancement to the highest state of elevation of mind, is the problem of existence. The benevolence of refinement induces the faith that perpetual punishment in a future state could not be instituted by the possessor of universal attributes.

The motive of adoption of the least of all evils, is the attribute of benevolence, as we must take nothing for granted, but on the most rational basis.

The value of the best minds best elevated is far superior to the rest, and must be duly estimated and shown. Their reward must be insured.

But mind is of too much value to be placed as a polishable diamond and then cast idly by, among dust and rubbish hopelessly lost, when possessed of available elements. The author must estimate and cherish his best work by the best care and solicitude. He cannot do justice to it, short of immortal functions bestowed.

Association and mixture of all varieties of character through all gradations of best to worst, is incompatible with ideas of propriety, and cannot be permitted by Deity, who has arranged the infinite number of spheres, boundless to man, after his own best taste and skill.

A distinction is drawn by the worst, and they must abide their own action in correspondent degree.

The enjoyment of existence must be consistent to its every gradation—through the various links of creation. There is much misery that follows as penalty on bad actions on this earth, but too often the guilty seem to escape condign punishment.

Sinners, as all are, most feel when others feel; misery begets misery; when others suffer we sympathize. It is our nature, and the great God of nature gave to us this feeling. Such sympathy induces the question, would it not enhance universal enjoyment to institute universal salvation? Then all enjoyment of happiness is promoted by the knowledge that all souls possess the position relative to merit.

But guilt of mind perverted exists.

What shall become of the dreadful and depraved tyrants of society, who have ruthlessly and recklessly crushed the noblest feelings and sensibilities of mind, and consigned it prematurely to another state of existence?

Who can be worse than all those who have committed trespasses of the most flagrant character directly with the worst blasphemy, against God and his rightful attributes? Among which are all the institutions of false, spurious and counterfeit faith, that pervert God's unity and impugn his prerogatives.

No less are social wrongs, of those highest in authority for a time over man.

All these may be punished in part on earth, but not adequately, for their crimes and brutal oppressions, for their slaughter of the human race most wantonly by millions, outraging all humanity on age and sex, assailing human life with all the direst calamities.

No less are the minor tyrants, who go to the extent of their power, to be corrected.

The peculators of the public, the oppressors of innocence and helpless people, defrauding them of their rights and depriving them of their privileges.

All the flagrant violators of principles must make atonements suitable and commensurate, nations as individuals, the whole world. Nations that do not heed principles will go down to the common tomb, and their names shall be erased from the virtuous.

Every degree of vice must remove the soul by degrees from the fountain of purity.

Then intrinsic differences must be graduated between souls meritorious and culpable.

The soul that feels appropriate punishment, makes atonement for misdeeds. The mode and measure are among the unrevealed realities of a future state. The Mighty One of creation enjoys that which befits consummate wisdom, spotless purity, and unappreciable magnanimity—whose space is the universe—whose duration is eternity—whose power is imprescriptible—and whose reward, as creation, is self-elemental.

His exile is sorrow and punishment, but his presence is happiness and joy, as whose glorious mantle is justice, without which the elements of creation had not been so elevated, so self-preserved and regulated in their eternal foundations.

This world, then, furnishes but one of myriads of apartments in the universe, and may be one of the spheres and theatres of mind progressing in its career towards perfection, tried by time and rewarded by eternity.

Who that is wise will not make the best use of time, most valuable function of mortal existence?

Mind in time becomes the soul in eternity.

The sublime creation of the universe saw also its true fundamental principles of government for its preservation, else it had not been creation, but chaos, without head, a consummation that characterized the loftiest unapproachable skill of the Immortal Architect.

The Creator then left all in a glorious state of blessedness and adaptation for future progress.

If God cannot save us, what are we to expect from feudal vassal office-holders?

Their platform is of self-interest, as directed by their leaders good or bad, adapted and qualified by the times, not of principles that originated creation. All the most beautiful creation of mind's fancy will not, cannot increase the matter-of-fact loveliness of God's creation, that should not be diminished by any of the deformities of mind in the priests' empire.

God vindicates his attributes, ennobles his works, and punishes blasphemy.

Not to give God all his attributes and qualities, is to attempt to impeach them, but the pretences thereon for desecrated objects victimize the impostor in all particulars inevitably and deservedly, in all the elements of ignominy and disgrace, of infamy and ruin complete.

Better would it be, if done designedly, for such never to have heard reason, for she will condemn him when her voice can be heard at the tribunal of the God of reason, if it cannot be audited in the forum of conscience, but stifled so as to originate the cause of curses of billions on his head.

Sooner or later a correct decision, and right action on that decision, must come, when reason holds her rule in the presidency of mind and conscience, at the tribunal of honesty and universal cognizance.

The God of the universe asserts his claims in their comprehension, and vindicates them in a masterly sublimity, that reduces all pretension of man to the lowest humility.

By reason he excludes all impostors, and often punishes, through avenging principles, the blasphemous pretenders by speedy death.

Let their deluded followers beware of his invincible might, and his omniscient faculty.

Let not not the gods of false faiths, or the priests, their oracles, affect his functions over mind, for they cannot survive the infamy that will finally overtake and overwhelm them.

The world will approve doctrines that depend on vital principles, as it is bound imperatively to all such for vital existence, whether we will or no, because of God's supreme wisdom; but it is needless to tell a sound mind that all things are possible with God, through a fool's exposition that tangles common sense and reason, and libels their author.

All the acts of wisdom are possible with God, but not a fool's faith. God does not contradict himself, as he is unchangeable and perfect from the start of creation; but the priests' bibles and peculiar faiths change this proper character of God, through their stupid imbecility.

Man's delusion and oppression led through the blood of all kinds of victims—man's included—offered up in groves, or on the altars erected by his deplorable and stupid ignorance and his horrid crimes, under the misguidance of priestcraft and man's omission of duty to his own mind, to the erection of mighty temples to the gods of polytheism· but the hand of Deity—time—has erased much of all such rubbish, and will scatter the rest entirely to the dust.'

The God of Immortality has created a living temple, that he continues as a constant memento of his own greatness, that lives and feels and has its being from the fountain of all life, and that is perfectly incapable of receiving a substitute. Disguised as peculiar faith may be, the trophy is only a senseless temporal speculation, a hypocritical pretence that cannot breathe in the pure ethereal atmosphere of the Supreme.

This living temple is immortal, under the successive renewal of endless life, from procreation, in the interminable link of human generation.

Where is God's temple better located than in the mind, having its mental appreciation from the time of cultivated consciousness of its author, the Almighty, who has vouchsafed and thus constituted an immortal guardian, as far as legitimate and necessary.

It is here that religion most rational can be enkindled around the family altar of friendship, love, and esteem, filial, parental, and social, comprehensive as earth, boundless as the universe, and respondent to all that can inspire adoration for the universal protection of him who sympathizes for all and with all, as meriting it.

What is there in the cold soulless pages of a priest-book of superstition, or the bible, so called, not of mind but of man, that can breathe the breath of love so pure, of appreciation so vivid of the Creator, as mind that eclipses all in the universe of creation, purified by a right conception of its duty and its proper execution?

God never left to contingency his mighty attributes.

The affairs of such condition and position indicate action too preposterous, thanks to Deity.

All such proves, if needed, that the government of this world would be tangled in worse than Gordian knots in a few seconds if left to the guardianship and guidance of all the priests, ancient and modern.

There can be no worship of God but true adoration on principles, that reflect the excellence of actions.

Special providence is not peculiar, but a universal providence; not of peculiar, but a rational faith.

The God of the universe is not the God of wrath and fury, as he necessarily hath an equilibrium pre-eminently his. Any other was a peculiar god, such as the petty Jew god described in the Jew bible. Persons that are good in or out of church are so on principles, rational religion, monotheism, the only thing that can keep mankind right. Now, is it possible that an omnipotent God would have ever permitted his chosen people, the Jews, to have been made slaves of by the people he had no liking to, and that he would have permitted his book to have been lost, had all been fixed upright at the start? The God of the universe knows no such peculiar god as the Jews claimed, no more than religion knows their peculiar faith from any other false pretence. All that adopt peculiar faith adopt idolatry, and cannot reach the proper adoration of the perfect Creator.

The world complains of the shortness of life, but who can complain of the shortness of principles?

The priestocracy and minions complain of infidels, those that do not believe their degraded book-lies, falsehoods and pretences, that libel the perfection of God, but they are tories to God and mind to take that position. The dispensations of the Almighty are compatible with the best preservation of the universe in its widest comprehension, therefore mind has to correct its errors, and be sure and not commit itself to the false positions of presumptuous priestocracies in no respect. Let the disposition tell. The analytic mind has to detect, to expose errors with moral firmness, to secure a conservative revolution, to reach all expedient as created to best govern itself. Why do they not let God govern by his conservative principles, instead of their botches and tinkerings? How few of the world do this? The only proper patience and resignation to the will of Divine Providence is inculcated by monotheism, that rejects all the tricks of degraded priestocracy. This position rejects suicide as an infatuation, a crime, a folly, a cowardice, a want of proper balance of mind, that has needed the highest protection of rational education. What shall we do in our death end? Why not ask for our life-time? Rational religion is the only thing that can satisfy a rational mind, at that and all times the most trying. All peculiar faith starts falsely, and ends so. Now, of what benefit is all that to a dying person, when not fit for a living one.

The most perfect and harmonious understanding throughout the world can exist by rational religion, that must finally exclude peculiar faiths of all kinds, and advance conservatism, that is, the preservation of all God's conservative principles, the true spirit that ought to prevail throughout the world. The abuse of the little brief authority in every department, particularly to the prejudice of ignorance and neglect of conservative principles, is counteracted by rational mind, that represents rational religion. The highest justice can be awarded to those people who are best disposed, while all should have equitable principles of justice, renouncing to be the unprincipled gamblers in the world's stock.

Religion of the God of the universe is just the reverse of the peculiar faiths of the peculiar god of the bible, who let his devil get man and woman from him after the creation. The close of this writing would just be the beginning, as the subject of God's religion is exhaustless to mind.

It seems sacrilege, in such an enlightened age as this, to miss the sacred object of God, whose holy deed has written his ineffaceable and unmistakable word, cause and effect, that is self-impressed as rational mind's universal standard.

All violations of conservative principles are unsafe, dangerous, and to be avoided. God has immutable laws and principles for his universe, co-extensive with creation. Man cannot deprecate them; messiahships cannot modify or alter them by prayers: hence, how absurd was it for the ancients to imagine, and more absurd in the moderns to adopt any pretences whatever in this respect. The wisest conformity to all the sublime regulations of Deity during rational life, bespeaks the greatest wisdom of mind.

Is universal Providence especial? This position premises Providence and foresight in mind, to reach and attain its appropriate sphere.

When were they premised by a perfect being, who does his work at first forever without any necessity for a second touch, but at the creation, in the institution of principles conservative to the universe?

Analyze the state of that mighty design, and mind, under the perfection of reason and elevated by philosophical science, is introduced into renewed adoration of Deity.

Without these attributes of mind, man is as apt to run into danger as from it. He can only keep cool, by the best direction of mind as the best plan forever.

His, then, is the part for your especial providence, prudence and foresight. Principles must and will vindicate themselves, re-acting as God's general and especial Providence.

But is there an especial Providence? God shows his supremacy in the sublimest light, to cause His universal principles to act for him in all necessary capacities. Some of the incidents of life seem to support the idea of especial Providence on extraordinary vicissitudes, but the best efforts of mind duly cultivated, secure the best and that through conservative principles. The history of life seems curious, and offers much for philosophical, moral and religious contemplation.

When two men contend on a bluff and fall into the water, by which one is drowned, but the other, though then saved, is killed in a well a few years afterwards, the enthusiast may contend for especial providence, while the rationalist sees the effects of principles that were violated. The Providence of God is Almighty. Those who travel on steamers that are badly attended to by construction and engineering, risk their lives by drowning or being blown up. Mind then is to be looked to as responsible. Mind is mighty but finite, therefore it must resort to all the uniform expedients of science, and all the protection of principles. Many an apparently weak side is favored by its circumstances, and none better than by all the powers of mind in its innumerable expedients.

Revolutions conservative are always for justice and the good of mankind, but if mixed up with selfish ambition, and not directly carried out on intrinsic merits, may fail. The failure was incident to the means, not Providence. In the category of revolutions destructive, are to be placed all revolutions for peculiar faith doctrines, and all for messiahships. Wisdom can always predict their final downfall, for they have not conservative principles wherewith to sustain them. Sectarianism in peculiar faith always involves final ruin. When the Jews spoke of the rest of the world as heathen, they indited their own barbarism, and proved the worst practice and species of sectarianism an example for their own treatment by those nations that have repaid it many fold.

Their downfall is, then, the result of principles, for peculiar faith will never let mind advance to the requisitions of nature or herself.

A man towering in his vain egotism, possessed of power, is reckless of rights that pertain to others and himself.

Short sighted indeed must he be if he do not understand the results. Many incidents of history and biography will clearly illustrate.

Preceding a drove of cattle was a carriage, containing a lady and family, and following came a man in a sulky, dashing recklessly along as if he wished to scare the herd, perfectly independent himself, as he was behind, and supposed himself free from danger. But principles vindicate themselves in the whole circle.

When the cattle were about to drive furiously along, to the extreme danger of the lives of those in the carriage, the humane drover sprung before them, shaking his coat, that he had stripped off. They were driven thus on the man behind, whom they crushed down, breaking his bones, and ruining his sulky, to the very great danger of his life. What teaches brutal perverse minds, reckless of restraints and duties to society, better than certain penalties? Impunity licences to crime.

All society most look to this for self-preservation.

To secure the potent realization of Almighty Providence, mind must be enlightened by reason, referring to the lights of education, the reflection of rational minds illumined by the best lights of a liberal world that refers to enlightened public opinion, in an enlightened community of mind.

Religion arises spontaneously by virtue of innate faculties in all rational minds, and is subject to the influence and tuition of education, that ennobles mind if right by a just appreciation of Deity to rational religion, or debases it if misleading by perversion and corruption to superstition, idolatry, and man-worship, ostensibly and really polytheism, or plurality of gods, if more than one.

Rational religion that can be characterized by all the noblest attributes best, from the pure fountain of goodness, creating the most rational faith, and brightest, most substantial hope, that can be carried to the legitimate extent of justice to Deity's attributes and man's duty, teaches rational mind to survey Providence through the medium of sublime principles.

Rational religion credits all the legitimate claims that mind is entitled to, that God exacts, and that man can require or expect from the nature of creation perfected by God.

God's attribute of mercy is characterized by universal principles, and must produce universal fruits of salvation, proportionate and graduated to characteristic traits of mind.

The Almighty stands alone in his own perfection in the sublime dignity and supremacy of his unity in his own self-sustaining worth, grandeur and magnificence. He needs but virtuous intellect, to appreciate his glory, a fact that bespeaks the highest hope for immortality of the soul.

Rational beings must see and know unmistakably that God is the true object of their adoration, and as his creatures, that they must look for protection through their Creator, as in all the principles of justice and of his being, the Creator is bound to the best protection of the creation on conservative principles.

The Creator is under obligation to protect his creation, that is equally bound to him for that conservation.

The best obligation on both parties is implied.

Mind has been impressed with the right elements of religion, that must be sought of the right standard, the Creator, the protecting Providence.

Conscience introduces rational mind to the Creator, and is a sacred deposite from innate faculties in the holy keeping of mind, exalted at all times by the best lights and exercise of reason, herself the great emanation and inspiration from Deity, and establishing true rational religion.

Anything that interrupts man's conscience with God, or invalidates God Almighty's attributes in their full force and virtue, impeaches that peculiar whole faith as untrue, and its actions unfaithful to the Universe, that conclusively gainsays the same forever beyond mistake, as unworthy of reason and mind, the only beneficiaries.

Rational religion, true religion, rests with the right actions of mind, that is faithfully directed to all duty, by the conscience of the individual who must be a free to be a responsible agent.

Man must live and die with a pure conscience resulting from no wanton injury to creation, but fortified by acts of justice, love of kindness and humanity before God.

The conscience free from offence, guilt, and guile, and enlightened by reason, presents the best intercessor for the rational religionist throughout the world.

Without reason there is no conscience, and without its free agency there can be no responsibility.

On a different basis, the jurisprudence of this world, and the exalted justice of Deity must forgive crime.

Conscience is the crowning glory of mind, as a guardian genius enlightened by the best inspirations of reason, that gives man his triumph over malign circumstances.

Conscience asks, when rightly directed, if not smothered and murdered, always for correct principles.

Give, oh give, then, free and virtuous scope to mind, whose vacuum has to be filled.

How can conscience ever reach correct principles, without reason and the light of mind, that luxuriates in all the degrading crimes of a vicious education of the age, if not elevated above them by correct principles.

What is to restrain the unprincipled mind?

The spirit of the wild and savage state has its partial education and its principles, its partial rational religion.

A matured and properly organized conscience, is the full growth of mental reaction, and the entire comprehension of all innate principles, not a mere part to suit the present and reject the future, to suit time, but abjure eternity.

God has endowed all rational mental capacities with this blessing, that cannot be too purely and brightly cultivated in all the refinements of honesty, and all the fruits of rational religion.

Its blessings tell hundreds of fold in social, moral, and religious life in the world's welfare, and the people of the earth feel its kindliest aid and genial protection.

What man is entitled to in life's rights, pleasures and hopes, will be accorded by the right tribunal of conscience, as his just right under creation's claims, mind's merits, and God's purpose.

Every man's conscience asks for durable peace on eternal principles, and nothing less, if wise unto his own preservation. In the tribunal of conscience, then, neither he that wears the mitre, nor that is in power, can escape the remorse of the deepest guilt.

The God of principles judges those that defeated the elementary principles of true government, that giveth the rights for the full exercise of social duties and rational religion. Then they will not pass unpunished, after having sworn one faith, and meaning differently with mental reservations and moral obliquity.

The result of a guilty conscience presents the deepest penalties of remorse, that "without consuming burns."

How glorious is it that reason should shed her benign influence over free rational discussion and freedom of conscience, that enables intelligent minds to pay exact justice to all. How are all prepared in life for death, but by universal adherence to all the requisitions of enlightened conscience?

The consolations of enlightened conscience are one of the chief sources of exalted happiness.

On whom, then, but God alone does true religion rest?

But cannot others participate also with God in power? Not at all, if God's attributes are God's.

Why is not God exclusive ruler of all? enlightened conscience positively demands.

He is the first, the great and everlasting cause, that by pre-occupancy of omnipresence excludes the least rightful invasion.

Else, he is no God, much less a perfect being; but he is full proprietor by genius, rights the best, and can only be excluded in the vain, perverted, self-conceited, bigoted mind of false teachers.

The system of christian messiahship presents four gods, one expressly the God of evil, seducing souls from their Creator, and other vulgar absurdities.

Such a system is criminal before conscience, and absurd, contemptible, abominable before the light of mind.

What, then, holds the divine right, the only divine right of God's inspiration?

Mind, that leads to enlightened conscience, and its most enlightened, noblest system of rational religion.

What is the attribute of mind, in recognition of these principles of the universe?

Her highest wisdom attainable, which is reason, declares most plainly a full and proper action, that leads to constant performance of duty to the universe and its First Great Cause, Creator, Ruler, and God Supreme.

Can faith have any prior claim or superior respect in man's mind, in any of his duties, religious or social?

It would be the height of criminal absurdity if that position was the order of conscience.

There is but one tribunal of mind, over which reason presides, and she is the only representative of God in reaching faith. Any other is dishonesty, if not superstition.

The best decision arises in truth, that is indebted to reason's God.

Where there is deviation, it rests on mind's perversions, delusions, and deceptions.

The tortures of conscience are the worst of all penalties. Some delinquents are impeachable for weakness of mind voluntarily, that affect not to be able to recognise their full duty by stupid ignorance, whilst the real state evidently must be corruption.

Those who can know or find out, and choose not to investigate, but affect belief in errors of faith, yet are passive in good, must be amenable at the bar of conscience, whilst they pretend that the devil keeps them back.

The devil is one of the most demoralizing fictions ever perpetrated on mind.

The right speculation hands all this over to the right principle, without desiring, much less needing, intercessorships of priests or preachers to finish it to their notions. God is the only actor, whose mind plainly tells these gentry to be distant.

What kind of conscience ought the world to have, but in its original purity?

Analysis, the fort of the mind, tells us that the world is nothing without the right kind of people.

They must have wise firmness for life, and life's best interest confirmed on immaculate principles, duly recognised by enlightened mind.

Deity demands this of all rational creation, physically and morally, requiring adoration exclusively of enlightened minds, whilst he communicates the blessings to all.

This world is a scene of just relations, and is to be the theatre of conscience, that regulates and governs the actions of mankind. Who, then, is the preacher but conscience?

Spare the holy spirit of conscience, do not violate its benign influence, and you will be spared remorse at the trying hour of purification.

To make right impressions, the conscience must be innocent, and the cause good.

When enlightened conscience acts, a pure religion is supported by rational mind, instructed by rational education.

God can only be addressed through the pure principles of reason, originating appropriate actions.

All as enlightened are religious in degree, if they have any conscience enlightened, and as full proof that faith becomes fanaticism when mind is debased by ignorance, history abundantly teaches.

Purity of mind best results from the light and benefit of light of science and philosophy, on mind naturally benevolent.

Conscience untrammeled and enlightened by reason, is the best criterion of moral rectitude.

Modesty and worth of character, are of no weight of estimation to the intriguer who looks to his own selfish ends in power and money; but estimate, you that have conscience, the pains, penalties, forfeitures, confiscations of mind for vice. The short comings and omissions are bad enough.

When collusion and combination impose penalties and sufferings, where but to a future tribunal of a just God can all look?

Conscience if rightly cultivated, leads to virtue and its reward, but if perverted, leads to vice and its penalties. Paramount duties must be premised and practiced, before all others, else the folly of the world is bad, and its corruption is worse, as a natural consequence, because certain knowledge and exact science are not its benefactors to rescue from degradation. All rational beings have to obey the upright decision of enlightened conscience.

Repentance is on remorse of conscience, that must be enlightened through mind itself, influenced by the science of morals, ethics, religion.

Conscience makes calculation good and bad, fairly for both sides. There are a great many things that a conscientious man will refuse, though permitted by law.

An honest man never considers debts out of date, that are not so in conscience. He will never compromise debts when he can pay what he owes justly.

Absence of interested parties, no more than their presence, causes him to neglect his duty to them. With him conscience is never stretched, much less violated.

He seeks progression in good, by safe rational education, legislation, rewards and indispensable penalties.

He will act well at home, in all the circles of duty. He has no unreasonable conflicts about his affairs abroad, much less in the neighborhood. He means right, acts and shows this disposition to be right. Acting rightly, he neither embraces, conceals, appropriates or smuggles up all he has.

Such does not recur to personal abuse, for the defence of his position.

Conscience wishes to analyze religion, but peculiar faith disclaims the ability, and repels the attempt. What does faith avail in true morals, if the base be perverted as peculiar faith is always, hence we should like to know how enlightened conscience comes, but from reason?

Conversion is change of or on mind, and premises a pure base. No commission of the principal can possibly supersede or dispense with his almighty influence. His is the creation, and his must be the grace. All else is inefficient from the very nature of mind's existence.

Conscience enables the world to criticise all on merits, not to crush them by libels, which is felonious.

How many restless spirits are there without peace? Have they been pirates on the world, with remorse of conscience still pursuing them? Listen to all the wise admonitions of conscience, to secure immortal happiness.

Lay aside conscience, and mind is tyrant. Is the right to liberty of conscience, full and fair in regard to bibles?

If not, it is an awful tyranny.

Blessed are they who seek to do right all their lives, by an enlightened conscience, a pure and cultivated mind, whose thoughts first and last on each day arise to God, and have the least of evil. The highest of legislation is that of an enlightened conscience.

The history of the world proves mind's free agency under the circumstances of creation. But that kind of free agency is objected to. You then ask for something absolute, that does not pertain to God, who is consistent on his own principles of creation. All this position of mind revolves on the great centre, enlightened conscience. Mind is the existent principle, but the light of conscience is ever referring to the only infallible standard, to the Creator of the universe. The only safe motto is, do nothing of which you can possibly have any remorse of conscience. You are dissatisfied. Why? What can satisfy you? You have done acts that cannot be re-called. What are you going to do about it? Make all the practicable atonement by retributive justice. The world should take care how it trespass upon the expansive grace of the Creator. The bible of tradition subscribes to polytheism, whereas reason and mind's conscience uphold only one Supreme God of Nature. Conscience, to be most elevated, must be enlightened by philosophical science and truth.

All that is done in wisdom, is the supreme action of mind. If the pure conscience have God on its side, all messiahs may go. To-day sectarians would have an imperial ukase or edict, to proscribe conscience.

Cultivate conscience through mind-culture.

The conscience that is nurtured by rationalism is too pure to admit any of the forms of polytheism, as trinity, that causes atheism.

Conscience can only be elevated by the elevated lights of mind, reflected on by the education of philosophical, liberal science. Proper conscience can only thus be established. Retributive justice must bring remorse of conscience, on the seduction of innocence, the outrage of rights and wrongs done.

Conscientiousness can only be right, as rational education is right. That of peculiar education is more or less fanaticism. Man, perverted by peculiar education, faith, and interest, aggravated by all the world policies of ambition, avarice, covetousness and envy, and infuriated by all the evil passions of unrestrained and licentious will without equilibrium of principles, is devil enough.

Sinful thoughts may arise, but not dwell, certainly not mature, in the mind of those refusing action.

Conscience decides for immortality. What is freedom of conscience worth, if freedom of mind is embezzled by peculiar faith?

The conscience is solicitor for the mind, which is alone responsible officially to its Creator. The question at the proper tribunal will not be as to peculiar faith, which is alien to the subject of religion, but how much of the last has been duly practiced to the honor of both conscience and mind, man and God. The consciousness of guilt or remorse must be met at first by the right actions. The world must go for the liberty of conscience, that was hardly known to the best intelligence of the world a century ago. To live without fear and reproach is one of the best of all positions, but to live self-approving is happiness indeed. How are you going to counteract the thousand evils and ills of this life, caused by mind's perversions and short-comings? By mind's rational education, correct action and genius; above all, an enlightened conscience, comes from the most rational mind, most rationally treated. The highest, chastest, purest taste, is virtue, and that is the exercise of the highest legitimate functions on conservative principles. Consult then conscience, not peculiar bibles, the engine of earthly Belials, who convert the earth into their hell, pervert and dwarf all to their ignominious notions. Conscience is as to education, hence that must be rational, or the worst injustice is done it. As all peculiar faith is as to peculiar education, hence conscience must be only guarded by rational education. There are some unprincipled people that will take advantages, and care nothing for conscience or its paramount rights. Keep such at a distance, as unworthy of notice, contemptible and base, till they learn that they have to correct their beginnings, and hold themselves amendable to a right public opinion, based on rational principles.

The whole world should know if it investigate what is truth and honesty, that graces the start of rational religion. So some of the world get out of their difficulties, they care nothing at all for the balance. There are many things not defined on principles, that are sought to be by world-bullyism—mind-toryism.

THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

Is there immortality of the soul, or does mind perish?

As like produces like, affinities produce affinities, and only such, man shows a mental organization above the animal, towering above it on to perfection.

All animal's instinct is in accordance with animal organization, as finished at the start of their creation, as in the remotest ages.

But man's is not so. His body, the animal part, is so; but not his mind and functions, the soul that progresses through the whole time of mind's existence.

The soul, the mind with its functions, has to recur to the purposes of creation to perfect them. These are not for mere man a flower to bloom and wither, but the whole purpose is for the soul, as mind that is capable to realize the everlasting truths of the universe, is taken hence. If for higher and nobler purposes, to whom is the accountability? To nature? What an absurdity! It must be to nature's God, who is under best obligation to do it justice that absolutely requires, therefore, immortality. The proper variety of the universe is, without doubt, to be enjoyed by the soul. The justice of God demands, bespeaks the best future accountability of rational beings, hence the immortality of the soul. It is the individuality of mind that must be respected. Though the laws of gravitation compel the influence of earthly things—matter—is not the soul a universe traveller, coming by birth and going by death, yielding to the paramount laws of its being? But why not of brutes also?

They are not rational, and therefore cannot be embraced in the category. But some of them are learned animals. True, but they cannot impart their learning. All that they have is mechanical, and after all, their learning dies with them. The species to eternity is not thereby benefited. All such animals are only subservient to the highest scale of existence, that of man. But you deny the further advance, the immortality of the soul? To do so successfully, you must prove that the existence of mind on this sphere was gratuitous, and strictly, rigidly confined to this earth. I speak of rational minds as contra-distinguished from brutes, that cannot appreciate religion, a thing that exclusively belongs to rational minds, and that binds them to the universe and its God reciprocally. If you, polytheist, make peculiar faith supersede reason, then you destroy the best hopes for proofs of the immortality of the soul, that you incontestibly place in abeyance to peculiar bibles, that are nothing. Is this mental machinery to perish, almost as soon as vitalized?

Whence came it, and whither does it tend?

What are the whole purposes of creation? Mechanical and animal influences? In justice to creation of mind, it should have a proper theatre for its deeds and merits, nothing less than immortality.

The soul is the quintessence of the being of nature.

Religion is inseparable from mind's nature, and rationally bespeaks immortality for the soul. This earth is a sphere of rationality, not spirituality. Death is only a change for souls to pass from one sphere of action to another—to carry out the universe-problem. The state of soul-spirits is forwards, not backwards. Whence come, and whither do they tend? To carry out the paramount universal purposes of the creation.

A brute's mind is for specific animal, earthly purposes, and the whole only can be animals.

A brute is as much a brute in the first as the last part of the world's history. Not so man, progressive in every age, more or less, with an expansive intellectuality, refinement, civilization, and religion above all, he evidently needs other spheres of the universe to complete his most rational eternal happiness.

The exact language of God is by death, that bespeaks the onward, not retrograde progress of soul.

Mothers might linger for their offspring as departed souls, but for the universal care of the universe-Creator, that absolutely supersedes all such. This world, then, cannot be the theatre for spirits as they have been called, as it presents one for vitality, material, breathing beings. Who is the Author of the five senses, but the Author of the soul? Could nature, itself creation, create a soul? Prove there is one. There is the thinking, reasoning faculty, the source of thought and reasoning. The five senses are the recipients, and exponent organs. Does not this faculty exist as an individual element, that individualizes all to ratiocination and rationality? God, infinitely perfect, should, in justice to mind, create it perfect. That it has to attain, on its working and merits. Has he not created it to be perfect by a universe-problem solution? Religion proves that knowledge is by comparison. How could life's pleasures be enjoyed, appreciated, if the world were not as it is? The innate principle in soul or nature of mind's character is identified with principles that are for eternal universal benefit. The universe is one mighty architectural design, that eminently displays intrinsic unity both for God and his highest purposes, the best exaltation of mind and soul. Nothing less than monotheism elevates the soul to the complete appreciation and enjoyment of this universal comprehension.

Death is nothing but a universal change, a part of this unity of purpose, not an eternal sleep, as mere materialism teaches in its grovelling and abortive conception of blind vagaries and bewildered phantasies.

God is prescient on principles, and has met the whole question of universal conservation as an universal savior. A mere world-messiah is then most preposterous. Appropriate retribution implies, from the attributes of God's justice, other theatres of existence besides this. Death is so far from being a defect in the system of nature, that as a great change it is the great blessing of supreme purposes.

As to spiritual knockings, the suggestion is gratuitous, and comes from mortals. What an idea, that spirits are declared, when touch and vision, or the main detective senses, are unapproached. Mind is only the embryo of soul. See the chrysalis, that becomes a beautiful insect. Give all animal creation all that belongs to this state, still it is subordinate to mind that rules it and the world, the universe.

The soul has its functions. If this universe cannot perish, with its immutable principles, why then should its diamond—the soul or mind, with its functions?

This world is identified with the universe, and the soul is indissolubly united by religion to its God. What an illustrious obligation has mind to rear on this conservative fabric, the best earnest of its immortal fruition and happiness.

The soul proves another state of existence necessary and essential to its supreme excellence.

All rational beings partaking relatively of God's nature as rational intellectuality, must inherit other relative analogous qualities essential to God, as immortality and wisdom, for their due conservation and honor.

All beings that do not partake of the attributes of immortality, cannot possibly partake of any direct inherent relation and connection with God.

They do not then owe any fealty of religion to him, which is impossible with mind's organization.

The great First Cause, beyond whom thought of mind cannot go, has not revealed to human vision the brilliant fountain of his own almighty character.

Here is the limit to human mind, that must feel and acknowledge in suitable humility the Supreme, but its aspirations premise something more in reserve. With no data, reason cannot arouse analysis nor analogy, that is ever true to these her noblest advocates.

Reason has looked through cause and effect to the great First Cause, who must command all with due and voluntary acquiescence.

Mind invested with mortal habiliments cannot look upon immortality; the highest and brightest intelligences, endowed with the best mental organization, thus situated, are incapable of the least such gift.

The scenes and powers of mortal embodiments are on a mortal theatre. The Creator of universal attributes endows such with no peculiar gifts, a fallacy confined to dark ages. Here embodied souls learn the elements of their own non-appreciation.

In another state of existence more advanced than earth, no doubt other brighter and nobler investing organizations await the mind, reared in the magnificence of the soul, more developed to reach a higher appreciation of Deity and his works, and secure a fuller enjoyment of Deity's benevolence and glory.

In this earthly state, mind's organization cannot obtain any certain or satisfactory solution of the future; hence it must ever trust to the pledge that is reciprocal of God and itself for the best insurance of the balance. To mind, as now constituted, it is and ever will be an unsolved problem, great and grand, never to meet revelation on earth—a sealed book, the seals of which can never be loosed in mind's present physical nature, so earthly, animal, sensual, sinful, and prone to evil, by peculiar perversions. This confirms the supreme, pure character of the Creator. This is the best position for mortally-invested mind, to have only inherent gifts, appropriate to its existence, to have no absolute knowledge of the future, as the evil would outweigh the good in man's life, if he knew his particular history, a matter unknown to all.

The picture of immortal fruition, if known, might render an earthly residence uncomfortable and unsatisfactory, unworthy of present enjoyment, and the present would be nullified in the future.

The gift of death is a blessing, a passport to a nobler existence, but if anticipated by prescience, must mar the pleasures of present existence, or increase the miseries of guilt.

Mind when ignorant, must modestly learn at the true source of wisdom, and test all by reason fortified by time's experience. The circumstances of each mind's test will best verify its merit.

Silence discloses all wisdom, where solutions may condemn themselves as libels.

Human nature participant of two elements, must be incompetent to elicit beyond her earthly province, and therefore produces results in mind's deductions only confined to its proper theatre; the deductions of mind, unless regulated by the highest reason, must be one often fraught with error, especially when misled by design, self-power, and temptation of its circumstances.

Fallibility causes corruption that runs to degraded extremes in the code of a mere earthly existence, as accountability is partial, not efficient, and there stops with mere mortal materialists.

But the doctrine of a full accountability elevates us to a faith in the immortality of the soul, the best present and future position, safe and ennobling.

It becomes mortal's creation, subject to vital danger and abundant poignant anguish for misspent functions to comprehend at all times their earthly actions and immortal hopes. Instead of becoming self-inquisitors of the world's citizens, increasing their own penalties and punishment, and establishing the locality themselves, the agents, let them modestly perform their becoming duty, and duly estimate all that pertains to it.

The body was suited to the earthly existence; the soul seeks future eminence, never satisfied with the present for permanent fruition.

Who can estimate in reason, the worth of an immortal soul?

Who but human fiend, will thwart its best resolves, intentions, capabilities and its own best analysis of the state of facts through a proper discipline of rational education, liberal and untrammeled, to elicit its final, greatest, purest, best faculties?

Who but bigot will bring the iron chains of peculiar faith, to imprison its noblest aspirations to the Almighty?

Who can dare reject or thwart the pure teachings, admirable precepts, and wisest admonitions of enlightened reason, that upholds man's true greatness, the sure, proper and certain counsellor of mind, that does all for the soul and true religion?

As well can the Atheist pretend to deny the existence of Deity, whose organization of creation proves an intelligent God of nature, as the caviler pretends to the non-existence of the soul, from the partial material existence of man.

What mind can take cognizance of that which has no materiality, and still an active independent agent.

To deny or dispute this principle of materiality, of the most subtle organization, etherealize it as you choose, is to deny most absurdly the existence of the five senses, the very gift of the creator, for all such appreciation of his creation known to mind.

Mind only acts in organization as known to our senses. The future veils the mighty changes, to clothe the powers of mind that must rise proportionately to the theatre of its operations and enjoyments.

Between this and the central and purest sphere, various gradations of rational existence must live.

The God of the soul, of mind, has created its full spheres of improvement to eternity, else his creation is in vain. As an all-wise Creator, he makes nothing in vain. The nearest approach to immortality of soul perceptible to our senses is in the mass of living matter, in the form of human nature, that propagates itself, and mind from age to age; creating on its own elements a hold in perpetuity, allied to its first character to this sphere, but with its animating principle advancing to loftier grades of dignity, approaching immortality.

The immortality of soul rests on the Author of immortality and creation, firmly guaranteed by religion.

The universe resting on eternal principles, yields in importance to man's mind, that is supreme in creation.

Most confident in the proof of eternal conservation of the first, the proof is conclusive as to that of the last.

The Author of the existence, commends himself through the principles and elaboration of the universe, for the guidance and guardianship of the soul in all things, that we can appreciate for our good, nor should we suffer them to be arrested by any intermediation or intermeddling priests and collusion of all others, however advantageous the result may be peculiarly to all of them.

Unlimited and untiring should be the effort by statesmen, philosophers, and good honest citizens, over the world, to give mind its best protection for the happiness of soul.

God is ever righteous and is proved uniformly great, in his whole system of creation, without express days for judgment only as identified with the vindication of principles and the disposition of their violators.

Let not trifles, conflicts, rubbish, or conceit stand in the way of an immortal soul, that wishes, with the best aspirations and feelings, to go the right way properly.

It is to avoid anarchy, chaos, and confusion, the nature and character of the animal, to see the clear light, that man, humble and unambitious of aught save his world's good, seeks to secure his soul's happiness on the only proper true principles, to bring about the best state of existence, and of the world's best feeling, of harmony, order, universal peace, that he seeks the best foundation on principles, in the adoration of their only author.

Where else can he find this pure and exalted treasure? Common sense and honesty, that make up reason, certainly tell.

Save mind or soul, all else of man is nothing but dust.

Mind cannot reach perfection on this sphere, and is ever increasing in knowledge if suitably situated.

The scene of mind's action is not in a perfect theatre, therefore mind cannot be perfect here.

As well ask for a globe free from the vicissitudes of the seasons, the piercing cold and wet, the melting heat and fever, the action of electricity, the gravitation of the spheres, as to ask for mind free from all the vicissitudes of the passions, and the storms that their licentious gratification arouses.

The passions produce the only reproachful slavery, and mind has free agency there against all absolutism, by their legitimate direction, under the wisest rationalism.

The mind perfects itself here to the extent of its capacity and the capacity of its circumstances, for the future benefit of the soul.

The mind sows, the soul reaps.

Man, composed of body and mind, must be analyzed and estimated according to that combination, just as God made and intended him. The balance depends on man's own intentions, for introduction through his merit, to a nobler theatre.

We ask for all rightful faculty practicable, correct at the fount of wisdom in its purity fit to introduce to immortal bliss, using no other than virtuous attributes fresh from the mint of God, that shows a living soul and breathes with immortal youth, having an elasticity superior to earth all the time, that mortality cannot reach and death cannot limit.

With no possible access to deity but by mind's highest inspiration through reason, at least not till another state of existence which has its own appropriations, more intellectual introduction awaits our leaving this world for that state.

The beatific happiness of another state fit for the soul, would be incompatible with the mind; the parts would not be in suitable positions.

We are bound to attend strictly to this, ere we permit an indulgence of one iota of complaint as to our location in this terrestrial sphere, which is adapted to our nature. He that would complain, is impeached.

God deals in the magnificence of the purest treasures, of brightest rewards, that belong to the universal power that we reverence, not in the magazines of torture and of penalties peculiar to man's perverted mind.

A sublime view is to be taken, a nobler theme to be estimated, that mind should exalt itself to God's standard, not abase itself in lowering that only divine character.

Mind in such contemplation is raised from its most moderate elements, to the highest capacity. The true position is that eminently consistent with itself, mind to soul-ennobling.

Its good deeds are elevated to rewards, the food of the poorest mental enjoyments rising by their elements to greatness. Analogy proves that.

Its arrested progress in all the allurements around it, even bespeaks a penalty, compared with its equals that have outstripped it in all the pure enjoyments of a legitimate fruition.

Time is their mind's best function, that must not be trifled with, but profitably employed in life's great cause.

All the rich gifts of mind, should be devoted to legitimate purposes, for soul's advancement.

Whether individuals will or no, omnipotent principles, as those moving the spheres, will decide and sweep all living minds in their current with a mathematical certainty, that mind cannot escape the conviction or the adoption.

The security is not put on penalty as the negative of good, that follows necessarily like confusion succeeding derangement of the solar systems, as the lofty and fair reaching of reward, the best incentive to a properly balanced mind, a durable memento for eternity.

What can subserve the purpose of a perfect being better, than the exactness of order, and the fulfilment of duty in its comprehension in all the Universe?

Wise unto its own salvation, the mind will not risk its titles to fee simple in happiness eternal.

Placed on an earthly theatre without its own assent or consciousness by an all-wise Almighty, who, therefore, alone is the responsible and competent preserver, whom none that are wise can mistake, in the comprehension of conservative principles, its will and agency however free, must act consistently thereto, or abide the necessary penalties and place itself back in its career for a just felicity.

The bauble of peculiar faiths or the delusions of superstitions of the moment, cannot satisfy such immortal beings. There is nothing earthly that can meet its rational demands. It leaves this earth for another life without its own assent, as the laws of creation are immutable.

All that mind has to do, then, is to meet immutable laws by immutable principles, the nearest practicable to its nature, and analyze their whole nature in time as far as necessary and practicable, ere conviction of duty come too late, when hope is expiring, and all may be deferred or protractedly lost ere life's benefit be secured.

All need the proper policy of insurance, in the quicksands of life, for the veiled future.

What has best availed for rational man in this life, must be the best qualified means for eternity. Created as the Universe is, its parts form one grand harmonious whole in action, and mind must soar to its highest points by these means.

It must not desert them at all, else they will fail it when none others are available.

MIND AND SOUL: THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN MAN AND BRUTES.

Mind is connected to all organized animal matter, supremely applied to man. Instinct, its partial form, is applied to brutes, that attain a certain degree of it at birth, peculiar to their species. Rational mind is universal; instinct is peculiar. Brutes are not endowed with innate faculties of religion, that is, then, the universal gift of all minds capable of being rational, the universal characteristic of rational man, that elevates him to his God, and bespeaks immortality.

If God has exhibited any peculiar favor to any chosen people, then that people had been distinguished by pre-eminence. But faithful history chronicles no such event, and truthful reason audits no such pretension. The remote nations of antiquity affected to claim for their gods a peculiar power, but this was all trick of the priestocracy, or of the people deceived by them, and seeking to deceive all others. It was only one of the many disguises of superstition mixed with patriotism.

The mind is the intellectual will, or that which takes cognizance of action. How important that all should be right.

The soul applies to man here and hereafter, and is indentified with mind, that characterizes it.

The soul is that part left of man after his earthly existence.

What is the state of existence immaterial?

That cannot be conceived of by rational and truthful minds.

It is needless for the world to hide behind mysteries, or that some theological questions cannot be answered.

There are points that reason can only approach by analysis or analogy, to a certain extent, and then stops as to creation, the universe, eternity, the soul, future spheres, &c.

The soul was not created in vain, and it would certainly only partially have solved its own immortal question to be limited to only this sphere.

It needs improved organization for intellectual capacity to reach the mighty problems, and other theatres.

Its greatest question is as to the security of future certificates. Its main great problem it can solve on this sphere. That problem its best sphere of action, social and religious.

What has been recognised, was so by the action of mind on mind, and all errors are subject to correction for ever by the same process, which peculiar faith absurdly refuses.

If rational religion did not only sanction but require this, she would not be the true religion, but an ignoble peculiar faith. Religion emphatically, supremely requires the immortality of the soul.

Who, then, can comprehend in their own minds anything existent separated from materiality?

We cannot separate the God of nature from nature. All such pretence of immateriality looks absurd in an extreme degree.

All things are comparative, but not less material in some degree, by mathematical and philosophical, the most exact laws.

The sooner we get rid of all such absurdities the better.

Grant the soul the subtlest organization, it must be material to be a soul, or vitalized existence. It has a noble organization, conceiving it to be the greatest gift of the universe, the brilliant diamond set in it, the soul, must be guarded with supreme care and fondest affection by its Creator. It masters progressively the attainable government of much of the elements of the universe, and is the master-work of creation. Immortality is essential for this performance.

The universe seems to be exhaustless to mind in its present organization, and is, no doubt, eternal, therefore the master-spirit of created being must have the greatest claim to immortality.

The reason of the soul's immortality is, it is co-existent with the universe.

Why should this magnificent creation of God's genius be extinguished, after all the perfecting elaboration of its potent munificence?

This must be the error of perverted minds, fond of their own vain conceits.

Its birth was the bright creation of its functions, its vital existence on this sphere was the free agency to display its character; and its passage through death was a purification, and an admittance to a loftier existence and higher theatre, a purer change from mortal organization.

The mighty genius of the Creator, that anticipated and satisfied all the loftiest purposes, immortal as mortal, of creation; whose mighty purposes elevate souls instead of sacrificing by bloody crucifixions his own attributes, a solecism as absurd as impious, will reveal the whole drama in consummation.

Mind is limited to time and its functions, and must be thereby limited in action for the present. The future belongs to eternity.

Though all material substance continues the same as far as our bodies are concerned in the world, yet that which animated them departs to a nobler sphere on its intrinsic merits.

None have history in matters beyond the grave.

Death parts the body from the soul, that departs to the appropriate sphere of appropriately organized beings, that can no longer dwell among those composed of body and mind, no longer associate with earthly beings.

How absurd, then, to suppose that ghosts and spirits can be appreciable on earth!

Sound intellects that are honest must deem that impossible; as mind refers to the present, soul, or immortal organization, refers to the future state of existence.

As to the position of the souls departed, that question must be wisely submitted for solution to God, who created them, not to peculiar faith notions that caricature all sacred things. But what shall be the scale of punishments?

They are more or less certain on this earth; but as some do not get their full penalty, justice requires other spheres of existence for the appropriate theatre.

The very means adopted to complete selfish designs are those of penalty and severest punishment to nations or individuals.

God is a perfect being, and perfects his exalted works in appropriate time. Among them the immortal soul is most conspicuous.

The concern of all conceding this should be to save it best and properly. To seek messiahs makes it worse.

Man needs God's power, mercy and purity to assist him in the best employment of his judgment and conduct.

None but a properly educated people yeomanry can stand up properly for their rights, and for the purity of the human soul, uncontaminated by vices, as perjury, murder, felony, and treason. The lazaroni cannot.

As to the soul, is there not a material existence involved? What else can we conceive of?

What conducts it in its genial position?

The same power that originated it, who can re-endow it or renovate it, in improved condition of appropriate organization.

If the universe be eternal, proved by its essential character perfectly strengthened by its constitutional union, how much more shall the soul be immortal, that is of more value than the universe? If the dissolution of the first bespeaks imbecility of design, what must that of the last?

If the condition of all in the future is equal, intense must be the purification as a trial ordeal ere that point be attained.

What is the soul if not identified with the mind, that must commune with God, for it is only by that his inspiration operates successfully?

This is the sensible inspiration of God's spirit, his principles in the best of enterprises, that mark their influence on the age and the whole world.

To suppose any other is to be deficient in faith and reverence towards God, the giver of all good gifts.

The constitution of our mind is such, that it is rewarded by the soul's happiness, if right, and punished by its sufferings, if wrong. The very nature of conscience's analysis proves the whole position, as that remorse inflicts the deepest penalties.

What is the soul? It is the immortal element and principle that refer to mind, that act with free agency, and is accountable for that action. Its existence on this sphere is exhibited by mind, that at death is more or less purified, and traverses other spheres as an organization congenial to its own kindred elements.

This earth is only a part, but peculiar faith sectarians make it most by peculiar appropriations.

An excellent proof the soul's immortality is, that as nothing is annihilated, therefore we have the best data that rational mind cannot be. Is not that the base, the flower, the soul, the matured fruit?

Is not the mind-element immortal, the body going to its original elements?

Nothing is made in vain by the Creator, and nothing can be annihilated.

That is all that we know of the resurrection, as we have no demonstrative proof otherwise, and have not reached a sufficiency of science to decide according to hopes of immortality with a perfect demonstration on facts verified. It seems a matter of omission of duty of culpable character, merely to look at the state of this earth, and use no exertion by deeds farther, for future happiness of the race of mankind, when the mind just begins to expand as a flower, the fruit not maturing for its earthly existence.

It seems, then, bad taste in all who must appreciate that only the human mind or souls can reach the holy centre, that man should not soar above the soulless state of mere brute creation.

As honesty demands the payment of daily debts in every respect, both in money and duty, we cannot escape those of gratitude and religion to the Creator, the universal creditor.

The earthy parts of man return to dust, but all that remains of soul and mind, the immortal part that scans the highest matters of the universe, must embrace the noblest destiny and purpose.

Immortality of the soul has come to be admitted nearly by universal consent of mind, or by the best conclusive evidence from the worth and essential character of mind that precedes in excellence, the universe.

The excellent perfection of God is proved in the perfection of the soul by immortality.

What is the human mind but the greatest gift in the universe? Is it not such as God created it? Let not the first be tinkered with, nor the last libeled by botches that cannot explain the first attributes.

The first is in a state of progressive improvement, from the mass of intelligence.

We must analyze and know the mind, the soul, its capacity, character and quality.

We all admit mind to be liable necessarily to corruption, as what could be baser when perverted? Then we must advance all the principles to prevent that corruption. Do not all those conservative principles refer to an immortal tribunal?

Any others, as peculiar professions, will advance its corruption.

Take mind from the universe, and the brightest light is extinguished. What then is the universe without it?

ETERNAL PUNISHMENT!

That seems cruelty unrefined, gross, vulgar and destructive, whereas God's principles are conservative!

Who knows of future punishment, of spirits, &c.?

Much has been advanced of a kindred spirit, to other imperfect views.

Does man, humble and ignorant, know God's attributes but by his works, to define them properly, and lecture on them skilfully?

Moses and his coajutors undertook this, and gave a miserable portraiture of the universe and its creator, a complete botch of presumptuous ignorance.

You must seek to be better off than priestocracies, in your bigotry in after ages.

Will you then punish a man forever for a few faults, and carry him back to eternal punishment? Will you undertake to affirm that all will finally be saved, after punishment?

If you have doomed them to your hell, such inmates will hardly be fit for any heaven.

Fortunately we are all under God's protection, and must act up to the best lights before us.

The best actions will insure the best and safest position. But where will the worst characters, as the wilful murderer, adulterer, tyrant, seducer, and other vicious characters go? The Creator of the Universe will manage all that, to the best benefit of all creation.

The soul must account for the misdeeds of the mind. God's eternal justice requires it. The Creator can master the point by mind.

Though cannibals have very inferior souls, in what are they worse than nations that destroy, by wholesale, thousands of the inoffensive people invaded, by arms and weapons of offensive warfare? Those nations miscalled civilized, too!

If cannibals have very inferior souls, what sort have the priests, who assume to be the necessary factors of God, who never asked such impostors once?

Who is best off, piratical nations of war, savage cannibals, or fraudulent priests?

However are proud nations and nefarious cliques, cabals, and clans, above man's punishment, God will decide that question appropriately. Bad and vicious men cannot enjoy divine favor, and God cannot contaminate himself therewith. They must be properly purified, ere they can reach his pure and holy presence, that is certain.

Peculiar faith among its many peculiar creeds may demand the doctrine of eternal punishment, that is hardly credible to rational religion in her liberal and just appreciation of God, who requires all rational, not slavish actions.

What rational minister could preach any of the doctrines of predestination?

Is man accountable here and hereafter? Yes, both, without doubt. I must therefore conclude, that the soul is then immortal, as many do not receive the punishment due them in this life.

The Universe cannot be annihilated, and that in its bosom must be eternal.

Man's body becomes dust. Where is the mind, the soul?

That must be superior to the Universe, whose elements it has to command.

Mind annihilates space and time, the difficulties of ocean by navigation, neutralizes the deadly effects of electricity, and masters it for the telegraph.

The atmosphere is rendered subservient to mind's power in steam and philosophy, and all this is surpassed by its competent command of the best principles of constitutional government.

Mind corrects its own errors, and acts its paramount duty in religion to God supreme. These are masterly deeds that reflect a gift analogous to creative power. And shall the sophistry of man control its superior power? For whom was the universe created? Mind or intellect. And shall that sublime creation burst into a life-death, a nullity? What is the soul, but the mighty controlling free agent placed on earth for a time?

What gave impulse to animal matter? Deity, the Creator.

Accountability does check all that transcend principles.

Accountability and scrutiny should run in all public matters, otherwise frauds can be perpetrated by impunity. Where is then the tribunal for all such?

Rational mind must do its part, its highest duty, in all its departments.

There should be no suppression of public inquiries.

He who wishes to come to the point at once in rewards, must abide by the appropriate penalties that must purify the offenders.

The idea of purgatory accompanied as it is by money, is corrupt, a base and degraded church speculation.

Religion is not a plan to make money out of the friends of departed souls. Speculation libels religion.

What is the operation of the spirit?

The influence that accompanies the suitable operations of mind. After all, it is no more or less than that of God. Our bodies go to the dust, but our souls that exalt man above the beasts, should merit of God their happiness in his Almighty's hands.

In the tuition of the bible of rational mind, exclusion from the presence of the Almighty in all future existence will be punishment enough.

Mind, the soul identified with body, seeks satisfactory knowledge for the rest of the soul when separate from the body.

We must read all creation, to learn our best destiny.

God could not have formed compatibly with his attributes, rational mind for evil—that is a libel.

It must have been for good, and the security of the greatest amount is in immortality.

Rational mind seeks friendship for all the best purposes, bnt who alienates the good of society, violates the best principles of kind, and affectionate friendship of mind?

Those opposed to universal rights of mind.

Mind, as ignorant of the future, must rest for immortality of soul on a just and rational hope, securing safety by virtue with the most active avoidance of vices.

The soul is a part that belongs to its author, and of course will follow the proper current of eternal principles.

The rewards and penalties of the future accord with past acts.

The dignity of the soul's salvation is established, not by especial but universal grace, and its right, through creation.

We should seek the best cultivation of true religion for our immortal souls, that emerge from earth as a transition from one state to that of another, that to become the immortal part must perform certain functions of mortality, as a matter of probation, for which mind must prepare mind and secure by the best deeds of merit.

These functions are the action of principles, and cannot be of mere abstract faith.

Principles are as eternal as the universe; shall mind, soul, their living superiors, be less eternal?

As to the soul, this being God's noblest gift to the universe, he will do the best for its happiness.

We must adopt the noblest view for this greatest gift, as appropriate for its exaltation.

Mind must return from this world all that can be embraced as the holiest offering to its Creator, worthy of its immortal endowments.

He who gave the soul must expect its most worthy tribute. Its immortal tribute is most worthy of Deity, its Immortal Creator.

All rational minds have more or less universal impressions in their souls, of God's spirit, and are to account for cherishing it in the best possible manner.

After all said and done, mind then does its duty.

The jewel of the universe is soul, that polishes mind, in whose preservation is conscience. What a blessed re-action!

Mind's future hopes prove all its best future responsibility and accountability. What can best secure social and moral duties, but religion that absolutely requires immortality for retributive justice?

But when is reform needed?

The people must seek all that is practicable at once, by all suitable frame-work.

It is not only for the past we must sorrow, but must wisely act for the future, during rational existence.

Illegitimate pleasures cause us to miss more than half of life's enjoyments and comforts.

How miserable is it to find that we cannot extricate ourselves after the deed is done.

Innocence is a pure flower, a true blessing.

Life is a continual trial, therefore none are exempt, however situated, from an intellectual, moral and religious watchfulness, the eternal price of a man's soul.

Who can dream of defeat on principles, and with the mighty power of will?

A future state of the soul must disclose to more perfect beings, what it has only an anticipation in this life.

If we did not believe on rational principles in the immortality of the soul, then we might see the disastrous effects of self and mutual destruction, and a brutal degradation without conscientiousness of proper approbation, nothing to hope for.

But there are many circumstances to be regarded in this subject.

However partial, peculiar and unjust a God the doctrines of election make as miserable libels; however incompetent the faith, if universal salvation is to meet the case of pirates, felons and cannibals, blasphemers, traitors, human tyrants and demons, without the most exact self-atoning purification, still rational beings, cultivating their conscience, must feel accountable most justly for the future, and must hail the immortality of the soul, mind, a position that invokes, commands the practice of principles to commune with God.

There are many questions to be adjourned to the tribunal of the Supreme Ruler of all. Man has no ability to decide them satisfactorily. Time, the only prophet of God, will teach the wise.

The candid mind seeks the proper position in regard to the soul, faith, God, or any thing else.

It decides to believe the only living witnesses, God's sacred scriptures, which are God's works of the universe. This is God's book, teaching his sacred principles.

It cannot believe man's fictions, but God's facts.

All others are dead, absent, ignorant, perverted, impostures deep and full.

Man is demoralized to adopt, degraded to propagate, simple to rely on, and vicious to follow them.

Mind that is to be immortal should not be the stupid dupe of others, nor the rabid and bigoted partisan, for which it may repent.

Let mind look to a right cultivation of mind, and its right exertions—as the only agent of communication with creation and its perfect Author.

For the very reason of our faith in the immortality of the soul, and its accountability here and hereafter, we seek the true way, and can never yield the true for the spurious proprietor.

We can adopt no other, whilst our mind is sound and independent, and reason prevails.

The code of rational faith in regard to the soul is one to be realized in the chastest and profoundest view of its Author and attributes.

All the codes of peculiar faith fall miserably far short of justice to truth in the initiative! What must be their position at the conclusion?

All their references are the stupid caricatures of immatured ignorance, gaping at wonders, miracles, that science and philosophy abhor or contemn!

From the best rational observation of the operations of this world, mind must be drawn irresistibly to the conclusion, and acknowledge as certain retributive justice, adequate but rational, and reject volcanoes and Vulcans, hell and the devil.

Souls as immortal may traverse the universe to appreciate Deity, and while the purest may enjoy beatific spheres with inestimable happiness, the impure may have to be purified at first in more appropriate ones.

A correct appreciation and improvement of religion will prevent the correlative sacrifice of myriads, who have to expiate their sins by future atonement. Cannot God save all mankind and bless them with happiness? He has made all creation for the good of the greatest number, and that is the whole. To do it in the most perfect way, requires immortal fruition, especially as it was gratuitously created. God renders his universe available for good, and dispenses, not so much endless suffering, as a temporary purification by suitable penalties.

Where is the limit to retributive justice?

God alone knows; its universal result is for universal good. The greatest good of the greatest number in God's universe may embrace all rational beings in degree, consistently with God's capacity, and in all respects with his attributes.

All past speculations that invade the premises of God's attributes in the least, ought to be scouted from the face of mind and truth.

Beware how you teach and innovate on God's attributes, as you may become the libeller of a Being perfect in truth, honesty, goodness, justice, mercy, will, power and wisdom, immutable and infinite.

You can plead no bibles of tradition, no priestocracy for authority to libel God or his attributes.

What did God create mind for?

Not for eternal punishment and misery.

Future retributive justice will most certainly cause a separation of the good from the bad, else the good could not be in a pure enjoyment, and might suffer in contamination from the bad.

But the bad may be only relatively punished; God alone knows. The penalty of conscience by remorse, is worst of all.

The ideas of mind, that is, the gift above the gift of the animal, give mind the most powerful reason to believe in the immortality of the soul. The Bible of Mind is the safeguard to life and immortality, and carries in itself the genuine proofs of its own intrinsic character.

But the Bibles of tradition, the work of absolutism, in collusion against the people, were intended to deceive and delude the human mind and nothing less, to cut it out of its own proper Bible.

Under this despotism the sovereign people have been punished as heretics, who were purer and better than their judges.

The body, the organ of mind, enters the tomb of earth on death, but the soul or mind passes to judgment and due appreciation. Then comes the value of its capacity or philosophy in resisting all the various phases of temptation, all the improper influence of wealth, the delusions of vice, the fascinations of sin, in having looked properly to itself.

Well may it have been if the party concerned, the soul, may have never appreciated any scripture but God's book of the Universe, caring to hear, learn or read no other than what is rational. The soul then has considered all others as matters of contingency, unworthy its regard, not permissible in a vital and essential matter that requires certain proof of all points affecting such important rights.

The soul requires all things to be put on the broad platform of principles, and no contingency.

The right action of mind alone constitutes accountability and responsibility of mind.

Mind, that is the agent of the soul and body on this earth, cannot embrace correct principles, without an education appropriate, which is a matter of necessity.

What do the advocates of peculiar faith know or care for the correct analysis of mind, as long as they can secure the profits of self-interest in its circumscribed views?

A gradual amelioration may bring out safely all the souls of existence, as a proper retributive justice may leave the immortal soul to its capabilities and the ultimate attainment of the intention of its creation, the elaboration of the mighty theatre of its usefulness and sublime existence.

The end and means of this life, is to liberalize man's soul. Many are so contracted, that they seem hardly to have a soul.

This world is not the permanent abode of mind, that else had been matured on brighter auspices.

Why should there be a re-union of soul and body, at any final judgment day? All this seems the height of absurdity.

The soul here is mind embodied, elsewhere its organization appropriately suits appropriate existence. The final judgment day is still more absurd, as that is commanded by retributive justice more promptly and wisely.

A previous suffering and purification are instituted, under retributive justice.

Why should the soul, after leaving the body, not meet immediately appropriate final judgment?

Why should there be any intermediate state, except by peculiar faith doctrine, that seeks to be benefited? Why two judgments, when one can meet all the exactions of justice much better? Any other assignment of the soul implies that God is imbecile and unfit for his measures, and reflects on the puerility of those that dream in this way. How long shall peculiar faith libel God, in all his departments?

It will be, until the mind of science disperses all the fogs of her ignorance.

No doubt all souls needing it, are purified progressively by penalties.

God, according to his attribute of mercy, that shines most brilliantly, irradiated by his supreme intelligence, cannot seek the mere punishment of this world's people, so much as to purify them for reception of future and permanent happiness.

All must be purified, to reach the pure God, whose central residence is fortified by perfect purity.

But how deplorable is peculiar faith, fanatical and bigoted, that creates the worst features of its creation, to exclude God's creation from the fairest portions? It deals in currency so belittled, that mind revolts at its disgusting pictures.

Mental and physical retribution, must be paid by all created rational beings.

All good and true citizens are interested most deeply, to rectify religious faith properly, and divest it particularly of superstition and man-worship.

Its benefits will be estimated, when we see it is the most difficult matter for rightly educated minds duly cultivated and confirmed, to get their own consent to improper actions.

The evil-fund must be met by the mind-fund, that joy may be more substantial and misery less permanent.

The capacity of the faculties of the soul for ultimate perfection by the progress through the Universe, demands as a prerequisite its immortality.

Its character for perfection is indispensably fixed, at its advancement to the centre of perfection, the abode of Deity himself.

Who is recompensed on this earth for his duty and toil, slaving labor to man, but for reciprocal good and benefit in this world, as absolutely essential as keeping each sphere of the Universe in its respective orbit?

The hope of future reward in another state, is an invaluable recompense. Nothing short of God can satisfy an immortal mind, certainly not this earth nor all its treasures. The day of judgment should be every moment in mind, reflecting on itself.

Absence from God's abode that is in sight, or banishment and exclusion from seen extatic enjoyments of the blessed, would be the severest punishment inflicted, but all this might comport with the low views of a vindictive priestocracy, while the enlightened mind aspires to see the greatest good to the whole, and all practicable opportunities afforded erring and polluted souls to ultimately attain their best position through all necessary purifications.

The soul has to seek sincerely the highest attainable position, when it believes that all such abide in its appropriate sphere permanently and substantially.

The immortality of the soul is a thing of paramount interest to mind, that only begins its lessons on this earth. How can it expect less? It is mind that recognised creation, and appreciates all practicable, in the age of its existence.

Enlarged in its capacity, receiving purer and superior accessions of organizations, as it progresses in eternity, it approaches still nearer its adorable Creator.

The soul may be purified to the subtlest point, still it is defined by specification.

It honors nature, and thereby honors the Creator, the God of Nature, who honors it most by most honorable immortality, a justice that honors both.

What constitutes the mighty adoration of intelligence, the difference between the animal and man, between matter and mind?

Souls in the advance and progress of their improvement have congenial spheres, and a proper comprehension of their duty and the penalty.

What can be the proper position of the soul, short of immortality? It is our sincere belief and wish, that the soul be considered immortal. It is too short a time on earth to perform its functions; nothing less than eternity will answer or permit their maturity. An earthly sphere alone, cannot do justice to the soul-problem.

But the soul exists, and can the soul be annihilated? Is it less than the thinking principle? The soul is identified with eternal principles. Is the soul immortal? Who is not anxious, to receive demonstrative proof thereof?

It was made to little purpose, if mortal, to breathe a miserable existence short of immortal happiness. Could the Creator create an anomaly to himself?

One of its clearest defined positions, is all self-improvement on earth to its noblest elevation, and then all will be on the safest position for the future.

If all mortals should avoid giving unnecessary pain to brute, much less to human beings, extend sympathy to all suffering, and humanity to the really needy, how much more will the God of nature do justice to mind-creation? Religion is due between mind and its God, immortality and happiness are due between God and the soul.

Irreligion and immorality may prevail on this very point, that may make life wofully and decidedly unsafe and miserable, if there were no belief of the soul's immortality, and no future state for its accountability and responsibility.

The present question demands facts, not mere vague speculations, as in bibles of traditions. All things are made subservient to mind, that must be to its Creator who has regulated the universe right. Let mind do its duty.

This sphere is too contracted for its display. The soul leaves this theatre, ere it has accomplished its important mission. The body is only subservient to the mind on this sphere, and all creation is subservient to them, in a measure.

Mind is created for best and most efficient purposes, as the noblest work of Deity. It would fall short of all that, if mortal. What is the theatre for the soul's functions? Must it be confined forever, to the earth? Can it then reach the universe?

Does the soul have any reference to any appreciation of the universe? Did it not, it could not appreciate the noblest qualities of the Divine Creator.

Mind is the divine gift of the God of nature, and order, system, law and principles, are its theatre.

This world is to be made a blessing by mind, that is, to embrace by philosophical science all that civilization can expect. We adopt the immortal existence of the soul, as most just to creation of mind. Why is there virtue, if the soul be not immortal? For social good only? That is but a partial comprehension of the God-gift. To comprehend less than the immortality of the soul, brutalizes mind, and blasphemes God. Creation was no soulless enterprise in the matured elaboration. Be the classification of souls what it may of future existence, the divine arrangement cannot be less comprehensive of all the universe, to which mind is an immortal ornament and blessing.

Has the mind the soul to appreciate the character and attributes of Deity? Then it has to traverse the universe to do so, and must be immortal to meet this exhaustless subject that spreads to infinity as regards mind, the embodied soul, but not as to God.

See the aspiration of the soul or mind, never ceasing after happiness.

This world is not an adequate theatre. But it is claimed that the immortality of the soul can be proved by the bibles of tradition. Of course if it can, it will be a rational proof, and no other, and this is the category of all such bibles' proofs, as far as they have any to be relied on.

Fortunately those books are not proveable, and therefore they are necessarily discarded.

Prove any bible to be the word of God, and all the rest follows. If such be not proved, it is the most felonious imposition, because it involves blasphemy, hypocrisy and perjury. Of course all that pretends to be bible-proof of the immortality of the soul, is only an assertion, not proof, valid in the court of conscience. Queer book, that, that robs mind to prove the soul immortal.

You see your soul towers above animals, in having a higher and exclusive order and gift of organs.

Now are you the brute, that you are going to place it in jeopardy? Is your soul brutal, that it is to be annihilated? Can the thinking principle be annihilated? Have you forfeited by your extreme brutal crimes, all rightful claims to any immortal felicity?

Is your soul of so little account that it should perish? The best reward of the soul is a future dispensation that sanctifies its mighty character, and vindicates for all merits and demerits.

What is the world seen through the mere position of sordid interests, the grovelling of corporeal actions, unconnected with the noble connection, the mind, the soul?

All that is presented, is not above the mere animal nature. But let the true character of man, as mind imbued with the highest principles that rational education presents him, and the whole is embraced in truth and reason.

We must respect and analyze the noble defences of patriotism, the pure acts of benevolence, the personal risks of soldiers, sailors, mariners, firemen, and all such, the universal sympathy of nature, the worthy responses of the soul through the best tributes of the human family, and acknowledge that it quits its animal connections, to be allied to purer essences. The noblest deeds of man, reflect the sublimest impulses of the soul. If it was created for the perfection of the Creator's glory, surely its terrestrial initiative cannot give it by any means. Who so low as to believe that mind was created merely for animal purposes?

The idea is grovelling, low and vulgar indeed. Can low actions suit the soul in its individual or social relations? Individualize the soul all you can, socialize it all that is practicable, still of all feelings in their various vicissitudes, those of principle are they that delight the soul permanently. The fountain source is the Almighty. Rational beings must consider maturely how much is perishing matter, in this sphere of existence.

What is the soul, material or immaterial? How can it be the last? Souls may be put back, but the worst is that souls put themselves back, in the immortal race. Now your mind was put in the right way by God, will you go to the perverted ways of man? Will you permit priestocracies tamper with your immortal souls? Will you act unworthy of mind? But what is mind? Is it the effect of electricity on mental organization? Electricity is the atmosphere of mind, whereby it reaches the universe. Electricity is one of the grand agents of the universe. Soul is more, far beyond all such. The soul passes through a series of purifications. Man, who is nothing less than soul embodied, was created by God for the most comprehensive purpose commensurate with his unit attributes. That most comprehensive character, is immortal felicity. The more imbecile soul is longer at arriving at perfection. But how is it with those souls that, like fruit, may rot ere matured perfection?

Has God created a soul in vain? Shall a mortal grant general amnesties, and not the Creator, who must love his creation? God the creator, must delight in his own works to the intensest affection that declares immortality of the best. God would have created man lower than the brutes, to have given him mind capable of immortal deeds, and yet incapable of immortal fruition.

Vast must be the difference correspondent to individual quality, in the relative position of each soul. While that of a Washington may be countless degrees above the Neroes and Caligulas, his soul may have to traverse a vast number of spheres, to reach the centre of purity. The materialist may speculate upon the excitement on the mental organs, by electricity, yet the power to create and originate thought, bespeaks a supremacy to gross materialism. There is no time in the soul's existence that it ceases to go on forever, if it do not impede its own progress. It must pass by reason of the change of death, to its immediate functions. Death is a mighty change in this world, and a veil that separates souls from embodied beings living on earth, is more or less a purification and preparation expedient for nobler operations. While on earth, we must talk of rational operations. Mind accompanies soul. The old idea is exploded, of soul returning to its last dust; no, it passes on to other spheres of existence. What can cause the idea of happiness? The soul-world residence in the centre of purity, must furnish a supreme state of happiness of course, where must be perpetual and perfect peace. What an idea of spirits remaining in the air, because some of the foolish ancients considered the heaven, the heaved-up, their place of abode.

Shall God exalt the stars of the universe, and not exalt thy soul? Shall he deck them in all their perpetual glory, and not invest thy soul, his greatest work, with all the noblest of his treasures? The great problem of the soul never was properly vindicated nor verified, till mind was untrammeled from all the dynasties of malign influences, was made a proper free agent, by having the only comprehensive means, rational education of both sexes. But why so concerned about your soul peculiarly? All else except the necessary cultivation of intellect and practice by the best actions in religion, are mere priestocracy suggestions. These stupid bigots must advance with mental science, to correct themselves. Who could promise himself much in correcting bigots? Who originated the soul but he who provides for its immortality, as well as all the time with superabundant grace, that scouts messiahs as impracticable, merely local? All this shows the God of nature, of creation. What botches are the priestocracies, to assume any of mind's, much less God's prerogatives! There can be no unmerciful punishment, much less excessive or eternal.

The followers of all peculiar faith will find themselves most awfully mistaken at a certain time; as delinquents, they cannot go into the pure residence of Almighty God without their titles are exclusively prepared by him. God can put the mind to a better use than to unmerciful punishment. Can you analyze the nature of relations in this world, and the universe? You must rely in due humility and confidence on Almighty God, who provides therefor. Mind is the gem brilliant of creation, and proves by its supremacy its immortality. It has just begun to develope its energies and assert its triumphs.

But what is certainly known of the soul? Nothing on this earth, by any peculiar system. The only best earnest is provided by its almighty Creator, providence.

The soul, in state of purer organization, goes on through purification. Time is the great function of mind and life; eternity is the great function of soul and immortality. Whence came mind, or soul?

Surely it is as easy for the God of nature to create its organizations of investment anew, appropriate for its sphere. The God of the universe has provided for the soul's future position. The mature development of Divine Wisdom is best attained by the immortality of the soul, that is part of its function. its best function.

Death is the mighty change of mortal man, to free his immortal part, is the purification for other scenes of existence more or less happy than this.

Because the rational mind is endowed with faculty of rational religion that binds the soul to God, it is endowed with immortality that refers to the immortal and total duties due to God. Religion only commences on this sphere of action, and is incomplete as its performance is incomplete of immortal action. The functions of the soul are to carry out this essential whole duty to God, and that is always, forever. If the soul be deprived of its immortal existence, God is necessarily deprived of his appropriate whole soul-adoration. Mind has a conscious existence. The very idea of free agency implies ability of diverse actions, and for the most comprehensive purpose, no less then than the universe and to all eternity. The mind has inherent motion, and a living power. What is the mind and functions, the soul?

The soul, however subtle its organization, must be respected as organized, sublimated existence. The elements are of organization, however subtle. We must follow truth and nature, not blind custom, nor faith that is absurd credulity.

This position does not involve any of the points of gross materialism. The Creator can even renew that soul in a far more glorious and exalted organization, of the loftiest intelligence.

The soul is the immortal part most sincerely believed in, the most refined organization.

Should we take a partial, that would be an unsafe view for the full comprehension of the right estimation of this whole subject? In future existence, the soul may appreciate Deity's magnificence—here it cannot. Brutes have an electrical, men have an immortal soul. Man's body goes to its original earthly elements, the soul or mind goes to its immortal elements.

What is the soul of itself nearest to? A God-like existence.

God having created us of his pleasure and supreme wisdom, doubtless will see and cause our souls to be cared for most effectually, by his own universal attributes; less than that, cannot touch the subject or question. The soul-machinery of the world is moved by God.

As all rational beings are created for some highest purpose, and that could not be limited to this earth, but must be carried to the fullest capacity of a universal theatre, of course the Creator endowed mind with the freest rational exercise of its functions. The best souls reach the centre of creation's purity soonest.

The least good are doubtless longer reaching such purity, and pay proportionate penalties. God can purify by the functions that are expedient. Death, the mighty changer, is one, the law of our nature.

This is the sphere of our probation; other spheres are those of retribution and recompense, or where the triumph of immortality abides. The mighty attributes of mind, came from the President of nature, of mind.

Which can take care of a man's soul, his own cultivated mind taught to comprehend by exact knowledge its duties, itself the God-given guardian, or the self-given priestocracy, who may be by contingency also ignorant, depraved, corrupt, self-interested, and of no account as they have no such functions.

The world may constitute a guardian of mind as it is, but it can only be by principles, and so must be estimated all its citizens, else they are positively impostors.

Mind has to ever regard the final great exaltation, the access to the great central sphere of purity and perfection. The highest means of most happiness as of right and merit to man would be, the certain endowment of immortal existence, an immortal soul.

To secure this happiness aright, he must secure by the very best means of virtuous and religious character compatible.

God, the creator of the immortal soul, had the sublime conception and power to carry it out.

In what does man excel all the beasts? By an organization of mind that becomes soul appreciating God, endowed with religious faculties.

These are life-problems, the solution of which, is in the best life-actions, thus to resolve what is the living principle, the immortal principle, &c. We have to defer to God, and there our humility is perfect. This is something that is an adjourned question. Are you prepared to solve the whole problem? Are you ready, is your mind embellished enough for the future conference? The present life only serves for introduction to the next. Individuals can define their own introduction. Shall the acts of mind live, and not the substance? Mind conceives immortal principles, which animals do not know. Shall mind become extinct, when principles live? Shall the inferior survive the superior? The soul is in ever constant advancement from one desire gratified to another, the end the means, having unlimited enjoyment, and capacity progressive for that enjoyment.

How ignorant must peculiar bible-writers be, to prate nonsensically about idle matters, being estopped about the God of the universe, they have only their own peculiar province to enjoy and that not possibly to be proved. The God of the universe rules out all peculiar gods. We do not believe in any such confined place as purgatory, much less hell, the chimeras, idle dreams of visionary monks and priests. The holy centre is for independent soul-existence, to progress in all compatable enjoyments. Mind embodied, is inquiring and analytic, but is not capable as soul-organization of enlarging in its intellectual capacity. Here we are confined to five senses, but how constituted and exalted, soul has to realize to solve by future data. Unless you give mind its inherent worth, you cannot give soul its consummate felicity. It is the priestocracy that assail its dignity, and detract from its worth.

This is only a mediate theatre for a nobler existence, for the embellishment of mind and improvement of soul.

The soul's work is self-purification on the merits, continued grace of its Creator, who left it his impressions, creation's birth-right; and who supports it in all its future progress. Let no counterfeits or pretenders step between them.

The soul seeks the greatest degree of happiness attainable, of which nothing is made in vain.

God's goodness, intelligence and power vest the plan of salvation with himself and self free practicable agency of mind. It is utterly impossible to vest it elsewhere. We feel satisfied and gratified that we came to know the right analysis of this subject.

God cannot in justice eternally punish a human being for effects of his weakness. Eternal punishment cannot be for temporal crimes. The soul only begins to blossom, to be something on this sphere, hardly getting the elements of its start, much less of its height of progress, and has to mature in other spheres. If this were a perfect sphere, where no vice or misery existed, then all had been right; but free agency, under the circumstances of creation, and a suitable physical state, evidently not suited to perpetual happiness, declare that a future blessing is in the last great change of man through death, which is to transport the disembodied soul hence.

There cannot be any enjoyment of equal felicity by the good and the bad encicled in the same sphere of soul-existence. The mind progresses in soul and self-purification, and its future state is best adapted for that progression. The universe is open for that purpose, and the result can only be verified by the individual organization.

There is no need then of encircling this mixture, when the universe is exhaustless. A future existence looks most rational, through the facts presented of the Great First Cause. Can less be expected by rational minds? But the noise about the soul is the effect for the profit which is considered by too many as temporal. You need not find fault, when there is so much to amend. The Creator must have guaranteed the soul's highest interest, and that is nothing less than the universe. This earth cannot satisfy the mind, the soul; it cannot give, it was not arranged for immortal felicity. The greatest comprehension is that by the immortality of the soul, to reach which the paramount questions of the world must be considered.

That the soul is capable of existence in future, and not formed in vain, as resulting from its creation, it must be formed to sustain that existence in all its richest and glorious beauties and enjoyment. The more we appreciate God the Creator the more we love him, and the immortality of the soul, and its eternal happiness, must promote that in perfection.

The best earthly position of the soul only presents a dissatisfied gratification, a resulting inquietude. It has to solve a universe problem, and nothing short of it will answer. But do we mean absorption of the soul to God when it reaches his holy presence? By no means, when each has distinct individuality, having separate and distinct functions to go on to eternity to solve the eternal problem, with expansive intellectual progress, morally and religiously, to enjoy happiness, to gratify the expansive goodness of the Creator, who has created an infinite variety of spheres or orbs for intellectual residents. How shall the soul possess such locomotion? How came it to be created on this spheroid? The Almighty intellect that placed it here can remove it to its appropriate place.

There are universe agents, as electricity, light, gravitation of systems, and principles that move the universe. That is a minor question.

Neither can we enjoy perpetual happiness on this spheroid, nor appreciate, with our present intellectual organs. God is an immortal being, and has endowed man as the best of this universe, with an immortal soul, for the noblest object of creation. This is sustained by conscience, that proves the soul. Animal life attains the extreme of its capacity in this life and world, while the mind only begins its rudiments on this earth, its sphere is in the future, as nothing is made in vain. It is rational to believe that mind needs much of data that it cannot ever get in this life. The future must be for it. The immortality of the soul does not depend on the supposed proof of the authenticity of the scriptures. That is an independent question, that refers directly to God. It is desirable to have all proved that has a bearing on the immortality of the soul, to have admission as the fixed purpose of ethics. What is the human body worth without the soul, the thinking part?

Legitimate death is the great solvent to life's miseries, and procurer of future blessings. It is a glorious change, most wisely instituted by the Creator, to consummate supreme happiness of man. It should be brought about in the right way. No mortal can escape it. What will not retributive justice bestow on the murderer? What forbids his sustaining all the penalties of the murdered, that is deprived of future best changes? The systems of rewards and retributive justice, compatible with the circumstances of creation, are, doubtless, the soul's state. Death, with mortality, would be a bitter scene for the gifted and virtuous mind.

Each soul must discuss both sides of the question. But who will not look upon any dogmatist as a monster worse than Satan or Belial—character as pretended, to oppose such a principle? Who can explain the connection of mind to man? Is it material? Is it a part of God? Pantheism may speculate, but we conceive of an efficient existence, the subtlest organization created.

The soul has conscience, its sacred function, and reason to lead it to truth, proving it an element, a distinct though complex individuality. At death, the immortal part reverts to the decrees of God. But how about the proper distribution of the soul? That is God's business, not man's. God could at once renovate after death, as at first he creates its investing organization. Mind is ever inquiring, never satisfied short of immortality, as identified with the universe.

The mind's mission cannot be short of the universe problem. Mind in the world is like a diamond set in a large casket. Antoninus says, that "the faculty of the generative vitality is the eternizing principle." But this will not meet mind, an individual element. To elevate, not crush, is the attribute of Deity, who formed nothing in vain.

God created the soul without its concurrence, having done so for its best good. Surely to confine it in endless punishment does not accomplish the wisest, most humane, or just purpose. The soul's creation was for the best available capacity. One sphere will not answer—the best, because necessarily essential, is the universe.

What can be worse than the state of that soul that feels and knows it is doomed to some adequate, not perpetual punishment? What are all the world's treasures compared to a mind's innocence?

What is heavier than a soul's guilt?

Why do we live on this earth? To give our souls the proper culture; otherwise, this theatre would be a blank. The mighty problem of this life is more than world-wide, as great as that is to give the greatest good to the greatest number. This is in abeyance to mind, soul, virtue, religion, happiness. What is thought, but proof of mind and soul? It is the thinking part, that looks to immortality, and proves the superlative magnanimity and munificence of the Almighty Creator.

A belief of future rewards and punishments is essential to the best earthly position, the best security for mind's best appreciative action.

The soul or mind is created in vain if the soul be not immortal. All of the earth would be animal, and that adds no glory to God.

We shall have the real optimism only in another state of existence. Brutes think. They have memory, and that is part of mind, though animal. Brutes cannot be free agents, and cannot be held responsible therefor. If man be of any account, he has a soul that looks to more than animal, and more than animal's sphere.

How do you appreciate the soul is immortal? I believe that the proof is incontrovertible that it is immortal, because I believe most positively in the perfect justice of God the Creator, who certainly exists with pure attributes. He created the soul of his will, and will do it justice, which can only be done in the solution of the universe, not one world-problem. A rational being does a bad act here, is only partially punished, therefore retributive justice meets him in another sphere.

Many have comparative misery here, and can only look for reward elsewhere. To merely stop here would be most imperfect organization indeed.

In the punishment of the bad, some get not their rewards, nor are men capable of judging them correctly.

Many are misjudged, and suffer as victims to perjury.

The greater the mind, the greater the soul. Beasts surely cannot possess immortal souls, as they cannot be free agents.

They have decisively an animal sphere, a mould, as it were, that is exact, no more or less. All their tuition is imitation. Their mind is animal self-preservation, an earthly consideration. They are subservient to man's use, and best fill that as their destined function. Beyond that they cannot go. The greater the claim have they for man's humanity.

A God is mirrored in the magnificent munificence and construction of mind, that is so sublimely elaborated for genius, science, philosophy, and religion.

What are the mighty functions of the soul?

Death is a change from mortality to immortality.

There is no limit to the progressive magnificence of action by mind in the world, but the soul has to depart to sublime spheres, to solve its universe-problem. The soul is rational, and requires all rational means, not the credulity of faith, to reach its rational destination.

As fire has a quality of heat, so has mind a quality for religion, that best prepares for another state of existence. We believe in the immortality of the soul, because we believe in the exclusive unity of the Almighty, who makes nothing in vain.

Has man as a mere animal to sustain animal life, to have the refined sensibilities of his nature to perceive the relations of things, and be amenable to all the powers of thought, all the vast conceptions, to have all this in abeyance to the worst state of existence in all the vicissitudes of life, and to become extinct at the moment earthly existence ceases? Is not mere animal nature, that of the brutes, superior in that case? The soul must be an immortal entity. What can you make of a being, man, without an immortal soul? An animal? The conglomeration of the animal? What was that creation for? To dwarf God's glory? What a libel! To have the perfect creator, perfect in all his attributes of wisdom and intelligence, to have his most exalted earth-creations mere automata? To rise up and decay. What is the use, the good?

Man may teach the animal various mechanical things, more or less, according to its sagacity, but that animal cannot improve on it, nor teach its fellow animals. The animal is moulded to a certain routine, that the whole race thereof is distinguished by, forever.

But how can any prove that animals are not entitled to souls, and a soul's position? They are subordinate and in a specific sphere, for souls' use. Can they contribute to the exaltation of mind? Their sphere is limited definitely, and the first animal is as perfect as the last, except as to certain facilities of animal fibre, improved by animal advantages. If they were entitled to a soul's dignity, they should have the principles of ratiocination, but they are for certain animal, mechanical purposes. Are they for any thing more? If so, the advocates should prove it. The soul is for the universe-problem, the highest subject worthy of mind as of itself, and its mind is so constituted that it can only reason on phenomena with ultimate correctness. What are the functions of animals, but satiety of appetite and propagation of its species? Will these satisfy the immortal soul? The question spontaneously arises, at death, if not before, who and what are we? The animal extends next to the lowest organization of man's nature, and man extends, by mind's elasticity of ultimate capacity, to the highest order of organization. Where is that?

It is not visible as existent in this sphere.

What, then, are we to conclude? That it is in another state of existence. Death then must be a change, a passport, to that state of existence, of the immortal part, the soul.

The succession of generations keeps up the continuity of mind that thus always exists, but the reality of soul organization is elevated to its own spheres. God's creation is his pleasure, and that he will dispose of as almighty Omniscience knows best. What is the ultimate object of creation of the universe, of the earth? Can it be less than the highest attainable good? Can that be attained, by the shortest or longest duration? But how is it possible to render the soul immortal? This earth is not prepared for its immortal happiness. Then another scene is the one fitted. It is a singular phenomenon that any thing short of rational religion will not begin to do for mind. What, then, is the position? Ultimate relations, in the last great change.

One of the great principles of matter is, that it cannot be added to nor diminished. How then can the soul be translated to other spheres? By the best of course of the various universal means, most obviously. Our best affections originate a hope about immortality. Affection lingers around this subject, and rationality confirms the best appreciation of the rationalist.

How came we here on earth? For some ulterior object? What can be fully accomplished here? Is not this a scene for future preparation, the state of chrysalis? Change of life is change of state. The universe is exhaustless, and could not God adapt mind, soul, as here? In this, God has illimitable power, beyond mind's conception. Will he not act to answer universal requisitions? Relative orders of intellectual rational beings may fill the scale of existence in the universe, from the lowest intelligence to that which stands next to God. How are these in regard to another state? Has there been no advance? Man's mind does not stand still, as about that time it declines. The organs decline, through which mind's functions are displayed. The soul needs a better organization and sphere. It seems that the constant progression of mind from generation to generation will not answer for the soul's immortality or requisitions.

Religion is an institution of God for the human mind. Can brute animal mind recognise such? Is there, then, any thing in common for their final disposition? If any religious cognizance could be taken by the last, then we might discuss the final question as much as lies in our power.

The animal enjoys the good things of the earth, but the mind of man contributes to their origination, culture and multiplication, enjoying the subservient benefit of the animal. The whole makes unity of design. How can we prove that there is nothing made in vain by God? From his perfect character and attributes. But is man made perfect? He is made in perfect accordance of fitness to creation; were he a god on this earth, he could not be contented with his situation; as it is, he is desirous of a higher sphere. Mind is made then as it is, excluding all the false pretences of libelous bibles. Who can justly criticise one iota, the whole creation? The very attempt impeaches its propriety, as the whole question cannot be solved on earth. Nearly all nations, it has been remarked by others, seem more or less to have an idea of a future state impressed on their belief. The nearest we can come to the proof of a future state that I know is through religion, that only presents a partial completion of God's whole design, requiring the universe-solution to complete the problem. How can religion, God's own problem, be solved but by immortality of soul? How is it possible that mind should stop short, and neutralize God's whole comprehension? When the Creator gave life to rational mind, he instituted it as the noblest creation, and compatibly with his own sublime attributes gave the greatest good to the soul, and to comprehend the whole, that was for eternity.

Retributive justice must be equal, and equitable here or hereafter. If not practicable here, immortality is certain, and the soul is the illustrious being. This is well proved, because God is perfectly just. We know that proper justice is not dispensed here.

The soul is taken hence in all ages, and under all circumstances, to meet another state of existence. We know the God of the Universe by what he has done. This state of existence only advances the soul to prepare for action. Monotheism, practical, not professed, is a provision of the soul, to adjust itself most sublimely for all eternity without doubt. Conscience bespeaks the existence of man's soul. It may be callous by peculiar education, that teaches superstition and peculiar faith. Rational education can only fairly elicit, to the noblest aspirations of its creation and Creator. What conscience is in man, instinct meets the wants of animals. They are the conservative gifts of the Creator. Instinct premises self-preservation here, the soul both here and hereafter. What essential learning do we get of Moses of the immortality of the soul? This is an illustrious proof of the soul, through religion, the pure creation of God-inspiring mind. To elevate man to the highest, God doubtlessly gave him a rational soul. Man and brute differ in this, whereas both are created for wise purposes. Man may become irrational by peculiar education; the brute is rational all the time of health by instinct. The law of nature is correct reason, to govern rational beings.

By the unity of design the mind is the recipient of the religious law, that is orthodox right reason or judgment, with nothing insidious.

We recognise in all rational minds, souls, the materials for morals and religion. I go for all the soul, that is possible to be proved and saved, and as I go for all the perfection of Deity and all the holiness and purity of religion, I cannot possibly conceive of a Messiah or a peculiar faith, other than the interested invention of the world priestocracy. Of these I have friends whom I respect only as men through God's kindness and grace, not through their supposed actions.

They speak of righteousness in peculiar faith, that damns itself and all its advocates by their blasphemy. If man can prove the immortality of the soul more clearly than what the facts of cause and effect warrant, then let him do so. But he can avail himself of no other truthful means, in the Universe.

Mind, soul, is a Universe problem to be thus elaborated. Mind's free moral agency, gives us the idea of the immortality of the soul. It is in the circumstance, of conservative principles. The immortality of the soul is necessarily the result of God's perfection, as he creates nothing in vain. How absurd, that He, the Creator of the Universe, as the Great First Cause, should endow mind, as the chief of earth, and of course of creation, with all the habiliments of destruction, misery and suffering, when as Almighty he could accomplish its infinite perfection and happiness. The thought is a libel on Deity.

Mind, the embodiment of soul, has to accomplish its glorious mission, by appropriate use of all its faculties, and seeking thereby the best earnest and security of all desirable in the future.

The immortal soul must desire the choice parts of the universe, and all that can render them desirable. Its main question is the appropriate preparation.

He who undertakes to deny the immortality of the soul, to first do so effectually, must deny religion, an utter impossibility that puts to the deepest scorn, the atheist and polytheist. Their feeble and meagre pretence must certify that mind's mission is only to the world alone, and not to the universe, that the supremacy of mind and the sublimity of the Creator most clearly confound.

The pure organizations of Deity, place a halo around the immortal soul.

Mortality implies injustice to soul from God, who requires of soul as the best earnest of immortality, its best religion. This, the universe police requires.

Rationality impels mind to its duty, where sophistry cannot, as exemplified in the history of the Jews, that ran after other peculiar gods besides theirs that the priestocracy invented themselves, composing the most efficient eating and drinking portion.

All peculiar faith is what is made by such, the world over. All their books and contents, all their teaching, are no more than other oracle false pretences. Churches or temples cannot consecrate, but partake of all their desecrated fooleries.

What a mockery of mind, humanity, creation, would mortality of the soul be? No mind most rational aspires to less than the purification of the soul, its pure organization in immortal bliss.

We must look at the capacity and property of mind, the most elevated organization—an immortal element possessed of functions, principles, and attributes, elevated most by its most refined purity to reach most refined immortality.

Do the priestocracy treat the mind as becoming immortal, to continue it subservient to this odious, fanatical, degrading compulsion of faith? And yet they take away reason from mind, the noblest position for religious attainment and elevation. Mind to reach its best state, has to be fully guarded against all such, the various schools of its perversions. It is utterly impossible for the mind to be inferior to principles, that are pure as God's functions and attributes that are immortal. Priestocracy trash, bibles and creeds, are unworthy the dignity and immortal purity of the soul,—for when we talk of reason and mind, we must embrace all their most legitimate and enlightened capacity by rational education on this earth, that must yield in due time its soul-treasure for ecstatic enjoyments. Mind, then, cannot be too guarded in such an invaluable jewel as the soul, committed to its most rational care.

FAITH.

The position of Faith without reason, would establish a miserable state of morals.

It would be inconsistent with the lights of mind, not enslaved by feudal vassalage and man-worship.

Who makes any proper impression, religious or other, without mind and reason?

What gives the brightest jewel in religion, an enlightened and pure conscience, but mind?

Can you successfully address any mind in religion in any other than rational principles? But faith is a mystery! Religion, then, is a mystery!

That position impeaches the character of the mind of those asserting it, the sincerity of mind affecting it.

Man's systems of peculiar faith affect to be mysteries, prophecies and miracles, while Deity's religion results in the purest and plainest best action of reason, proper sense and truth, that exclude all such clearly. None but the most arrant humbuggery can deny this—none but hypocrisy can knowingly do so.

God's works decide this test question.

Religion is rational duty—is that a mystery?

If peculiar faith, that is blind credulity, is to prevail, how can we know the difference and the merit between sectarianism and true religion?

Why was any reformation original or subsequent, unless founded on the vices of the parent stock, and the relative merits of correction?

Why prevail so many orders and sects of peculiar faith, in all ages and countries?

The inference to the contrary, is a suicidal position.

When peculiarity, selection, election, or partiality, is advanced in any system of faith, that moment all such is self-impeached, as libeling the universal attributes of Deity.

Intelligent freemen cannot overlook their own best advantages, the pure gifts of mind, that give the best faith by reason. All other faiths arise from improper sources, as fear, superstition, base passions, but what good can all that do? It must do harm.

Reason brings with rational religion, the adoration of God. All others bring in their train idolatry or man-worship.

All such being a host of evils, shown in the sorrowful history of the world, misdirecting the mind's devotion, character and communion.

And what is that character, among the best systems, short of the true faith?

Where is the intrinsic protection, but in the fundamental principles, that respect the only supreme authority all the time?

The essentials of faith are reasonable and just. Pure and sincere men aim to be right, but are too often deceived, misled, and sorely disappointed, under any existing regime, that leaves out principles essential and conservative.

Freemen need what mind can receive, adopt, and faithfully defend for ever, on true conservative principles, that have their full inherent and intrinsic elements, that always vindicate themselves and triumphantly protect all espousing them.

Our faith must be properly founded on the nature of creation and Creator of mind, the Universe of things, time, matter and eternity.

When time, that discloses the motion of each revolving sphere, and eternity, that sublimely speaks for that of the Universe, declare unmistakable facts, mind in due humility founds its unmistakable faith in the God of Nature.

Man's professions must be appreciated, as referring to silence, while his actions declare their character in all necessary respects.

But some who have not fully analyzed this whole subject, might think that it made but little difference what faith mind adopted.

A military despot who sought the conquest of the world, might affect this selfishly, degradingly, and hypocritically, in being Mahomedan, or Christian, or any others, as circumstances governed him; but a freeman decides otherwise on principle, as he respects dignity of character and the good and universal peace of mankind.

There can be from the very nature of things, but one true faith for religion in this whole world, as universe, and none but that can ever keep the people united in one brotherhood, peace and general good-will throughout the globe. As well assert that there can be two or numerous principles of gravitation for the preservation of the universe, as for man's pretences in numerous faiths to conflict with God's certain laws of principles, the very quintessence of rational religion.

What chaos and confusion at once there would be in the spheres, as what endless bloody results on earth do prevail from such false views of faith.

There may be innumerable faiths of superstition, but the unity of faith identified with religion, is as indissoluble as the unity of God mirrored in the universe, whose very name declares its character.

Superficial, nay, awfully deficient must that mind be, that asserts the contrary, an opinion not worthy the name of principle.

Yes, it does matter with mind what faith is adopted, for rational beings only, need and must have the right one.

If false ones be adopted, never can the proper elements of union be disposed of, as the volcano is always subject to eruption, for there are the materials in the magazine of conflict and war, strife and bloodshed, ever disregarded by charlatan bigotry and a soulless superstition.

Many are nurtured in creeds and faith of peculiar education, compelled from force of custom, habit, authority of the family, social circles, public perverted opinion, priests and state by absolutism, to do that which their reason revolts at above all things.

Tyranny, essential despotism, has kept peculiar-faith alive.

Many are forever enslaved by ignorant custom and barbarous fashion, and most stupidly as most insincerely, adhere to any taught faith not inwardly respected nor duly respectful to the Great First Cause.

Unfortunately authority is brought as stupid, that one faith is as good as another, only let the believer be sincere. This is the language of irrational minds, in abeyance to peculiar-faith, tyrant of reason.

Hence we see many changing from one sect to another, and actually dissatisfied with all of that class, not independent enough to declare for the pure rights of mind and its rightful deductions.

No emoluments unworthy an immortal soul, whether in church or state, no public enginery of superstition and inquisition, should cause acquiescence in bible untruths, to restrict mind in full respect to God alone.

No future worldly rewards in any place or emolument, should bribe, no brute force should bully, no insidious sophistry should seduce mind to permit impositions by any bible of priestocracy, on the people.

How much in this world that should premise one universal brotherhood, demands mind's truly conservative exertions for correct faith and action!

There will be many opinions about peculiar faith, how can mind combat then successfully and rationally, to attain to the right one, as there can only be one right?

Faith with no analysis or analogy of reason, is absurd. The Mormons, if cotemporary with the bibles of tradition, by aid of that credulous age that unfortunately is not peculiar, might have just as good authority by record, for if we believe their disciples, they have saints, patrons and prophets too.

They are only the younger, not less authentic tribe. It is only a peculiarly increased credulous age of ignorance that is needed, to beget all the miracles of superstition. The light of science expels all this, as the sun dispels the fogs of night. If the world was deeply skilled in philosophical science, superstition could not exist. Let the lights of such science be then diffused. How then can we mortals distinguish all such peculiar faiths from the right?

By one universal rule, by right reason, and that alone; and when any person or sect advances, for a moment, faith over reason, that moment decides that character dishonest and untruthful, for it is irrational.

The greatest absurdity and difficulty of any age is to deny what conflicts with preconceived opinions, backed especially by self-interest, whether they lead to the worst of superstition or criminality. All such faith must be criminal.

What demoralization, to say the least of faithocracy that comes of priestocracy.

What can you do with any mass bigoted to peculiar faith, that enervates the mind and destroys its noble manliness and independence, inherent? Truth is not sought, and religion is not improved; hence the good of all is to be superseded by that of the first dictating opinion.

But, say some of the older faithites, the Mormons are superstitious. Are not all peculiar faiths truly so too? being based on the rankest superstition?

There is no difference, unless action decides the conduct.

But, then, the tenets of the Mormons lead to vice? But do not the tenets of all peculiar faiths lead to the same, only as the light of mind prevents?

Mind, the beneficiary, is in everything in the universe; if perverted in faith, that faith is peculiar; if good, that faith is rational, for its Creator is most rational.

We see the consequence of conflict of faith in Mormonism, that produced war and disturbance in several States already; not that all the other peculiar faiths were less obnoxious to rational faith. Rationality is the only means to effectually get rid of all such.

If we allow due credit to the bible-faith of others, they must be bound to furnish proper reasons, or have that faith utterly rejected on that principle, the only path of safety for mind.

If others allow us due credit for our reasons, of course they can, then, say nothing about the certain conclusions. All minds must be in abeyance to reason and philosophy, and be silent to their teachings and requirements, consequently the faith that grows up is the legitimate consequence, and not manufactured to order of priestocracy.

But "faith is the evidence of things not seen, and the substance of things hoped for."

Now, all rational minds can only hope for reasonable, just things, and confide reasonably in unseen things. Any other faith is not worth the thoughts of mind, for its fruit will be of no account, but most noxious. Substantial results can only accrue on substantial basis.

Respect appropriate to all rightful authority is the first principle of rational religion necessarily to be right; then faith is identified aways with reason and reason's God, a fit companion in the universal whole, and can know but one God. Has peculiar faith ever acknowledged this principle? True religion investigates and reveres true authority.

Mind decides, on reason, that faith must be just and right to be faith, else faith becomes nonsense or untruth. Faith rests on eternal principles of right and justice, that rest on reason and reason's God, whose attributes are right and justice in their purest sense.

Hence, no messiah can be smuggled in at any time under the pretence of sophisticated faith.

God is immutable, necessarily consistent, never inconsistent. Wherever his authority prevails, and that is as far as the universe, man's error about faith must be corrected.

Faith and reason cannot possibly be inconsistent in any respect; if there be any error it is book or man's opinion. The book opinion, as man's peculiar written opinion, is abominably false.

The cognizant facts of faith and reason unveiled, rest for mind's cognizance on testimony that must be consistent, else the testimony is inconsistent, and necessarily to be rejected in the highest earthly court, that of conscience.

If any testimony offers plurality of gods, it is inconsistent with the conservative principles of the universe, the highest known to mind.

That testimony impeaches itself, as self-destructive.

There must be an end of such testimony, and it is ruled out in respect to reason's God.

That testimony is also convicted of impure morals.

That testimony involves impiety and blasphemy towards the Most High God, and imposition on man.

That testimony commits high treason towards mind, in destroying its independence of sophistry, in production of man-worship, that excludes the pure duty towards God, of mind from itself, to receive the tradition of others on their mere assertions and perjuries, without analysis of the facts on rightful reason, and reason's aid, analogy.

In faith, the sum total of belief founded on facts, else the faith is identified with the fraud, the right mind requires a sound decision, and God commands it eternally, or God has never given mind, nor its best protector, reason.

Faith received on any kind of tradition, that skulks from reason and reason's God, is demoralizing and criminal.

Proper faith can be most clearly defined, without mistake.

Could any organized resistance exist in the breasts of any refined people, who enjoy a correct and beneficial true constitutional representative government, to that government?

Never if that be wise, for all others fail to benefit the most with the greatest good.

If that position apply to civil institutions, how much more forcibly does the argument apply to divine rights of mind?

Who resists true religion, the highest duty to the Supreme? Can any sane person, if a good citizen?

Can any such resist the true adoration of Deity, and his highest, holiest attributes? None.

Well, who are they that do resist God in his exclusive attributes? Sectarians, and all those of peculiar faith.

What is to stop the whole error?

The conservative revolution of free intelligent mind, acting on mind rightly, productive of proper faith.

The highest victory of truth rests on moral and intellectual grounds, and on none other.

How, then can the advocates of pure religion call for blind, peculiar, impure belief or blind faith, but from fraud, superstition, sophistry, falsehood?

If the foundation be wrong and perverted, the result will easily be foretold as corrupt.

The tendency and facility in all such communities will be most easy, and too common to perjury.

Such will be the inevitable result.

Banish from society all such banes as fundamental and organic errors and sophistries, then we institute the soundest judgment, and make the most important move to reach the noblest principles of truth and honor.

Then will good and wise men estimate all in the balance of morals and intellect, or mind, and the result will be right by proof of all.

Nothing less than this can satisfy the immortal principles of creation, that is ruled by its Conservative Creator.

No faith that is pure then stands the test but one that gives a wise and sincere adoration of Deity.

All others fail, as earthly.

Religion is made of principles, not maxims of mortals, not messiahships that cannot apply to the universe, but are most alien thereto.

Principles are the only safeguard in man's faith and actions.

It is very clear that no Messiah ever instituted principles, that constitute religion.

God instituted all at creation, and mind has to elicit from these God-given treasures.

Then all messiahs must be arrant impostors on mind, which they cannot save, and on God, whom they rob and blaspheme.

Most systems of faith have been the cause of deeper iniquities, and created higher necessity for penalties when they deviated from God-adoration.

Can history begin to paint to us all the blood of millions shed for such in past ages?

The people no doubt would have been much better, but for the false leaders who sought to pervert their minds under the fell influence of ambition and avarice, that have misled the world to its deepest punishment.

What was the character of inquisitors acting against those men who were too honest to prostitute their faith? They were rogues and impostors, killing others, their equals in faith, whose sacred principles cannot be violated on the basis of reason and truth.

Shall philanthropic world-patriots yield to the narrow-minded, weak, corrupt, and self-interested, when they ought to exert a proper, wise, and redeeming judgment?

There is no system of redeeming faith, but a proper creed in the one eternal Creator and his proper attributes, that can encircle all persuasions into a proper basis, confounding bigotry and sectarianism. Away then with all false creeds and heresies at war with reason and rational principles.

Give us all rational religion and science, or give us none, no superstition nor craftship of priestocracy.

Where once the pageants of absolutism through peculiar-faith and dictatorial power, mere factions of assumption flourished, rational discussion on the broadest principles of mind will rectify for the world's good.

Where power assumes her various disguises and wiles, sinister influences and corrupt practices, none but virtuous minds and manly breasts can be rescued by potential conservative revolutions, that can only flourish on principles. Faith of things unseen can only be analogous to reason, if it be not, then religion cannot embrace men of rational minds. When we take things on trust, it must not be blindly, but in a rational and trustworthy appreciation on rational investigation.

This thing of faith is a delicate question for fear of its being a false one on false data, that it must be, inevitably, if peculiar.

All rational beings must have a rational faith, that must be the invaluable diamond of religion. As religionists, they must positively assert their superior and infallible claim to true religion.

We have an infallible and tangent standard of orthodoxy, that will assure us all that we have, that which will prove faithful to the end. Now what is that? The only test is mind and reason, that can carry us all to the true issues and nothing else, whether our faith be that of superstition, man-worship, the Musselman, Juggernaut or Mormon.

Where religion begins, mystery, miracles, prophecy and oracles end; this is the proof universal to mind, that is not vassal to bigotry.

Now faith can be so perverted, that the powers of government and the pretensions to religion can be accounted by the interested people, natural, no matter how absolute!

The principals and the interested deluded people, are to be the judges! With them, there must be no rational discussion and decision.

Mind duly cultivated by suitable civilization, must come in, to repel all such delusions and perversions.

Those that say we should not reason on these points because faith is advanced, abjure all principles as unprincipled swindlers of the people's rights.

People are very conceited in their selfishness about faith, as if theirs was to be the best. However powerful for a time, no such position will be more than mortal.

Analysis discloses enough to actually astonish many, to find most of the world so vassal in most matters of opinion, not having the boldness to do otherwise than follow others who must speak first.

What but clanship will disturb society, till relieved of sectarianism?

Then watch yourself preferably to watching others, and adhere to universal principles, your conservation.

It is bad enough when man has no interest to deceive, as he has to watch himself to protect the truth in omission and commission.

What must be the necessity for watching, when his interest and that of others' corruption and errors mislead him?

It is difficult to divest ourselves of the trammels and modes of customs, but the wisdom is to get rid of errors. All faith emanates from reason, or ends in absurdity and crime.

The mere profession of peculiar faith makes nations at this day, hostile and inimical to others, though all claiming to be republican. How else could the French treat the Romans as they did?

The principles of such governments do not clash, but the faith does, therefore it has erroneous basis of religion.

Faith that comes to rational minds by reason, rests on eternal truthful principles.

Genuine faith must be an act of the understanding, that receives the right perception of all objects.

Divine faith is supreme assent, founded on the only revelation by God's works.

That faith declares that there can be but one religion true and rational, all due to Almighty God alone.

But this faith produces only one universal brotherhood, where then will be the loaves and fishes of the priestocracy? Appropriated to more trustworthy objects.

All faiths only approach true religion as they approach the requisitions of enlightened mind, that acts for God.

The Islam faith causes sincere protection of persecuted national refugees. What can the christian faith do more? This is religion despite of peculiar-faith.

Any other than rational faith being illegitimate, all foundations reared thereon are illegitimate and untrue.

Any faith that leads to belief of peculiar miraculous dispensations, divine inspirations, prophetic declarations and subsequent fulfilments, must be inconsistent with mind's true position on earth, and God's exaltation in his holy centre. All such is too peculiar for mind.

Are beings indisposed to change their tenets and sectarian views, it is because of relentless faith that modifies conscience as self-interest directs, and thus are they steeled against all kinds of conviction, all light and unreasonable impressions remaining inflexible to their opinionativeness and peculiar-faith, whether emperors or clergy. Bigotry is the coin of despots and dupes. They wish for no new light, the old faith must not be superseded by any evidence, no matter how rational, as the whole machinery of church and state power is the best for autocracy and peculiar faith, that cannot on the best analysis, be considered other than superstition, is with them religion. They never consider that true faith can only abide in reason and truth, the best ministry of God.

Who has the true faith? He who has the true reason. But what does absolutism care for that, provided that the faith perpetuates her powers?

Why does faith diminish, or become extinct? Such never can be more than peculiar, and because reason diminishes or has never existed.

Whether peculiar faith assumes to be imperial, as it is arbitrary, none can be orthodox, as it is not true.

No faith can depend on custom, authority of powers or numbers, but only on intrinsic worth and merit. No human dictation can control true faith, its essence is in God alone, the author of all good, otherwise there can be no end to the systems of superstition, miscalled religion.

The spirit of the age is only right as the reason of it is right. Unfortunately the world depends on the judgment of others, that too often requires almost absolute correction.

The ways of speculation in faith, the mere politician, are those of the hack and charlatan, perverted and crooked, not trustworthy.

Make honest capital, out of honest purposes.

Such persons employ their capital and labor in bad ways, with no profit, that if well employed might redound to fortune and fame of all.

Shall this thing of peculiar faith, the exploded humbug of priestocracy and the dangerous toy of absolutists, still prevent the rightful action of the world?

Faith is a curious mental problem, becoming opinion, and deluding most of mankind that cannot investigate on all rational principles too accurately.

Innumerable faiths arise from varied caprice, whim, device, ignorance, error, malignity, vassalage; speculations of interest working the whole, whilst there can be but one right judgment, and that predicated on enlightened mind's decision, reason.

With most, faith is ever paramount, as self-interest is paramount, as sophistry is paramount, with a bigoted speculation.

Humanity, truth, honesty, and science, will teach the only safe doctrine.

When faith unites all sects, that would otherwise be in violent hostility to each other, then there are unity of God and his principles exclusively operating.

In some countries the Jews as Jews cannot sit as legislators, as in parliament in England, while Jews and Christians can sit in a divan or municipal council of Mahometans.

Now a Universal brotherhood, through rational faith and its religion, would at once decide this paramount duty for the whole world.

The main question is not what opinion is your faith, but is it the pure faith in the one Creator?

All confidence of mind, in faith, must be by truth and reason.

"The evidence of things not seen, and the substance of things hoped for," rest on testimony of unimpeachable character, no less than that of God, and determine in God alone.

God is a perfect Being, perfectly wise, as the First Great Cause must be self-existent, beyond which analysis and analogy, daughters of reason, cannot go.

The wisest humility, then, causes the rational mind to be at once and perfectly self-resigned into the glorious supremacy of the Almighty.

Men's assertion of their faith offers not the least reason for acquiescence in its supremacy, unless its principles practically prove it conclusively. Few have calibre of mind and character to warrant acquiescence, as their works and general character are to be estimated, appreciated, and deemed accountable, for themselves.

Mind has to depend on Supreme Principles, that exclude all usurpation and imposture.

The people must open their eyes in regard to faith, and judge properly for themselves.

Too many are followers, not original thinkers. We can take no cognizance of the truth or falsehood, but by mind and reason acting on the process; all other pretences are demoralizing, hence faith must be degraded not to submit to this principle. The conscience is the guide all the time, and must not that be directed aright by rational education. God gave its innate faculty full and adequate to such reception, to mind's demands and reason's requirements.

Now as education is the discipline, and as that discipline may incline to perversion of self-interest and ignominious custom, then reason is to act and re-act forever, on the great funds, the treasures of mind.

The education in peculiar faith varies as men's faces, if not governed to the one great essential Cause, on which reason turns.

Even savages recognise laws, reparation for murder, all from mind, that in all its varied states, from innocence and purity to crime; from ignorance to error; from brutality to civilization, is in abeyance more or less to rational restrictions.

Even the Emperor of China, miscalled celestial, brother to the sun and moon, has faith, and that especially, to exclude what belongs to mind and reason.

To compel the faith-adoption of the reigning world-dynasties, absolutism of church and state ordains its various inquisitions.

To cover up its felonious brute force, it marshals all its miserable fanatic sophistry. Citizens, explore all.

What is the standard of truth? Reason.

Through what means? Mind, cultivated to the most exalted capacity of its intellectual qualities.

Why do you discuss, speak, or read, but on these universal principles, to convince and act out mind's part?

Can you without mind convince, and can you best convince without the best exercise of reason?

Mind and reason exalt from one state of society to the other of the four, to the height that of civilization.

Mind and reason extricate the savage, for a more civilized state, from the errors of faith and its education, by their safe funds, to enlightened principles and their education; upsetting the tyranny and vulgar pretensions of peculiar faith in all ages.

But for mind and reason, with all their faith and its bibles, the past nations of antiquity would never have been rescued from the dark ages.

The faith of absolutism binds the world to its despotism, its mandates and its iniquities.

That of Russia binds the people to government of an autocrat and the church of the Greeks.

That of Rome upsets the will of the only sovereigns, the people, and crushes their only divine rights, under the rule of its brutality.

That of France has made her forget her own position, and caused her to play the hypocrite and tyrant of the world's privileges.

There is no end to its corruption, as there is no dignity in its aspirations.

Nought but the light of mind, of right cultivation and purified reason, can raise them to the dignity of Creation rights.

The only way to escape the subtle wiles of insidious sophistry, the degrading power of priestocracy and all its hierarchy, all the world's absolutism, that perverts, corrupts, or misrules, is by mind and reason, God's gifts.

The day that exhibits mind's reception of any faith, without its reason, proves that mind is reckless and wickedly blind, stupid in its folly and crime, and even more.

No genuine faith can arise without genuine and rational proof of the truth; the reverse is foolish, absurd, and false.

When faith is sought to be forced on mind without reason, that person is impeached for blind faith that he has already adopted; his sincerity is doubted, and his faith looks dishonest.

But faith in tradition affects peculiarity; that spoils all, and that mind cannot recognise.

All such articles of creed and dogmas rest on arbitrary views, whilst all that rational religion asserts, are triumphantly and liberally referred to the code of reason.

What reason stamps is a perfect passport—all else is rejected.

Faith is any and everything, as interest and sectarian education peculiarly dictate.

But some may affect that one faith may be as good as another, as the best may have the best Messiah, as Christians having Christ for the Messiah. That position is most conclusively condemned, as all such steps are acts of most disreputable disloyalty to God, divesting him of his attributes, and contracting his divinity to a sphere more limited than his creation.

The very idea of trinity, that is common to the Vedas and other bibles, not being a plurality of polytheism, is an absurdity, sophistry, subterfuge, an evasion of most outrageous pretensions.

Force your family, children, wife, or relations, the social circle, or your country, into dishonest faith, and you damn your world.

Monarchs, force your subjects to union of church and state, and you damn your state to intolerance, persecution and inquisition, inconsistent with free and just principles, and only tolerable as mind prevents the odious despotism.

God's theology is not to create man's theology.

All systems must elicit principles to arrest the illegitimate results of popular passions, and remedy the evils of society.

To wish the people converts to idle faith, is base faith.

Pretences to religion on faith not rational, are made to eradicate morals that are social.

Faith is to be kept between conscience and God, not between mind and mind, as all peculiar faith is. Faith has nothing to do with mind and mind.

If wrong faith exists, what else than sophistry can exist to support it? Sophistry will prevail, unless rational mind counteracts it effectually.

But the mystery of faith!

The God of mind gave reason, not mystery of faith. That is as clear as that reason governs life, if mind is to be respected.

When man tells the world, that it is not to reason in any respect about faith, that man is lost to reason, self-respect, truth, honesty, virtue, above all, to rational religion.

Impressions of faith should come by intrinsic merits, not by any foreign support, aided by sex, passion, nor improper influences.

Let us have no dogma, but all only as reason requires. To admit all that we can obtain on this source of God is enough as essential, for to go beyond or less does not redound to God's glory, nor our dignity of candor.

The ancient vassalage of faith was by misfortune and ignorance arising from the brutal and barbarous state of the times, but now it is more degrading from the people's own fault.

If shame attached to the ancients for their foolish superstitions, how much more so especially to the present priestocracy for their criminal continuance, and to the people for their stupid adoption, with all the lights of science before them.

The walled town of faith, cannot exclude reason.

The inside barbarians will have to yield the question. They can say nothing more than is justifiable by the state of creation facts, and consequently must keep their tongues still, as they are not and cannot be justified by honesty and truth.

If the intelligent world were called upon to estimate any one quality necessary for its good, it would have to say that it is truth all the time, the very foundation of all rational faith, for a lie originates false faith all over the world.

How, then, can that part of the world be better, till all concerned learn to speak and teach the truth? Her primary benefits are universal, while the low habits of falsehood and sophistry, will lower the world generally to the end of infamy, that perjurers must sustain.

All belief or faith to be valid, is through reformation of mind, an act of inspiration on mind by influences productive thereof.

Those who refuse reason to faith, must refuse truth beyond doubt. There can be no faith established by God inconsistent with both, for that is impossible. Then faith, without truth and reason, is worth nothing at all. Who is the author of faith? God. Will he institute any peculiar faith that rules him out of his power, and mind out of reason and truth?

It is ineffably stupid to suppose it for an instant. Yet all messiahships do this! Of course they cannot stand, while all rational things are possible with God. Then all irrational faith is credulity.

But then, faith may be historical, saving, or any other. If God spoke any such, all such must be most rational, all depending on the testimony of truth, his mouth-piece, and must be estimated accordingly. But all bible of tradition faiths are irrational, and therefore, never spoken by God. They are untrue. God's position rules them out as counterfeit.

But the abundant superstition of the world may oppose all proper duty of faith founded on reason, as that superstition would arouse much of the world. All this is in antagonism with reliance and confidence in omnipotent truth.

What rational mind is afraid to investigate, as that is the only way to reach the truth, by equal balances? What is mind worth, not to act as mind should do? The world asks us to declare for some faith—and if we do not declare for its purity, and discard all superstition, we are not just to ourselves or our minds, our duty, our God.

In faith, as in lands and worldly possessions, we have to look at the right titles, else the whole is not worth the time and thought devoted thereto, as all such are necessarily defective and imperfect.

Faith in God cannot possibly arise from prophecies, visions, oracles, types, nor figures, as mind alone can recognise the appreciation through his works.

Faith without rational proof, is absurd.

Faith embraces all the errors of bibles of tradition, while reason disciplined by philosophical science, expels them. Which, then, is the true friend of mind?

Faith must be necessarily rational to be truthful, otherwise it is the basest and veriest humbug.

There can be no merit in faith, unless that faith can stand all the severest test and scrutiny of truth.

What depth of injury to the world in all ages of mind, has imperfect faith perpetrated! One kind of faith has persecuted another. They must conclusively prove themselves all bad. The very moment faith uses any such, she ceases to be infallible, as she must be irrational and peculiar by such acts.

There can be no proscription in rational religion; no inquisition by machinery for the body, nor of opinion for the mind.

Do not act inconsistently, hypocritically, and corruptly, about faith. All rational beings can obtain honest faith from honest minds, by truth and reason, not otherwise, else the faith is dishonest and alien by falsehood.

There can be no exception. Freedom, that is intelligent, disclaims the serfs of faith.

Faith of the state! What false pretence, felony, and tyranny of absolutism! If any such had been the true worship and right of conscience, there never would have been a disturbance.

Place your faith on no man or set of men, much less on the minions of peculiar faith; sectarianism is not for intelligent freemen, when it is not fit for serfs and slaves. The people are told that they must have faith. Can they have faith without reason? If they think so, either their advisers are deceived, or the deceivers. But how can we get the truth, when the parties are interested? If you do not investigate the truth yourself, you may get the trash. There is in truth no such thing as absolute faith, but confidence in truth or its representative. Faith does not remove mountains, only a knowledge of science, correctly put in action, removes them. Mathematical science is exact, and begets confidence, in the execution and operation under its proper cognizance, yet the materials or the investigator may be erroneous. Which is least, a dishonest belief or an honest belief? The first is hypocrisy, the last is honesty.

Faith cannot be a boast at all, unless it be in perfect accordance with the facts of science. It is all proveable at once, on the right principles of science philosophical. If we go at once to the highest source, we will reach only rational faith—rational religion.

We need that faith to live and die by. The true one is that—that only is rational.

Faith is subordinate to reason and truth. But the bigot exclaims, you must not inveigh against my faith!

What has the world to do with his faith, if untrue?

The quicker it is abolished, the better for him in his delusion. If all be not done right, do not attempt it at all. This thing of faith is not a speculation, but a deduction of facts, it is not a thing of popularity as due to various causes of interest to the people. It is essentially a matter of principle. This thing of faith may be referable to a false standard proved by psychology, as when minds are negatively placed they can receive impressions that are of false conception, so faith can be any and everything at the will of the operator!

But as to our having to exercise faith in all departments of mind, we must invariably exercise at the same time, the trustiest vindication of truth and reason, for its best and sacred establishment.

We know enough for all practical purposes to accept for mental satisfaction all practical applications, so as to condemn when faith is not good or trustworthy, but betrays its trust. But to what does all this amount? Follow no sectaries for self-preservation. Religion binds mind to God and gives it the faith of truth, and its inviolable rational preservation.

No peculiar bible faith stands the law of evidence. It is not mere faith, but good faith that is truthful and rational, that the world needs. Faith without reason, is an abomination to mind, the beneficiary. Faith without reason, is an ignis fatuus of the world. That thing faith covereth a multitude of sins; it is the scape-goat to many iniquities.

You cannot sunder reason from faith.

What right have any to dictate by social force to any, in irrational faith? Any that is not rational, is not religion. The great astonishment is that the world, the people, should be so stupid as to believe in faith that is not proved and is nothing of itself. It is a vice, when credulity or belief without proof. Self-preservation begets a proper belief on facts. Why, then, should the world be perverted by peculiar false education?

What are writings not endorsed by any truth for credit to be paid them, worth? It is wonderful that any analytic mind can credit them at all. No ancient oracle ever had less pretension. Both have no truth.

It would really be some alleviation if the present professors of faith could enact like the ancient oracle-mongers, but all this is gone. There is no proof of the least faith contended for, on either set of scriptures, and all the pitiful vestiges of oracles are gone. And because people are destitute of investigation, they now must continue destitute of consistency of truth.

Some have little or no opinions of their own in theology or faith, afraid to express them for fear of their not being right but unpopular, only ready to go with the current, sold to the customs, fashions and errors of the day, never able to get out of the mud of such pollution.

Why cannot the intelligent community of thinking men speak out, instead of being vassal to the stupid unpopularity? The world has its masters in all peculiar faiths and professions, and their dictation is law, by reason of their temporal supposed character. But the true faith only looks to the true standard of God, not the peculiar dictation of man. No faith can be good that has not good reason.

Who lives by faith alone? That is absurd.

Has faith or reason the power to reduce all things into their original elements? A person is to be damned for his faith, if he don't have it peculiar—or if he have it different? That destroys free agency and correlative responsibility, while the true owner of mind is silent, and lets mind carry out its free agency under the circumstances of creation. What is the difference, after all? Rationalists have principle, good faith, whilst all others have faith ordered to terms of credulity that is only analogous to peculiar opinion, no faith in reality. The lights of the world must give credit for its sincerity.

This constitutes a pure, brilliant and patriotic blessing.

This does not belong to the usurping impostor tribe.

The peculiar god of faith, is worshipped by the last.

This image-faith outrages reason and mind's rights.

Faith is worth something to kings; will they lay down faith? You may ask them to lay down their crowns as well. What, then, could be expected of their vassals?

There are two classes of professors of faith, one that honestly seeks the true one, knowing no better than that peculiar faith is the proper one; the other misleading, knowing better, but preferring to be wrong and misleading others. When the people find out this, they will repay with vengeance many fold.

A blind and implicit faith is necessary to establish a peculiar faith. There is no virtue in all this, as it produces extreme of sin.

The faith-men go to sleep on what has been carried out for them by rulers of thousands of years past.

How few read and understand the bible, or read it through? Of course they do not analyze it, and go by impulse to those affiliated, who advise as interest and feelings prompt! Are these proper safe-guards of mind?

How few ever think of the proper analysis of the subject, till their feelings bid them seek in the cant phrase of the day, that which they already had given them?

And instead of seeking in the whole comprehension of the universe for religion, they go to man's books, which are as fallible as their stupid writers and impostors.

A man gets excited at a meeting all at once, and he then is told about religion for the first time; he undertakes it without analysis, and joins the church! Yes, but he may express his sorrow that he ever read so much about the anti-elect, or the elect. What, afraid of truth!

The fault is, he has not comprehended the proper analysis of the whole subject. Peculiar faith only produces a minority, rational faith civilizes the whole.

We desire the world-wide question ended in peace of civilization, that shall carry the best of fruits to every mind, and the best of happiness to every soul. This mighty question of faith has been agitated in all countries, to the malign enmity of all, when the elements of good faith can bring a millenium, a conservative restoration to the whole world.

We need peace and satisfaction. We need the closing on the noblest basis, and that is rational religion. Citizens of the world, aid in its final comprehension.

But we must have faith, at the expense of mind; that is not rational; cannot be religion.

The greatest and purest of all faiths is that of truth.

Faith is a virtue, but it must have virtuous, noble, intellectual and truthful principles, otherwise it is an ignoble outrage. Prejudice is blind, as a blind man, having a brilliant light. No man should change from the faith of his father! Run out the analysis, and you will have it very high in superstition, as the very first start was in the commotion of elements and fear of a wrathful Destroyer. Faith goes with truth, else it is credulity.

The world is false to itself. What makes it so? Peculiar faith. What is a greater humbug than faith, which is faithless credulity if blindly adopted without due investigation and analysis. Faith is an idol.

Ere we adopt faith, we must analyze what is religion. All faith must be rational to rest on proper evidence. Orthodox faith is right thinking faith, that comes by enlightened mind, depending on no governmental machinery.

We are told to have faith. Who endorses their authority, that they should endorse for faith? It is foolish to adopt faith, not investigated and analyzed.

Truth is the exponent of principles and facts most sacred, to be first and last and all the time, truth before faith, as the unity of the God of nature before trinity of men's notions, that violate the truth of science and reason. Mind is so constituted as to believe rightly on proper proof. Then are sincerity, confidence and humility established. The great error of the world is faith, without value received. God takes the will for the deed of those who cannot know any better, but then it is their bounden duty to give the best and enlightened deed with the will, and that they never do with the faith of bible traditions. What does such faith amount to, after all? Faith cannot over-ride truth, knowledge, science, common sense, the evidence of our senses and wisdom.

Every facility ought to be furnished the world, to learn the truth, not the faith, only as it accords with the truth of religion. Let reason triumph if faith sin forever, as it is trash unless upheld by truth.

Justice before liberality, mind and truth forever before faith, else the world is ruined instead of saved.

The world has been made fool of by faith.

There is but one universal faith, as one universal religion. Bible-of-tradition-faith swallows any monstrosity, because it finds it bible written. What credulity can be more foolish, what falsehood greater?

Patriotism, truth, reason, law, science, honor, rational religion, invoke a change. We recognise no right of faith over reason. We seek by direct, not indirect means to reach truth. Shall botchers in faith decide for freemen? Shall the doctrine of election prevent the investigation of truth and reason? If so, faith is fraud and false pretence. We have seen persons in conversation seek to force others to their belief, opinion or creed. What honor is in this, of a discarded system?

This produces results injurious to truth and peace. Let the world of mind be duly informed and thoroughly instructed, before any action is had. The unity of God presents the true majesty to promote a universal brotherhood, and that is too important to be sacrificed to a clique, or what sects can do. The Romans have tried that under the pretences of catholicism, but the soul of unity was wanting. The world is cut up into clans of private societies, all availing nothing, serving to distract and delude the world. What has the world to do with the popularity of sectarian clans? What humbugs! This is a matter of personal merit. When faith takes precedence of reason, fanaticism is the result. Not only peculiar faith then prevails, but all its errors and vices. We have all sorts of miracles, as the doctrine of the transubstantiation, and liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius. The divisions of faith, if true, are never adverse to reason but corroborated by it. Matters are put not on their merits, but on profession of faith, not on the pure testimony of that faith. What dogmas of superstition have been too monstrous to be adopted? What will not the mind, perverted by seductions and hope of power, do? Stupid corruption only prevents the right decree. When faith is not established on reason, it is sheer credulity. True faith confirms, peculiar faith detracts from God's attributes. As to faith, your sense will decide, if your honesty will permit.

The nature of evidence, if truthfully carried out, would supersede all blind faith.

You can tell us much about faith! The best is, to let alone faith entirely, and stick to religion.

What, is not faith, religion? Not at all.

They are two different questions: peculiar faith is the reverse of religion.

Some affect that one faith is as good as another, but there can be but one religion the world over.

Faith is asserted to be proved by feeling, devotion or affection! How deceptive, as paganism, as well as its branch, Christianity, is assumed to be proved by feelings. In all such, you must mind your own self-delusions. What sort of world morals are those that reflect antagonism and social proscription for an honest, sincere disbelief of peculiar faith? How great the delusion is, to deceive the people, that one faith is as good as another. How false the assertion! Then there is actually only one good faith.

How does the world clash so? Either the world is wrong or the faith is, one or both. What faith is fully sustained by principles, free from sectarianism? There can be only one, and that sustaining the unity, providence, attributes and perfection of the Almighty. All the universe centres in him. When faith becomes to be looked upon as a world wide question, then we shall hear no more of its peculiarity, but it will be absorbed into religion, a universal solved problem. We cannot believe in any system entire of ancient philosophy, nor faith, when there was so much defect in all and the means of improvement.

The moderns have a hundred brilliants to one of the ancients, and of course the moderns are proportionably accountable for their position.

The world is vitally interested in truth, honesty and religion, but none of faith only as it accords therewith. Faith can only be the substance of things hoped for, by the evidence of things seen. Faith or no faith, mankind should be properly convinced of the fact, the great leading fact. How otherwise can they be honest, truthful and fully satisfied, honorably so, that all is right and just? How can you carry out the original idea of genius and mind with bigots? You have to leave them in their stupidity, else they may ruin you. You may not change them, and they would murder you if they had power to produce that change. The change of the age of the world does not change the nature of the bigot, who is bigot still. The animal, is animal still. The nature of the beast does not change. Proper discussions on the facts will answer when the mind of the world becomes sound enough to reason, after breaking off from its past errors. A simple unsophisticated citizen of the world, of city or country, supposes when he hears the priestocracy affect all they are doing is for souls, that it is all religion they are specially pleading for. But it is not a word actually true, by the very nature of things seen.

It is all peculiar faith! Now what has all peculiar faith of the whole world got to do with the pure faith of pure truth? What a miserable state of world morals.

There are hundreds of millions of sectarians to-day in the world, and you could not get the truth out of any about their peculiar faith, clearly as it is that all such is antagonistic to monotheism, the only religion in God's universe.

No peculiar faith suits the country, much less the world, or the whole universe. Mind requires the pure faith of truth, and that is universal. There can be no such thing as peculiar faith, and none but stupid priestocracies of the world ever dreamed of such a thing. The very idea of faith implicit was absolutely required by all ancient teachers and philosophers, from pupils who were required to hear for years their masters without even questioning them.

Are moderns, children like the ancients, that they cannot question or analyze?

The world should have no faith but what is good, right and true, and comprehend too where all tends. It should have none of the vices of political capital. What are party and mere faith questions worth to the whole world, that needs conservative principles? The only faith is good faith, for the whole truth of religion. Faith is only good and true, as it accords with truth of universal facts. The time has now arrived when all intelligent minds should demand of the pulpit people, as the highest duty to purity of rational faith and religion, a proof of the authenticity preached, competent to satisfy an honorable court of justice, otherwise for all the preachers to be silent and leave the pulpit, and resign their churches for monotheism. The intelligent world is simple to let itself be trifled with, as has been the case heretofore. I do not know of any kind of faith, but what is good and consistent with truth and reason.

They talk of spiritual faith. There is no such thing abstracted from rational faith. It is all a pretence. Give us facts, truth first, then faith will follow. But it is foolish fraud to ask for faith anterior to these. No honest and truthful analyst can do it; none but debauched priestocracies, whose minds are bribed, and act collusively, can do it. The priestocracy affect faith and not works, a most demoralizing doctrine, if it can mean anything. They talk of helping their unbelief. That will help itself if the rational mind be left open to rational conviction.

Mind is so constituted that it is made the recipient of facts, on truthful conviction.

Faith without facts is credulity, and if that credulity has had motives, it is a world's curse.

Can you priestocracy act like honest people and stop, close your business, as you, your bibles, and profession, are conclusively convicted of false pretences? Do not mislead the world for a little pittance. Act like Americans. There were old pretended prophets of various kinds at Rome, pagans you call them. Who believes they told the truth? God had immutable principles at first, then he had no dispensations of paganism, Judaism, or Christianity, which are utterly antagonistic, though the latter, as Mahommedanism, Mormonism, depends on Judaism. There is nothing in names, it is in the thing itself. Christian, the Pagan is as truthful as you. You both borrowed, plagiarized on mind; you did the most and gave no credit for it, and are the greater robber of the two.

Faith is the representative of facts, otherwise it is not faith. There is no ridicule so effectual as that intrinsically identified with the solecisms of arguments on the facts of the case. You may have all faith, all else, and if you have not truth and honesty, you have nothing. Though the world talks about faith to the end of time, yet unless it is consistent with the facts of creation it is all a blind man's folly and imposition. The world may boast of any faith, but all such will be its bitterest curse and deadliest enemy unless it be good faith, consistent with rational religion. The peculiar bible faith is the soul-swindler's theme.

The good faith of monotheism is the only faithful friend of mind, directing it to its God Creator alone. Cherish it with all the holiest devotion, and the most sacred efficiency.

Reject reason! reject mind as well. As to faith, if not truthful, it is unworthy of mind, as below the dignity of truth, no matter what brute and sophist force commend it.

Holy peculiar faith is that of trained bands of smugglers, who, whether hailing from their pretended holy lands, books, men saints, all their holy days, can never be introduced to the recognition of our honest and enlightened mind.

No peculiar faith can go to the universe, religion, or their God. What are all bibles of peculiar faith but man's written peculiar faith disguised in all his felony on religion! There are two dangerous positions of mind: one that advances peculiar faith, that has no religion; the other, that has no acknowledgment of religion, exempt apparently from all its suggestions. We can see both effects in overgrown vicious cities, as on the frontiers and wilds of new settlements, both theatres of robbers and pirates.

A CODE OF RATIONAL FAITH NECESSARY.

[illegible] all classes of intelligence of mind, and worth of character, act consistently with their rights and respond most gratefully for the best good of their immortal souls.

All should act as if they knew they had immortal souls, as the only safe position to elevate the sentiments of mind to its comprehensive duty and true allegiance. Hitherto [illegible] had one distinct faith of immortality, resting on a rational code, and certainly no [illegible] action worthy of mind's immortal dignity, beyond the suggestions of their [illegible] proposed to procure that which is safe.

The most that had to be established was, that the individual believes in his own [illegible] and future accountability as a rational being, comprehending as well the past deeds [illegible] and that he is responsible at all times in that accountability directly to principles as finally to the Supreme, therefore he acts consistently in the deeds of a [illegible] he believes in future rewards and punishments, and he knows that he has [illegible] to his Creator to enjoy the immortality of his soul-organization.

This then is the essence of the world's code of rational faith. If it ever consults the [illegible] and light of mind

What more is wanting to put the soul on the safest footing than an exact duty to [illegible] with the best sentiments to the Supreme?

The [illegible] disciples assert, unanimously from our cultivation of intellect give [illegible] to mind that is already intimate to God for all that is needed.

[illegible] from man's first existence to the most ma- [illegible] was its possession

[illegible] results?

[illegible] circumstances. There can be no [illegible]

[illegible] be shaken, [illegible] the necessary demands of mind.

[illegible] faith, despite affirms [illegible] has been witnessed hitherto by per- [illegible] bibles nor this moment remains unconvinced in mind [illegible]

[illegible] faith has that faith stops at [illegible] that nonsense [illegible] existence [illegible]

[illegible] world [illegible] it man's [illegible] nothing [illegible] of [illegible] rights. [illegible] great, or [illegible] great [illegible] faith, as [illegible] principles, and a [illegible] and [illegible] of its [illegible] power [illegible] labor,

God will assert his claims exclusively through reason's presidency. A rational system of religion must be maintained for right action and proper good deportment, for social and the world's good, extended to the greatest numbers, the whole.

The whole ethics of the world must be rational to be best accommodated to the wants of mind.

Let rational sense, truth and honesty forever preside at the world's theatre.

Man, as born a helpless infant, ignorant of the wiles of mind perverted and corrupt, subject to evil communications, the poisons of miserable and degraded education, abiding errors of ignorance and customs, misguided teachings of dotards and pretenders, invaluable time lost, eternal truths never attained, concealed or mistaught, all the dangers of temptation to ills and evils only known by physical ruin and despotic tyrannical habits, must have a proper code for the family altar, to the boldest consummation of true faith, the exertions of genius, and the happiest attainments of philosophy. His mind should be duly balanced, and his happiness best promoted by all the fundamental principles that can glorify his perfect Creator.

Then an enlightened conscience, the possession of all civilized beings, taught the ethics inherent to human nature and its best condition, reflecting the best lights of the age, will continue to bless mind's fruition. Rational education of all the nations of the world should be universal, and have the proper scope to all this for its full comprehension, that all may be justly dealt with and advanced to the legitimate elevation of mind.

But one true system of religion can stand all proper tests and satisfy mind, that is supreme in vital religion, as all proper principles direct a certain and unmistakable education for mind's present good and future happiness.

This question will bring the people of all faiths to a right solution, as there can be but one true faith resulting on inherent elements.

No system of faith can restrain the spirit of the wilderness unless sane by mind's civilization.

The mighty cities of the earth have even their dark and criminal corners and circles as well as the country, all amenable to mind's correction.

The only saving faith is that resting on the right foundation, and directing in the right way.

Mind of civilization must do that.

The rights of reason are to be heard when faith speaks.

"Faith is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen," says one of the bibles of miracles, prophecies, and mysteries.

But seen or not seen, reason guides the mind to the adoption of all faith on a right basis, else insanity and untruth would be the basis, and all tuition would be the quintessence of sophistry.

This position defines itself on truthful testimony properly endorsed.

Enlightened mind in its utmost sincerity must assert for its best good, that its purest allegiance is all due exclusively to the exclusive Author and Creator of all. His creation can never be misunderstood by mortals observing and reflecting on his works.

Who, under the influence of such undeniable proof, can reverence any dogma of man for a day, or even an hour.

The constitutional organization of a rightly balanced mind causes it to reject all dogmas, to recognise and analyze eternal truths and principles, and as a faithful sentinel to the citizens of the globe, it is bound not to stifle conscience for its own sake, or for the little lucre of the moment, custom blind, deceitful, erratic, blundering, and hurtful, or the more attractive emoluments through the rubbish of life.

The Immortal and Supreme Being needs no service but pure and unadulterated ways, honorable and just, that honor mind and must honor God.

With this basis, actions, words, and thoughts, with the right direction, are of rightful benefit, be they as humble as the modest flower "that blooms unseen, and wastes its sweetness on the desert air."

No species of idolatry, no man or mortal-worship, deludes the just man's devotions.

To God Almighty alone, as due, they are purely paid, the holy and only confessor, to reform on the past, to improve for the future.

The just man opens his mind to wisdom, his acts to virtue, his duty with his fellow man, his religion with his God. He knows no priest nor bible of tradition preaching. He commences with God, who is unchangeable, and commenced with his mind. He holds himself responsible to the progress of amendment, and renders social virtues to man; building his actions on the best foundations.

He looks upon truth as ever essential to his actions, that they may be rightly endowed with honesty.

His acts are fundamentally right, as his intentions are the elements of his happiness and fruition.

His deeds rebuke mortals who come short of duty, curtailing their manliness and capacity, their best titles and hopes, acting unwisely in seeking shadows, wofully missing the substance in their immediate circle.

MONOTHEISM.

With such a code, rational religion, or monotheism, unavoidably arises—it is utterly impossible for the people to think on this subject, without becoming rational religionists —that is most plain. There can be only polytheism, atheism, and monotheism, all defining accurately the points of faith. The first is absurd, the second incredible, and the last indispensable and unavoidable, the right concession to the majesty of God. Many have decided against the gods of Christianity, Judaism, and all other peculiar faiths, most conscientiously, as unsuitable for the universe or this world, but lose themselves in the vacuum of a faith having no fixed principles; whereas they all must look to themselves all the time of consciousness, as most responsible for due observance of all conservative principles, if they in good faith invoke the God of those principles, as their God and Supreme Ruler.

If they grapple to his principles, before religion can be thrown, the universe dependent on them will also fall, and this at once destroys all Messiahships; for conservation of the universe embraces this as only a part of the mighty creation. Such botches have been all messiahship tinkers, that they could not analyze the first principles of the universe, much less mind. Eternal infamy is their portion, with all their pious frauds.

Most of those enlightened minds that are up to the light of reason, philosophical, not sophist, whether invoked to the investigation of Judaism, Christianity, Mahometanism, mormonism, or refined paganism, must be considered indifferent to all these existent partial and peculiar systems of faith, yet have no system perfected in general to concentrate their energies in proper union and strength.

The system of monotheism must be the only rational code, and deep be the sins of any peculiar faith-doctrine vassals that seek to set it aside, seeing that all else is a blank, that wise men will not deny and good men will deprecate.

Let not the want of union and knowledge exclude conservative principles, and the injunction of duty.

The insurance to the whole world, of the only beneficial code, depends on individual exertions, most important and essential for a right start and permanent action in life. Man owes it to himself and world, fellow citizens, to select the right code.

Of course reason and mind are to be warred upon, tortured and silenced down by brute force or sophistry, the arms of absolutism in all her disguises.

They are not to be heard, for that is a loss forever to false rule and usurped power.

Does the world need a moral or intellectual light?

How can it obtain it, but by mind and reason?

Let mortals know their right, and do their whole duty, as the unchangeable requirement of God, of mind, that is only responsible.

Reason is God's favorite; analysis and analogy her assistants. When such are absent there can be no truthful faith, for there can be no reasonable basis.

There can be none totally exempt from sin, none sanctified; but the best state is the least sin while life lasts. God's forgiveness of sins may ensue by appropriate action of the delinquents, but all can only live improving the proper insurance on enlightened principles. In this there can be no mistake.

God alone can only appreciate man in all his vicissitudes, and aid him best by his Providence Universal.

To inspire the right faith in belief, reason must inspire the world with wisdom, else the effect is only transitory and evanescent.

All previous modes of peculiar worship being destitute of all such elements, will finally yield to the noble impulses of mind.

Even fashion and custom must be upheld by reason, or time will efface them.

If we give up the faith of reason and rational mind, we have to submit to all the abominable doctrines of the peculiar faith of superstition.

All the codes for a bible but those founded on reason ought to be immediately abolished by all reasonable and cultivated intellects, in their mental appreciation, which decides them all nonsense, if not nuisances. Mind that is rational must not only abjure, reject, and discard all the bibles of tradition as the most insidious fabrications, made as a conspiracy against the best rights of mind, but impeach all, as most demoralizing and treacherous to the majesty and dignity of God Almighty.

We all need the highest order of intellectual and moral religion, that disseminates itself in civilization.

Our faith must be liberal, however incomprehensible the principles of the universe, and modestly in accordance with reason that recognises inherent actions.

We have to be modest, and advance on the modest steps of reason.

We can know of no revelation, but through rational mind.

What an insult to cultivated intellect, to be asked its faith in such legends as bibles of tradition give us? Intellect recoils indignantly, at the proposition.

The necessary result will be forever, under the circumstances, of freemen not exercising their own judgment of mind in matters of faith, but go back to customs of ages, where pretenders and their minions acted most insidiously, that idol-worship will be at one point, man-worship at the other, of the whole globe. At the best, it will be hard for all such Jesuitical belief to die, most difficult to be killed off. Who can separate faith from reason and mind for his idol, is prepared for treason to human nature.

The noblest faith is obtained by the noblest reason.

Name principles to a monotheist, and he will feel himself bound to them, as others by law, for religion.

Rationality is the motto, that takes precedence of all low, vulgar proceedings. You are a member of society, and must pay a reciprocal obligation. The highest is through religion. I do not believe in man's bible, but the world must adhere to what protects mankind universally. Before any talk of having rational improved religion, they must show the essential constituents, truth and honesty, or there is no rational religion there. All have the elements of religion, but all do not make it rational. Peculiar faith just reverses and lies to get in, and all the time injuring all the elements of religion. Rational religion will answer for the death bed. It is the only religion, and can sustain the departing soul; who, as rational, must know all that is essential and beneficial.

The uniform protection to society is rational religion. The world and society are bound, in all the highest obligations, to act up to all its requisitions. As you seek all the benefits of society, you are bound to all for the best return. The nearer the world becomes one general commonwealth or common weal, the nearer perfection will be monotheism, the highest dignitary of all on earth, next to rational mind.

Mere atheists cannot speculate on the existence of a God, without feeling the necessity of having the full benefits of his providence in this world, the providence of conservation.

It does matter for every principle of humanity, that correct doctrines should be brilliantly illuminated by righteous actions, else man is a brute without innate organs of a soul approaching the Almighty, this is his earthly history in all ages and with all professions.

It is horrible to contemplate the bane of society, predicated on no comprehensive universal accountability. Atheism does that, and polytheism is a bigot to as miserable doctrines.

All reason and philosophy must plead for chance as effectually as the best doctrine of design, as mere names are nothing.

Man is clearly to all observant and reflective minds, held amenable and accountable in the circle of the universe, that could not be a universe, if not governed by the fixed principles that God ordained for universal conservation, physically, morally and religiously.

Man has ample free-agency of mind, that renders him justly accountable for the violation of these principles, beyond which he cannot go.

God's splendid works prove themselves by their government.

How false to society are all that pretend to believe in no accountability of mind, as they affect that man's life is mere animal existence; but rational mankind has innate faculties of religion that a mere brute has not, then that proves the supreme obligation of a supreme adoration and accountability to God, if not, the brute equals the man who acknowledges no innate responsive principles. Such people are grossly, blindly ignorant, or monomaniacs.

Many die without fear or reproach, believing in the God of the universe, and yet the preachers, divines we hear they are called, libel them at death!

Is this the way the noble question of religion is to be met? Sure the way that it is met, proves conclusively that "all the divines" are utterly vanquished.

Why do they not meet this question as men? They ignorantly and unprincipledly give them no credit for rational religion.

The preachers and priests affect all the time to persuade men about their souls, and yet are afraid for the people to discuss this on free, rational and enlightened inquiry. This bigotry cuts short religion. They denounce beforehand, all works that inquire thereof!

Priests and preachers that assume to dictate about men's souls, will be deeply accountable for their errors. If they had a rational claim, they would submit it at once to rational mind. But what do they care for all that?

Are any of them mentally responsible? Who believes that? The world must have no divine rights of absolutism, kings or priests, but all divine rights of the people, and those alone next to God's alone.

Wise systems of education and laws of social benefits, are those of man, whose interest is thus best subservient where it approaches nearest these principles.

The world must look at all such as making one mighty system of unity for mind, its true conservative position, and not let mere feelings and emotions in errors of education and prejudices mislead, but consider what safely address existence in all ages.

But here is a waste, where no code exists. Surely it is right that aid of the right kind should be administered for universal safety, to put mind on a higher system that honors its nature and character. The wise institution of universal principles must exclude sectarianism, in all its inconsistencies.

But sectarians object to rational religion as leading to deism, that is, it leads the people away from their flagrant errors. No matter where it leads, if deism or all advocated be truth. But that destroys the bibles of tradition. That is right, if they be the gods of idolatry that prevent sight of truth, facts and rational faith, or the banks of false pretences. No matter what is destroyed, if such bibles, if connected, as all are, with untruth and crime so universal, promoting the distrust and disunion of a peaceful world that learns to hate with a peculiar hate on the peculiar basis of sectarianism. The nearest approach to Deity is through deism, Monotheism; all others are gross and vulgar departures therefrom. What an outrageous abuse of Deists!

Why is this? Instead of the priestocracy concocting this abomination, they would learn wisdom and truth from their position, and instead of reading out of a book written by priestocracies for their unholy purposes, they had better read out of the universe created for God's holiness and soul's happiness. All trinitarians view God as an imperfect being. When we get to the Great First Cause, we get to humility that teaches mind its moral obligations! Our moral obligations are derived from the laws that rule nature. Man was created for rational purposes. Monotheism willingly audits the pretensions of atheism as polytheism, that the wide world may be best enlightened on all relative claims. She is after truth, and fears no triumph of all such under this luminous banner.

My objection to polytheism and atheism applies to their pretence of principles; they have no principles.

What is the weak point in polytheism? They are all weak and rotten, having no foundation. The people of each audience ought in self-defence, in their rights of mind, to say to the preachers, declare the substantial proof or stop, be silent. What shall we do with the literature, as Milton and Shakespeare, all the poetry? Let the modern go as the ancient. Homer was the prince of such in his days, now it is as all are, romance and fiction. Truth must take precedence of fiction and poetry. Monotheism is not appreciated, as the ancients had no advocates. No ancient Monotheists? Where was Socrates? He had an accompanying demon, ordered the sacrifice of a cock to Æsculapius, and composed poetry in praise of Diana and Apollo. Where was Plato? Part of his metaphysics, and that of the Brahmin's and Bhuddhist's, make up that of the western Bhuddhist's, the christians. Where is Confucius? His went to the state faith of China, with spirits, the emperor for high priest. Where is the Indian's great spirit? Debauched by his imposing priestocracy. Monotheism has none of man's devices from imperial pontiffs down to any intriguing priestocracy. Emperors of Russia and China, Papa of the Greek faith, Pope of Rome, Lama of Thibet, the world priestocracy, do not help keep up the world cheat about faith not for your Creator, religion, the best good of mankind, but put away your false pretences, base, bad faith, absolutism, priestocracy, sworn enemies of mind's dignity, worth, independence, the value of the immortal soul that has to work out its own eternal problem. The only way to do it rightly, is the comprehensive solution of the whole problem. Rational mind demands exclusion of all peculiar views in religion, to establish universal principles for the whole world. The general welfare of all mankind is on living principles, not on exploded notions of dead bibles, or of the brief authority of man assuming faith to sustain his empire over the superstitious minds thus defrauded.

As to bullying proscriptions of church bible views against Monotheists, that is all wind—gas. Numbers only make many things tolerable, that of themselves are most contemptible and iniquitous.

Polytheists as atheists, are all equal to monomaniacs, they lack reason but have faith, the very thing the monomaniacs have. All bigots deal in faith, the counterfeit in religion, which is the highest duty to God and man, the quintessence of sublimest justice obligatory on all rational minds.

The polytheists and atheists might preach their lifetime, and not teach Monotheism, not the first point in God's word, cause and effect. Monotheism reflected through cause and effect, is for the world mankind to read. Everything that the priestocracy have done in their province, has detracted as far as in them lay from the providence of the Almighty. Instead of God's creation being remodeled, all was the miserable fixture of the priestocracy, whose after-knowledge kills them so dead with honest, truthful analysts, that they cannot breathe one breath more of libel on God the Creator.

ATHEISM AND POLYTHEISM: MONOTHEISM.

The Almighty of Monotheism originated all of universal motion that is identified with time, beyond which the human mind cannot take cognizance. The atheist may rely on the position that matter cannot be added to nor diminished, created or annihilated, therefore it was in existence all the time from eternity.

Several points of profound inquiry necessarily arise, in this interesting subject. It is easy to contemplate matter as now presented, different from that anterior to its elaboration. Now it is nature bedecked in beauty and usefulness, then it was disjunct from that state. Time is a relative state of orb-motion compared with the self-existence of the Almighty, with whom neither time nor periods of eternity apply. If both are durations of motion, as the terms imply, time being intrinsic to our planet or other orbs of the universe, eternity that of the Creator, then God is almighty compared to each. He was independent absolutely of all universe motion or time, and is characterized by eternity that precludes mind's investigation.

God's creation of something in the form of matter wherewith the universe was created, transcends the wishes of atheists. Now where are the properties, attributes, functions and principles of matter of this universe, that premises subsequent motion to eternity ?

These are, if anything, still superior questions, to the creation of mere plastic matter.

The philosopher now speaks of nature with all her essential properties, and considers, most properly, that her matter cannot be diminished or added to, for the universe is perfect and independent of addition or diminution, neither can it be annihilated, as God's conservative principles are eternal protectors for its conservation. The matter that was in existence from all eternity necessarily refers anterior to creation, the time when universe motion began; then matter is originated by Deity for creation that informs mind through time, its integral measurer, of the Almighty elaboration, the magnificent effect the result of supreme and anterior causes. The lines and outlines of demarcation for the universe intrinsically, are too distinctly drawn to deny its creation, for pro-creation necessarily results itself the effect of creation that as all, must be universal, not peculiar. Time, the definer of universe-motion, is a demonstration.

Geology defines the bold outlines of creation, and characterizes them by universal epochs. This whole category of matter the first, applies most definitely to the Almighty, whose perfect functions, attributes and principles, are supremely displayed in the universe, and proclaim his eternity pre-eminently his.

If the atheist presumes to go beyond creation, he presumptuously essays more than universe, and assumes to affect cognizance of questions most abstract, not pertaining to mind's province, but Deity's organization, the data of which cannot be entrusted to that of mortal organization. They cannot both breathe the same intellectual atmosphere. To affirm that eternity should be identified with the universe, is to manufacture dictionaries as bibles, not subservient, but dictators to rational mind.

It becomes all rational minds to investigate properly all questions expedient, and take nothing for granted not in unison with truth and rationality. It has always to abide principles, and abjure all doctrines, no matter how, deemed orthodox, that do not accord therewith.

To let the atheist's metaphysics that refer to matter beyond Deity, a veiled speculation, be self-confuted, if we grant that matter was in existence, how can you get without the Great First Cause, soul or supreme intelligence, the beautiful and systematic organization of matter that moves with such mathematical precision, sublime adjustment, ultimate exactness and certainty ? No such mass of matter could organize itself in harmony and symmetrical arrangements, from the magnitude of the mighty spheres of space to the minuteness of the atom, beyond either of which, mind created cannot think, much less act. Nature is not, till the God of nature designs with attributes, functions and principles.

That is utterly impossible for chance, which is, however, but another name for an unknown Great First Cause.

Thus we prove, beyond doubt and cavil, of all inquiring, candid, and intelligent minds, that the Great First Cause acts supremely as the organizing infinite mind.

Not only has the God of nature organized as well as created matter, but endowed it with conservative principles and immutable laws, functions, and attributes.

He has endowed man with supreme qualities of mind, that can originate its own conservatism.

Atheism is a dangerous creed, gratuitous in its assumptions.

In France, it is supposed that three millions of people perished in ten years, during the first revolution, from atheism. Yet how many billions have perished from polytheism, is not known or cared.

This same argument that cuts down atheism, excludes polytheism whether of many, or four, or three gods.

The mind that pretends that mind could not reach the recognition of the Great First Cause, is below its own dignity, and ought of course to prove its position. We demand it, as a supreme justice to monotheism.

All other systems of faith than monotheism are polytheisms, even atheism that deifies created matter, and substitutes chance, which are all substitutes for an unappreciated Great First Cause.

FATE.

He who can readily content himself on any basis of fate, in face of all the magnificent organization of the universe, is a humbug indeed, not trustworthy of his mind.

He succumbs to chance that has no existence but in his perverted brain, in a universe where Providence universal and almighty presides.

Fate and duty to social and religious obligations, are incompatible. The first is contingency, the last is uniform.

The field, mental and physical, is utterly neglected by fate, that neither exercises nor justifies duty.

If fate decides anything, it is but a name and substitute for a nobler conception, that science, philosophy, and religion, exalt to the Creator.

If the criminal under the gallows was born for crime and penalty, what is the use of any preaching, for predestination presides where fate decides?

Then there is no free agency of mind, which is as plainly contradicted by the works of the universe.

Thus in the extensive subject of religion, that accumulates in honors, we see all a beautiful consistency uniform in action and harmonious in all that uniformity.

There is no such thing as chance in the universe, that excludes the want of design, for all its parts the mighty solar system, prove that fortune and fate can only refer to the First Cause.

Atheism is irrational, the proceeds of mind so long crushed under the peculiar faith, despotism. This was seriously proved in France, by the massacre of millions, all having been the stupid contrivance of the priestocracy, who set aside the only magnificent, brilliant, and indispensable revelation, and thereby brutalized mind, beforehand aided by the despotism of monarchy. But it is considered by some intelligent persons, that an adoption of deism will produce or proceed to licentiousness! How and why? Deism claims principles.

We must estimate atheists as monomaniacs beyond the domains of reason, and lost to its genial influences.

Why is a majority of the world skeptics?

They are only so, on man's exposition through books of tradition, that become obsolete by the errors of their writers, not enlightened by the progress of enlightened mind.

God has provided for all this universally.

He has given mind innate faculties of religion, without which religion could not be appreciated, and whose mind is cultivated, his religion is rational, the very highest known to mind.

All minds are entitled to rational religion, that embraces all that is pure and soul-ennobling.

Rational religion is exhaustless and comprehensive as the principles of the universe, that suits all minds not constituted for understanding peculiar belief.

It addresses itself to the intelligence of all rational beings, for it is innate in mind and is evolved by God's works, and soul thoughts, words, and deeds.

It depends upon no man's creed, for it exists in nature of the best dignity, character, and benevolence, embracing the adoration of the Author of all the universe.

Atheism flies at her approach, abashed and self-rebuked as self-convicted.

The omnipotent hand of God has written the facts of the universe, and the sacrilegious finger of man shall not pervert it.

Mind perverted by atheism cannot look creation in the face, without expelling its degradation, and however imbued by superstition and polytheism, shall be circumvented about their pretended miracles, prophecies and mysteries, the libel of God.

The infidels should look at God's exclusive power, because of his exclusive genius and attributes, that determine his exclusive unity.

When they can digest his character, and refute his competency, then we will yield the thousand other points, all supreme as they are, to the polytheists and atheists.

What is the difference between atheists and polytheists? The atheist goes further than the other in atheism, and denies the existence of God, whilst polytheists deny the appropriate attributes to the Supreme.

Atheism is a denial of all religion, polytheism gives nothing that is true of religion.

The world needs a moral, social, and civil system, that can comprehend religion on just principles, and place it beyond the hazards of contingency, excluding partisan faith as blind and of no value. The destiny, fate, fortune, and chance, of the world, will be regarded as all embraced in the principles of causation.

If any men can be made atheist, it is the example of peculiar faith, false pretences to religion, which is practical atheism, for which its advocates are duly responsible. For instance, if the trinity is to dismember God's power, this is practical atheism in degree, for it detracts from the attributes of the Almighty in that proportion.

There are few monomaniacs that make an open avowal of atheism, assuming chance as their actor.

But chance is no agent at all, and the idea is at once stultified and annihilated by the exact operations of the universe.

The work of the universe requires the profoundest elaboration of infinite wisdom and power.

Conscience is the result of enlightened mind and reason, not of chance, but of the mighty principles of causation, excludes all pretensions of atheism, and is amenable to them, not to tradition, books of priestocracy, bibles, or any scriptures of polytheism, but those in accordance with mind, reason, and their constituent elements and essential principles. Conscience, an emanation of mind and reason, is directly responsible to them, not to man, and books only as they enlighten on just basis.

A correct appreciation of conservative principles must build up the best practicable code of morals and religion, and most effectually destroy licentiousness, and in the strictest accordance with a moral and religious conscience to promote every just principle in mind, to expel vice and immorality, to build true constitutional government, and secure all the blessings by such universal elements of good to all, to resort to mind and reason in the rightful exercise of their loftiest qualities, and above all to God.

The knowledge of the God of creation has not only filled the whole earth, one little planet, but exhaustless creation, that proves God's power, and all bible tradition writers are most insignificant, when they, as ignorant of the first principles of science, have committed themselves in regard to the Almighty.

Let mind assert its dignity, and the triumph of truth will be complete.

The very argument that the best of peculiar faith uses to condemn atheism, is most condemnatory of its doctrines for a partial polytheism.

But all bibles of tradition necessarily lead to skepticism, atheism, or polytheism, and nothing else.

All their degraded advocates thunder into the ears of the people, that they must believe in one of them, or be damned.

But the people when enlightened cannot in good faith adopt peculiar faith, yet they may be afraid to declare their soul God's.

If they touch rational, the only revealed and inspired religion, they leave the priestocracy, priests, preachers, and insidious hierarchies, that, alarmed for their very existence, damn all the world to save themselves. Vassal minds may disgrace themselves under this absolutism a little longer, but so help us God, we can and will adore only thee, Creator and Preserver of the universe.

Atheists are bound to the rule of mind as all rational beings, and have to yield to the order and harmony of creation, as having a head that organized matter thus.

Savages of the forest acknowledge the power of their Great Spirit, paramount to all other spirits.

Here is proof of their mind having innate capacity for the idea of Deity, either original or traditional, either view being equally valid as to the faculties of mind.

Action of mind on mind in process of time brought about science and the best views of God, most clearly estimated by the character of peculiar bibles that have more superstition the more ignorant their writers and authors are. Atheism and polytheism are mere subjects, in abeyance to rational religion—the more vanquished, as light of mind vanquishes ignorance.

But you affect to stop at destiny, fate, chance, nature, fortune?

We stop at the Great First Cause, where honesty of mind, truth, reason and rational faith place us, and where death or dissolution of life finds us.

You may affect to believe in a universal power only, as that of nature. But there is no supreme power without supreme intelligence. The division is absurd and impossible, atheist! How was matter created without both qualities? How organized as created, as universally admitted by sound minds?

All creation requires a Creator, the essential Preserver. Mind was created, and endowed with the noblest intelligence of creation. All organization requires an organizer.

All causes require a causer; who caused the first organization? You assume the name of nature; do not assume the elaborated materials of the sublime Architect.

Chemical as universal materials will form unions of order and character. Who arranged these materials, to secure all these wondrous positions?

What harmonizes that order, and beautifies that symmetry? Each solar system is organized in beautiful consistency with relation to the other systems of the universe, else chaos and confusion must necessarily arise. We observe comets that have regular circuits, and pass in mathematical orbits. Do they connect solar systems together, and perform functions of ethereal messengers? All this great work had a Great First Cause, who not only had the power that governed the inherent forces of nature, but intellectually directed and organized the whole universe.

His intelligence as power is perfect, and perfect is his character, but for all such the present state of things would be absolutely dangerous, had it even had an existence, and had not God provided comprehensively, that danger had told on the world, the universe.

Rational beings can only believe in rational faith and religion, consequently they must reject all the bibles of peculiar faith, and their demoralizing doctrines, and because they honestly do that, the advocates of these bibles declare, that if they do not believe in them, they are damned! This shows the height of dishonest dogmatism. The consequence necessarily arises that those who do not reason clearly, aided by all the rightful benefits of well regulated minds, will declare for some gross materialism, polytheism, atheism and non-entity of the soul after death.

Believing that annihilation of the soul takes place after this life, they seek to make the most of it here, and act cunningly in crimes and vices, and repel all religious cultivation.

Much of this abuse in life is due to the absolutism of peculiar faith, that thwarts reason and trammels mind. Peculiar faith connected thus with absolutism is the worst of all states, the dog in the manger policy, neither cultivating true religion, nor permitting the world to enjoy it.

Religion is a constituent of mind and man's nature, giving the mind the most exalted adoration of Deity resulting from appreciating his glorious attributes, that form a perfect character in power, intelligence and qualities.

Religion teaches the sublimest contemplation of all God's character, and the noblest obligations dutifully paid by mind to God, and as one of the loftiest parts of its sublime mission teaches the immortality of the soul, that is necessarily connected to an immortal Creator. If the world do not acknowledge religion, it does not pay due respect to mind or matter, or the Ruler, and the whole tells finally on the injury if not ruin of society, an incident too frequent in the world's history. Society is destroyed for want of social principles. A man's actions would contradict his assertions as an atheist, sometimes proving the existence and government of a supreme. All the speculations of polytheism, having trinity or more than unity, necessarily contradict themselves by actions, whatever they affect in words, as the Great First Cause is paramount, while monotheism sustains itself throughout, most consistently.

The geological epochs answer all such, and must improve the views of all earnest inquirers to a better faith in one God. Who can contend, in these serious matters, for the triumph of sophistry over facts? All good citizens must go for that doctrine, that secures all the necessary actions, duties and sympathies of life. But bible of tradition advocates will affirm, that if you do not believe their way, you are damned. This position of mere assertion for credulity, thus produces deep demoralization with some who do not analyze the whole subject. Not having minds constituted for credulity, they cannot assist in any such dogmas, but yet overlook necessary duties to be duly investigated by truth.

One part of the world must believe the other part. One part has to support the other.

One part of the world has to obey as a vassal, the other part or balance.

The world's society is cut up, by sinister influence, intrigue, more or less. The same is cut up by clannish, secret actions, that mar the justice to mind and morals. The mighty masses of the world, less ignorant in other matters, can be moulded to all the miserable humbugs and baseness of superstition, subservient to fear or custom.

Atheists are less injurious to society, bad as their doctrines are, than bible of tradition advocates.

Whilst all such are in the pale of God's religion, the last seek to usurp it by their peculiar-faith dynasty, for priestocracy speculation and trade. The first are passive, without the pretences of monopoly, and its odious machinery, to rule the world. What can be worse than the last, hypocrites before God, tyrants to mind. Wherever faith declares itself in opposition to scientific principles, that faith is worth nothing, for it is guilty of base doctrines.

Time and science have painted out the various defects in all peculiar-faith doctrines, that are necessarily condemned. It has been most important that the most miraculous tales should be invented, to cause peculiar faith to flourish, and this deception has to be kept up all the time. However palpable the falsehood, the knowing ones keep it concealed, and war on its exposition and exposure. How flimsy the base of that which seeks such miserable expedients.

The very moment that polytheism is admitted, as it is by peculiar faith, monotheism cuts that down, as no partial gods can work for the God of Nature, who stands sublimely a unit, neither needing nor permitting any co-workers, consequently monotheism, the only rational religion, cuts down all polytheism and atheism. We have a just idea of God indubitably by his attributes, if the God of unity. All others of no account to mind, need men's books for artificial support. But God only fills the test and measure of rational criticism and investigation.

The dogmatists hold that there is no God, or a partial God.

The rationalists hold that there is a God of nature, recognised by the most sublime science, and the exactest system of that science, as the prime mover of the universe. The universe, as far as mind can perceive, is already comprehended in system most beautiful and orderly.

This is rationalism to admit it, but the converse is dogmatism and atheism, that are in the same category as polytheism, that manufactures partial gods.

Mind must travel up to nature, recognise her constitutional laws, and appreciate her law-giver, not seek to lead all to its pre-conceived notions and imperfect desires.

Mind must dispute all wrong, and have proof of all that is right, to be rightly ruled by science. All that is right is provable. Mind thus reaches, by the principles of causation, a Great First Cause, to whom it resigns itself at rational discretion, not being able to transcend his bounds. Polytheists have made atheists, and from the sublime God they both fall to the ridiculous.

But much stress is laid to the opposers of the bible, as Robespierre and some other degraded despots, who were also the opposers of order, law and proper government! Let all these degraded characters be considered the tyrants of the human race, which these terrorists butchered without reason, and despoiled without limits. But who are opposed to the noblest of all governments, that of God the Creator, more than polytheists? The despotism of absolutism was, by the deep corruption of these people prior to the reign of terror. The people, truly, had been crushed, by the enemies of civil and religious liberty. What was all but a mighty reaction of wrongs long perpetrated? Monotheism deplores all such, whether commenced by polytheism or finished by atheism. There should be no deep-rooted attachments to exploded customs. If we give faith as the motto for our action, we may believe the atheists, who deny God, for there is Aristotle, who believed in no God.

We must try the whole atheists and polytheists by reason, as faith leads us to be what destroys us at once.

Reason must expel the irrational part.

All the bibles of tradition have irrational, defective points, abominable caricatures, resulting from the ignorance of the ages of the writers. No wonder these make atheists, as their advocates, the polytheists, falsely and ignominiously pretend that the world cannot get any other idea of a God but from these book-libels! Should such ever see the light of the Almighty? To get on with the doctrines of atheism, a universe of mere assumptions and speculations is raised. We hear of the opinion that the earth, when exhausted of her impressibility to electricity, will undergo absorption into the sun, but then the solar system would be unbalanced. In all this there would be an effect, then necessarily resulting from a cause, which premises a design, and of course a designer. But atheists pretend that there is no omnipresence of God. They are, then, met more effectually, as God presides over omnipresence, which is commanded by his conservative principles, that act for him.

But, says the caviling atheist, who wishes to maintain his brainless position, God is not cognizant to our senses. His works, those of creation, the universe, the system of systems are, and the God of nature is, recognised through his attributes. It takes a refined mind to appreciate, a vulgar mind to deny, the existence of a God, that all nature most conclusively proclaims through the pure voice of philosophical science.

Leave out all but mind, and we see that that must be governed by principle, by the science of principle, without which the world is a blank; without both of which the universe would be chaos and confusion.

What is society? It is the bond and union of mind, that refers to the great principle essential to its good. All this should embrace the greatest good to the greatest number, that is all. This cannot be obtained without the highest appreciation and action for these principles, the highest of universal self-preservation.

And this question of society refers to virtue, and both to the comprehension of the universe. Virtue must be the proper, correct organization of society.

Why legalize marriage, why not pair off like a part of animated creation, if there be no God? The highest good of society must look to social order, law and constitutional rights, that are all included in religion, which comprehends the wisest economy of the universe. The best object is attained in best taste, by this process. The best good of society depends on the greatest mutual forbearance. The propagation of the species is a great law of nature, but with man it should be under all proper circumstances.

But for this, but for mind that belongs to the universe, prostitution had been tolerated. The love of the offspring is identified with their best protection most comprehensively, and as nature declares the position of legitimate action by the sexes being nearly balanced, virtuous marriage of the pair is proclaimed the immutable law of nature.

Grant the premises to the atheist or the polytheist, and the extremes of stultification are proved at once, and mind, the only beneficiary, is stripped of all that is desirable. Then there is no God, or as many fictions of gods as the imagination and speculation of man decide. Grant their premises that are begged, and anything can be proved, that principles utterly explode! The atheist recurs to spontaneous creation, to reach the noble creation of man. But as man is not now created, but procreated, if modest, he has to be silent, or give satisfactory proofs why the creation does not progress! Why not continue the same process as that of man, and in fact, all the rest? Here at once is an insuperable difficulty, for new creations should still be progressive, that would ultimately defeat the very object of creation! Polytheism and atheism thus wind themselves up, to be scouted by virtuous intelligence.

There is too much design in all creation, especially in man—mind and body, for mere nature to be the exalted only actor. She is the elaborated agent, representing a universe exponent of God. All other animated natures below man, declare a subserviency, a subordinate state. Mind is the head of all creation, and that mind was instituted by an institutor. Nature is only agent in acts of mind. She is not the actor. The body is moved as the mind directs. Rationality decides the question for all rational beings. The two great constituencies of man, mind and matter, decidedly demonstrate it. Mind elicits the truth from all the elements of nature of matter.

But objection is made by the rabid atheist, of God's attributes of his omnipresence. But how easily and better is that met, when we see that his principles, functions and attributes, preside over all space. He is the President over omnipresence, then. The bible of the polytheist, which is a caricature, makes atheists. The first has a peculiar god, of man's devices. The consequence is, that the atheist takes this peculiar abortion without analysis, and he is not believed in. When nature is assumed for all, then it is the ridiculous to mount to the sublime, for nature elaborated is only part of the whole comprehension, since we must go to the Supreme First Cause. But your mind O, atheist, is so constituted that you cannot see all the exact mathematical order and harmony in the solar system, then we will take you to one simple object. Whence the rays of the sun? They are effects. What produces them? You admit a cause, that necessarily leads in the principles of causation, if you understand logic, the rational use and meaning of language, to the Great First Cause. Whence he? That, now, introduces irrational mind to speculation, hypothesis and metaphysics, that belong to atheism and polytheism, but introduces rational mind to humility the most sincere, to stop there as the centre of all confidence, all love and adoration. The fool assumes there is no God, but the greatest fool assumes a partial God.

But atheism is clamorous for spontaneous generation, that produced man. Then why not continue the same?

Its position is gratuitous, and begs the question.

It is procreation that prevails, not spontaneous generation. But atheism says, the links of the whole first made an increasing order. Why do not those phenomena still exist? They do not, that is clear and final. A Supreme gives defined consummate order, symmetry, and organization of systems of systems, without whom the whole would be chaos and confusion—all disorder.

Whereas, how beautiful, how wise, and beneficent, the science of conservative principles.

We must speak of mind as it is, with its facts; not as a God at present, but of created mind, that is to work out its own best problem of civilization and greatest happiness, on the elements and circumstances of its creation. Mind is necessarily limited, compared to God, and must have limited functions on this earth, the scene of its present action.

It has not mere specific limited scope, of exact but of liberal action—it is a free agent, under the circumstances of its existence. It is necessarily a creation, and must respond to all the organic laws of creation.

God, in giving mind its greatest range of free agency, has not created it a slave, but has enabled it to work out its own problem, and noblest elevation of character. Its created position and capacity of improvement must be respected, as the last leads to its nearest progressive approach to the perfection of its God.

Death is a mighty change of identity, and thus it has to progress through purification. The earthly action of mind refers to its merits or demerits, and involves the sublimest act of creation, its future existence.

Atheists advance all kinds of speculations—the extinction of globes of the Universe has been often spoken of. This is incredible to my mind, since neither their orbits are certain, nor the means to ascertain them. See the facts of the case in this history of the times.

A Comet Endangering the Earth.—Southey, in his "Common Place Book," relates, that in A. D. 1712, Whiston predicted that the comet would appear on Wednesday, 14th October, at five minutes after five in the morning, and that the world would be destroyed by fire on the Friday following. His reputation was high, and the comet appeared. A number of persons got into boats and barges on the Thames, thinking the water the safest place. South Sea and India stock fell. A captain of a Dutch ship threw all his powder into the river, that the ship might not be endangered. At noon, after the comet had appeared, it is said that more than one hundred clergymen were ferried over to Lambeth, to request that proper prayers might be prepared, there being none in the church service. People believed that the day of judgment was at hand, and some acted on the belief, more as if some temporary evil was to be expected. On Thursday, more than 7,000 kept-mistresses were publicly married. There was a prodigious run on the bank; Sir Gilbert Heathcote, at that time head director, issued orders to all the fire-offices in London, requiring them to keep a good look-out, and have a particular eye on the Bank of England.

Modesty becomes ignorance. We are bound in truth and honor, to the rights of mind, above all others. When some conjecture that mind is the result of electricity on the organs of the brain, an inefficient, unsatisfactory materialism is elicited. If the senses are organs to thought, thought is elicited—from an element, a God-endowed, individualized organization. The atheist assumes nature, and goes against rationality. Why should there be only a certain order in nature, when we see no creation that is arrested, and procreation progressive. Here are chaos and confusion at once.

Creation is assumed, for procreation. The God of Nature is its president—its organizer—its designer—and officiates in the highest attainable capacity.

When we look at mind as it is, on the facts of the case, the beautiful creation of the Universe is God's problem. Atheists may give an isolated, partial view, but they must embrace the comprehension of the whole. Have they done so?

To assert that there is nothing beyond nature, is to assume a dogmatism that betrays the character of mind.

The cotton plant helps the world to civilization; that calls most for the whole people to aid and assist each other. The mind, the most magnificent endowment of intelligence and adequate power—a creature of itself, of its intelligence—to promote its object, takes hold of this one means, and carries out the mighty design. What is plain in one, is so in all.

All the solar systems are in abeyance to one grand centre, the locality of supreme purity, there abiding the Supreme First Cause. It is absolutely essential and necessary to have a supervising head or ruler over the Universe, else chaos and confusion at once ensue.

The Universe could not arrange itself into such admirable design. By what principle can the Sovereign of principles be excluded from the Universe, that reflects the conservation of those principles? Who heads those principles? Nature? She is commanded by them! This, at once, proves the position.

Can society organize itself, without principles? No. Refined civilization adopts the best, for society. This proves mind. This is religion, in part, that binds us to our duty to God and mind. All the multitudes of difficulties in the world are for mind to overcome.

That was the object, the intention of Creation. But is that all? What less than the Universe can be the wisest comprehension?

Polytheists and atheists have to assume positions, resort to imagination or fictions; the rationalist is the only one that can stand the pure test of reason, standing on the platform of facts.

The atheist and polytheist leave the world destitute of the highest principles. What! no religion to God, that implies duty to man and society? Where would be the standard, of so much importance to exclude polytheism and atheism? Mind must have a standard, and that is in Deity. Polytheists have their miserable standards in idol fictions—atheists have theirs in idol imagination; both in false pretences, assumptions, and positions. Whereas humility, acquiescence, is the order of rational mind generally, in the Supreme standard, who is not a reckless dictator, but a law-giver of supreme immutable principles. How few understand logic, the use or true meaning of language. Polytheist, trinitarian, or unitarian, how can you successfully combat or defeat the atheist, but on the grounds of rationalism? Without ratiocination, you can do nothing with him.

Are you going to use him otherwise? But you are classed necessarily together, on the pure principles of ratiocination.

The systems of the universe are relative to each other, as those spheres of one solar system.

All things are made impossible with God, the converse of his attributes and principles, both with himself and his creation. The function of nature is procreation; of God, is creation. Here, atheist, is enough to silence you, and all polytheists. As we can only appreciate the God of nature by his attributes, we all have to look to him as the standard of the universe, for greatness and dignity. Mind, is to get right; to do all things rightly, under the direction of science; all of which is needing in the world. But who directs that mind? Who has originated that science? Come by nature! Has nature such intelligence? The beauty of it is, that rational religion, our position, cuts down at the same blow the atheist, polytheist, dogmatist, trinitarian, or unitarian. In what, polytheist, do you differ from the atheist? The last robs God entirely of existence and attributes, the universe of principles, while you only rob them in the best part, and insult God about his imbecility.

You have murdered all, by your peculiar faith.

Change speedily, all of you, the errors of your ways, that will bear witness against you.

But electricity acts on mind, and elicits thought, but what causes mind to originate thought; that shows something beyond materialism, good atheist?

But how do I estimate the monotheist? As all mankind, by his actions. If a fellow calls himself even deist, and becomes a tool of tools, untruthful and unprincipled, breaks his pledges made to temperance societies, I consider him the lowest of the low, unworthy to a great extent of the countenance of monotheism, that still protects him.

Why so many ancient atheists? Because the light of civilization, of astronomy, had not taught the organization of the universe; and of course all polytheisms, as trinities, are partial atheisms, and produce equally bad morals and social results. Whether atheist or polytheist, names are nothing. All that are right will seek to be tried by the proper court of conscience, and respect the righteous verdict of rational religion.

Mind is compelled to observe the works of creation, and estimate the Creator from their organization and regulation, to the amount of its acquisition of science and philosophy; as in the days of Moses' bible, or that of the priestocracy, the people had ideas of a little peculiar god that was so unsatisfactory to them that they sought after other peculiar gods. The priestocracy would not let them be rightly directed to the perfect God of the universe.

In the days of rational mind they have excellent ideas of this God of the universe, the Supreme First Cause who regulates its organization, and rules by conservative principles, being the soul-guardian.

All other views than a creation of nature, leave the mind in woful ignorance. That it was created, the book of geology, one of the leaves of God's volume, the world, furnishes distinct epochs as distinct proofs. The first was creation for vegetation, then animalization.

Now, where creation ceases, generation or pro-creation commences. Here the Almighty is self-evident to draw the ineffaceable line of demarkation, that rules out atheists and polytheists, by the last of whom was the conspicuous positive error of afterthought priestocracies, who conceived of covenants and messiahs, that were necessarily too late.

Original creation had ceased, and the only pro-creation was a mortal function, and all the results were necessarily mortal.

When God created and organized matter, he instituted conservative principles, for physical, mental, moral, and religious providence, universally and especially. These principles supersede the use of angels on earth, vicegerents or devils, and this destroys all the pretended functions of the priestocracy, who have foisted and palmed themselves on mind, the people, the world.

God, a perfect being, and having his residence in the centre and soul of purity, a perfectly pure place, where abide pure organizations of just rational beings, sin, an impurity, could not enter nor tempt, much less corrupt angels, much less archangels to devils. All these are fictions, unknown to rational mind. God was too good, my reverence tells me, to originate devils. The nearest to it is mind perverted in its free agency, limited to the circumstances of providence and perverted in various degrees of corruption and degradation. Mind is, as God created it, still rational, and capable in that position of enacting religion. Mind helps mind, that can help itself, and abjures bigotry.

What is the difficulty about the facts of monotheism? Partial appreciation may be a simple denial of messiahship and all such corrupt appurtenances, without any active participation in the duties of rational religion; such is mere passiveness. Monotheism is founded on the noblest reverence of the Creator, who must, by its pure tenets, have full adoration in his own right. She has objection to individuals only, because they are unprincipled, while she gives all minds her best and loveliest, holiest influence. This they may be, whether atheist or polytheist. The unprincipled of the world avoid being religiously improved.

It is the interest of the world, as it is the intention of Deity, to successfully adopt all that will promote principles and merit.

Nature is nothing but a consistent elaborate organization, proving the God of nature. Its sublime harmony and order excite our adoration for him; but the brightest organization of all, the soul, demands it as a duty supreme on the supremacy of principles, and the sublimest feeling of gratitude.

How much of the world is unprincipled, dishonest, without veracity? When once the mind gets to this, there is little or no hope for adequate reformation. Unprincipled people are those that throw off all restraint of principle, and in all this the world is most vitally concerned. Actions and motives draw the proper line of distinction. There is such a vast dereliction in all these, that the unsophisticated mind believes that there is but little of the essence of rational religion governing them. This appeals not to the liberality, but the high-toned justice of all dogmatists. An atheist must see that we are obliged to be certain, in all the positions and deductions of the right premises. The universe is a system of systems, of cause and effect, referable to the supreme First Cause, in which there is one universal adaptation, that bespeaks the highest order of design of a universal President.

The atheist might continue a monomaniac as he is, while the polytheist that knows what he is talking of, may be a hypocrite or affected dupe, but the highest sense of religion bespeaks the highest interest in the numerous victims to the world's custom and fashion.

What principles then, are in atheism and polytheism, in the sight of their miserable world-pollutions and demoralizations?

Analysis under the glorious and benign influence of monotheism, resolves all things into their first elements and principles that are essentially good, not to the original chaos, but where civilized man is or can be, and plants in the highest religion.

Yet the people are afraid to advance in conservative revolution. There is no latitude for monotheism, as it is indissolubly bound to principles, those of Almighty God. None can violate them and claim to be monotheists, whatever else they be. All the vices of creeds, are those of anti-god. If you speak truly as wise analysts of the world's injuries, you will admit all this.

He who recognises no God in the organization of one solar system, has no rational mind. He who does not recognise that mind to be the most endeared of all to the Creator, has no improved morals or religion, has no gratitude for the Almighty in his perfection, caring for all, and sufficient for the preservation of all.

Mind originates the idea of a God, proved by the Indians; however, like all nations, it is mixed up with interloping pretenders, priestocracies. None can surpass their unadulterated integrity, before it is corrupted by the contact of pretended superiority of other people, like the unique beauty of monotheism, that gives the purity of religion. Mind could not originate less than the idea of a Deity, if it respects the truths of creation.

The order, harmony, unity of design, exact mathematical adjustment of the system of systems, the universe, proves a Creator.

Man's organization proves that in full.

We can only get access to mind through reason, as rational beings, by a rational religion, to the most rational God.

If we analyze chance, destiny, fortune, nature, however hard to define apparently, they must come under the definitions of order or arrangement, that will not benefit the atheist, as all have due respect to rational rights, all in abeyance to mind and reason, truth and God.

What, atheist, can you be thinking of about all these, that must be ruled, or ruin, if chaos rules? The powers universal of creation, as electricity and gravitation, must be under creative intellect, else they might shiver the universe into fragments. All such must be controlled by an Almighty Ruler, Organizer, on the best conservative principles.

What are the properties of matter worth, if not most wisely directed? Who but the Creator of the universe, can most wisely comprehend all?

But you affect to criticize God's designs, yet libel them in your ignorance. They are all placed under the cognizance of universal principles, that must rule. Many are apparently unfortunate by the force of circumstances, that, if not carried out, might have rendered the results more deplorable. The philosophical monotheist will perceive that mind is too short-sighted to arraign God.

The polytheist should not be a bigot on irrational grounds, about his preconceived or peculiarly taught faith, that cannot possibly require actions self-sacrificed. Will bigots sacrifice themselves to a foolish faith? The world can get no fair proposition from bigots. They do not adopt a rational, but sectarian position.

With them, everything bends to their peculiar faith, everything is peculiar; all is distorted through that distorted and unfortunate medium.

The atheist seeks to be a moralist, and criticises the perfection of Deity. If the Principal of the universe is not correctly characterized, he is bound by all just and honorable principles to do them justice, or be silent in his utter incapacity of amendment.

Among the caricatures of character the polytheist is wofully amenable, when he adopts a bible that impeaches itself for such gross misconceptions, as God producing evil. God does not create evil. Mind is not evil, no more than the universe—all were intended for good and the benefit of souls. The very universe or creation implies that all have conservative principles, but if they be perverted or changed, the reverse is destructive principles, or the self-vindication of conservative principles of God, for their abuse by mind.

Only think of the sublime conceptions that balanced one solar system with another, and suspend all the universe in space. All the little peculiar petty sectarianism of polytheism or atheism, precludes the right conception of God, of sublime things even, by bringing mind to their little petty area of their peculiar earth. God is the only infallible standard, and he can only be known through his creation.

Nature alone gives us no standard as she is only creative agent, a mere creature, and this proves conclusively the supremacy of the head.

Silence, atheists, most becomes your petty misconceptions. But forced from nature and the universe, you object to the present position of things, as an effort to find fault if not to correct them. You object to him who has caused this. But you are silenced then in the wisest of all beings, and of course in all. But you persist, not appreciating your defeat. You object to excess of water over land.

Are you at all right, there? The whole creation is not amenable to your criticism.

The mighty water brings you pleasurable temperature, delightful breezes, most expansive commerce, the amplest treasures of the deep, the most fertilizing productions of land, to feed or employ the most numerous multitudes. Nothing is made in vain: it is all right.

The idea of the God of nature irresistibly arises, from the positive organizations of matter. Legitimate free agency, perversions of mind and responsibility, surely accompany mind on this earth.

Do you not recognise relative free agency in punishment? Certainly. Then you are completely wound up.

The soundest reason not only produces the highest conception of God, but endows him as the most sublime, the supreme.

But licentiousness is greater in deism. That is, deism destitute of principles. But what is any profession, destitute of principles? The world cannot recognise any such in monotheism.

Let honesty and truth prevail in all that is worthy.

You cannot convict monotheism of destitution of principles. She is actually certain of God Almighty.

You must either take nature, or the president, organizer and creator. What else, atheist, is there that you can take? Nothing. Then if you take nature you adopt a partial cause, vague and most unsatisfactory, because it is an effect referable to cause, an organic agent. Your partial decision condemns you, as you affirm the principle of causation by your position.

The highest good sense enjoins your adoption of the Great First Cause, whereby we comprehend power as with nature, and all the intelligence of omniscience identified, that nature alone cannot have. This comprehends the only wise position, cause and effect, the actor and agent.

But here come in questions of universe character, as what is space? Where is the limit? This is an organic question, that carries mind to the organizer, the centre of all. When the universe alone solves the whole question, it is not to be expected that all the main points can ever be met in this state of mind. The soul will have to meet the highest, after its elaborate and protracted analysis. Every thing, every class, bespeaks the necessity of principle, a rule, system above all, a head.

When a man, atheist or not, comes to have thoughts, words or deeds, disrespectful of Deity, he sinks below the brute. As in our constitutional government, mind that violently plots treason thereto, is unworthy the respect of mind.

Roll on, countless orbs, countless to man, in the immensity of space, immense to him, and humble him by thy numbers, and convince him by the light of those so distant, that are just hailed for the first time since creation.

Ye can demonstrate beyond cavil, his sublimity, the genius property of Deity!

But minds of congenial reason, need not leave this planet.

What beautiful, philosophical, mighty powers of atmosphere! What could have caused them in nature, without the supreme soul of intelligence? Elaborated nature is the universe, that was created by the exercise of the highest functions of creative intellectuality, and has to be thus appreciated by mortals? The main question is not the how and where of Deity's creation, but the utter incompetency of the atheist to reason on them. This department is in that of religion, not in atheism.

The great standard of Deity in his perfect unity, and his universal elaborated nature, puts down atheism as a dream, as well as polytheism, more libels than inquiries. The universal character of God is written in action—works. We cannot see nature alone, without Deity.

Could the ancients ever have conceived of the universe, and of the sublime laws of its system of gravitation? Of its sublime author, and of his sublime system of rational religion, that as much exceeds all other systems of faith, as light of days does that of night, as Deity does that of mortals, to whom monotheism, the safest, in most trust-worthy confidence imparts its sublimity by practical operations in the soul, mind, by morals and religion without profession, itself the sublime provision to the soul, the execution of a God, not needing but excluding peculiar proclamations of the priestocracy.

And how beneficent the provision, when all christs as messiahs are self-condemned as begotten and positively mortal, as the function of all procreation is mortal. God's is creation, not procreation. Physiology decides the question, and expels this abominable libel of human lewdness from all pure minds. What is the atonement worth? It is a pious fraud; the least that can be said of it is, that it is disgustingly mercenary.

Regeneration or the new birth, the new heart, is as worthless, as the doctrine of miracles, prophecies or mysteries. But in monotheism there is a certain platform for all the faith of religion, that recognises the conservative laws of universal principles.

Comprehend Deity, atheist. First comprehend his universe. Know that each sun in his own solar system cannot be eclipsed by the universe of suns, nor its gravitation unbalanced. Think, then, of the eclipsing character of their Author.

Say what you will, you have to acknowledge the organization of the universe, and that demonstrates, gives full proof of its organizer, the creator, the Great First Cause. But a mighty war has been waged upon the religion of principles; all the supposed highest authorities have been adduced to militate against it. "As to Deism," says Patrick Henry, quoted in Wirt's Sketches, "The view which the rising greatness of our country presents to my eyes, is greatly tarnished by the general prevalence of deism, which, with me, is but another name for vice and depravity." And this was the illustrious patriot and orator, the honored Henry, who at the time this sentiment was uttered was giving the noblest expression of rational religion, under the cover of another faith! otherwise, that very view was antagonistic to principles that triumph for ever. If deism reflect principles, she is libelled with any such view.

For want of comprehensive analysis, vindication of principles is not satisfactory. The question is grossly misunderstood. It is difficult to decide which would be worse, the demoralization of bibles of tradition, or the vices of pretended deism, for the conservative principles of deism, or monotheism, permit no such thing as licentiousness. That is impossible. The fault is in man. One of the great principles of monotheism is to combat the licentiousness of all peculiar faiths, busied in upsetting the very principles of religion in libels of Deity himself. Revolutions that are conservative never go back. Now monotheism will meet the purest views of the purest mind, and confront it as prepared soul-organization to enjoy its reward of the highest order, with its God. She is without blemish, and is the production of God himself.

Where can we go amiss, to trace the First Great Cause? Where there is no effect, that is, nowhere. Look at any point, and the best appreciation will demonstrate its appropriate organization and functions, be it the minutest microscopic atom, or the most enlarged orb. See the mighty revolutions of the atmosphere, that so admirably fills all its departments. All creation does that, how much more does its Creator? Pettifoggers of mind, ye know not what God is, in your trifling cavils that disgrace you. The paramount proof of God, is the almighty organization of creation, whose unity is demonstrated by its conservation in the unity of design, which excludes and annihilates atheism and polytheism or trinities.

From my sincere conviction and deepest reverence of Deity, and respect to rational, his ordained religion, I cannot believe in any bibles of tradition, however plausible, given by any priestocracy, in the face of this universal sublime proof. Of course all their prophecies and miracles to prop up such pretences for man's least works, are the worst of humbugs. Who and what are antagonistic to facts of nature? Who but the priestocracy and their special peculiar bibles, that have various translations and interpretations modified by the mirror of time.

But all of priestocracy are most suspicious, and not trustworthy. All their designs were most corrupt, for temporal despotism, all they could get. Monotheism, that enlighteneth the world while she purifies it, civilizes nations, and proves herself a superior power that offers best rules for creation. She recognises the planets and suns, all the systems of systems to move in harmonious order, to organic laws that premise nature for nature's God. She reflects the moral organism, dependent on eternal principles that cannot be shaken, confirmed as it is by being total and exclusive property of her President.

But how wicked are some deists? They that are unprincipled, no matter of what profession, are base. But are the principles of deism in its purity, that of excellent monotheism, untenable? That's the question, for if they are demonstrable, from that moment I renounce all such. But that is utterly impossible, for she is the religion of principles, and the fault lies in the minds of cavilers, not critics, sophists, not philosophers. Were there any numbers of deists or monotheists who were to think previously and maturely on this subject of religion, they would all come on comparison of notes to the same primary essential conclusions of the unity of the existence and design of one Supreme. What less than principle could cause them thus to be supremely right? Deism then reflects principles that guide the world. What is wrong, then, in it? No mortal can reach higher than principles. But peculiar faiths differ essentially the world over, so much so, that the world's peace has been disturbed nearly all the time. All such have no principles, but what are essential to the very thing that they all traduce. What is wrong in them? They are all wrong. Religion must take in all minds, whether they assent to the name or not. Now peculiar faith never can take in rational mind that ought to be universal.

The world needs the want of moral and religious codes to carry the whole for unity.

Dogmatists, did you never violate all this; prevent mind by this bigoted vice, while you sophiscated all practicable? Faithites, you deprive yourselves of your own moral power, otherwise of religious influence.

You produce wholesale evils of peculiar faith and doctrines, earth's despotisms.

As to atheists and polytheists of all classes of peculiar faith, they have to become rationalists to reach the proper appreciation of God, the Creator. Mind needs a code to rule out and govern all such bigoted dogmatists.

Polytheism debauches mind, from the purest character of philosophy and science.

The animal materialism of the atheist that consigns the soul to animal mortality, comes into woful conflict with the justice of his God. How could he diminish the intrinsic worth of soul-materialism? It is his sophistry, that affects undisciplined mind. What is his position? It does not matter whether his faith or belief is acknowledged as any thing at all; he has an existence that depends necessarily on principles, to which he is amenable for all that existence involves, now responsible for a certain amount, and that tells the whole tale, proclaiming unmistakable universal facts.

Now, his verbal faith is not to be the base means for his abominations and bloody deeds. His mind is to be used for weal or wo; if not adverse to himself, it may be to billions of his race. He is a member of the universe society, and owes supreme allegiance to its best conservative principles.

If he cannot get his own wayward assent to his dreams, he is bound to advance only facts and their benefits. He affects to speak of nature, which is but an illustration of laws and elaborations emanating from the Supreme, and stop miserably short of the comprehension of the whole subject. So does the Polytheist who dwarfs the God of the universe boundless to him by his petty bible, and pretends that he has analyzed the subject, when he has not touched it at all. I criticise no effort of mind, for such praiseworthy attempt at analysis, is the very thing I seek, but for the pitiful pretences offered for that analysis. Their sophistry makes all such, God-libellers. The polytheist does not even talk of that God, but has booked a miserable apology, an abortion most rickety of a peculiar character, heathen and barbarian, for the sublime, supreme, with true effrontery of graceless priestocracy. The truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, in giving all that is liberal, from first of Genesis to Apocrypha, prove it all Apocrypha, and that there is no confidence in such pretended prophecy. Instead of proper analysis, the sophisticated priestocracy give all the go by. It was bad to see such from the ancients; it is horrible to have it from the moderns.

One of the great objections to Deism is, that some Deists have been afraid by legal causes and social proscriptions, from telling the whole truth. I have not to cite the errors of deists against deism, a self-evident principle, but to investigate the facts of the case, difficult as it may be, pure Monotheism, which is not responsible for the errors, omissions and commissions of her advocates. The reign of terror, as that of atheism in France, is alien to Monotheism in every sense, as she contemns despotism of numbers and names assumed as sacred. Many points will be urged trivial in objections to the deist, but of no moment to overthrow deism, much less Monotheism that is thoroughgoing in principles, by the side of which dogmatic polytheism and atheism cannot stand. It is a virtue and religion to deny what is not in existence, but both are delinquent in refusing a just appreciation to what is. That is their look-out, and condemns them to their scale.

But the attention of the world is arrested at the charge of licentiousness of deism. If this be inherent, deism as all other illegitimate isms, ought to be silenced. But where can an iota of this accusation be laid? By what fair means can it be properly sustained?

Where can licentiousness grow up in Monotheism, that recognises all wisdom of all laws predicated on their just principles, and seeks to correct the first by the last, by conservative, not reckless, bloody revolution. She breathes in the atmosphere of principles that never clash. It is she that defines the legitimate scope to all the vindictive passions of human nature. As rational religion, she is the concomitant of all minds, bespeaking attendance on thought, words and action, while peculiar faith, the noisy usurper allied to despots, has no such function. It is she that bestows the wisdom conservative of mind's own reflection. In her boon of universal brotherhood, all nations gain safety universal, the largest honored in the bestowal, the smallest in the reception, while all are more or less equalized by her international continental unions. She constitutes all this time and all eternity, the amplest adequate protection for vitality of humanity, physically, mentally, morally, and best of all, religiously. With such a benign radiance that proves nothing less than God, can the atheist or polytheist exist any longer on their own pure ratiocinations of rationality, however deluded they had been by puerile minds and their more imbecile books, when they rightly observe the influence of supreme light in general adaptation of means to the universal benefit of curtailing life to the present limit, thereby preventing excess of errors and power, the overwhelming accumulation of wealth, and its potent influence growing up in a few centuries, redundance of population dangerous to morals and vital enjoyment?

Turn where they will, this universal supremacy of intelligence and wisdom, superlative magnificence is conspicuous. All this is right, and of course the dogmatists are wrong.

Nature a God, atheist? You a part, represent her; are you a God? The defect is in your mind, by your abuse of reason. You have mistaken the work for the workman, the functions for the functionary.

Atheists affect that they have no God, yet they give all the functions to nature. They idolize the work, rather the conceits of their own opinions. But conceits nor opinions will answer in this most momentous subject. If the universal navigator is not invariably rightly governed by the universal chart, he will encounter breakers that may dash him and billions of compeers to atoms and ruin.

But polytheists have a peculiar god, whom they appropriate to their petty bible notions, and make consequently peculiarly imperfect. This has been the case with Jew and Gentile, who have entertained their peculiar notions. There is no essential difference between these two classes, as both are followers of their whims and notions, mere dogmatists. But the monotheists cannot permit themselves thus to act, for they have to read through cause and effect, to the final effect, the universe, and the Great First Cause, who is perfect and unadulterated, unmixed and perfectly pure.

Bible advocates have pretended to tell the world of the recantation of some dying free-thinkers, deists, who of course were of doubtful veracity, no matter on which side they were. But have they told us of the other side, that is in the majority against them, of course? Do they know, independent of notions, that principles are right, and that they are worth all the balance, and above all, are against them? But they pretend to claim mighty things about creation, because a book they call the bible, speaks about a creation which is evidently the fiction of man, and very ignorant and unprincipled at that, who of course violated all the principles of religion, truth, honesty and faith, in palming it on the world for anything.

The leaf of geology, one of God's books, proves facts of creation, difference in time of creation through the various strata, that make all such the modern pretences of the day. All the volumes of his book demonstrate all such black-letter affairs, as the most stupid and felon-blasphemies of the world, with which all rationalists are disgusted to nauseousness. The principles of Monotheism rule out entirely, all the doctrines of atheists and polytheists, but do not exile them from the whole people with whom she incorporates them all in all the neblest. She overlooks their follies, when she credits them as part of creation. She enables them to make as wise people, proper capital, and to give her all just and meritorious credit for their best duties.

The polytheist, from the crude notions of dark ages, made gods of the elements, whereas the atheist took, as he supposed, nature, earth, or what was apparent. Both are bigots, and took the effect for the cause, being undisciplined in rational science, and their bigotry confines them with false pride. Nature bespeaks an elaborate organization, and is self-evident by the finale to all creation, for the cause that generated in nature cannot be limited if once thus set agoing.

If man had spontaneous production, why is it not continued? All this idea was most vaguely conceived of nature as an independent existence at first, and has been preserved by correlative ignorance and want of analysis. When the term nature was used, language was indefinite, and analysis was paralyzed. Now nature cannot be less than the universe elaborated, which is clearly organized, and that defines the atheist to be completely ruled out. The worst of all is, that religious education is exiled from youth, that are nurtured in loose morals, from which emanates depraved and bad deportment at last. But the polytheist, by reason of the court favors of despotism, of royalty, and vitiated public opinion, mind-factured, affects to know and dictate all about this. He is the self-appointed guardian of the world, morals, and faith, and rules with the dictation of Sir Oracle, as he is, but a peculiar one, like his ancient brethren the soothsayers and augurs, his equals in untruth, effrontery, and popular imposition. Has the polytheist a conscientious adoption of rational religion? Mind most rational can appreciate by virtue of an efficient police over a mighty city, of a constitutional government over a vast people, that of religious police over the world and the universe. Then religion, the most efficient of all constitutional government by reason of its principles, functions, and attributes, cannot be divested from the universe by dogmatists, whether atheists or polytheists.

How could the ancients, as Moses, Christ, &c., be able to give a proper religious code, when they violated the principles of the universe, which they all, that is, their dramatic priestocracy, did not know, as proved clearly, most conclusively?

But the worst appropriation of religious and mental capital is by peculiar faith. Their advocates talk about the religious improvement of the world, as if it all emanated from Christianity. Now they should not libel mind and its rational, which is nothing less than religious improvement. That is only religion that takes hold of it in the right way by the right means. It gives me pleasure to accord to Christians as Jews, Mahommedans as Mormons, all that they are entitled to in religion, and that is pre-eminently monotheism.

In taking leave of this subject, it would be well to premise distinctions of mind and soul—materialism, and what is animal exclusively. Among the plausible sophistries about matter not being added to or diminished, the line of analysis must be drawn as to the universe mass, all matter, and its parts and components. The earth receives rays of universal light, dispensed by the suns of other systems, or universe suns. Is that any limit to universal means? And is not the soul above all such? The atheist, as polytheist, will have to be more schooled in the depths of philosophy ere they can make a decent showing against monotheism; but ere that, they can avail themselves best of its reflective light to irradiate their own deluded and benighted souls.

This is an inquiring, and it is to be hoped, a just age, and all that is now needed is for mind, in its best lights, to do full and ample justice to itself, in order to settle this question forever.

MIND.

What a fine thing it is to have a mind well cultivated, and possessed of all its native richness, having therefrom an inexhaustible fund for self-possession, enjoyment and satisfaction, for the possessor to have an independent and inexhaustible resource in all trying vicissitudes of woes, sorrows, and oppressions, to rise superior to all temptations, ever giving due glory to the Creator, ever competent to solve all the world problems, essential to prospective welfare.

The majesty of cultivated sound intellect, that best represents Deity, also represents man's duties and ethics, and embraces legislative, judicial, and executive responsibility. Such creates the downfall of all peculiar feudal systems, ever prevalent in all ages where mind and philosophical science are not justly represented.

An independent mind is all important to the world. The noble resolves of an independent mind bespeak the manly action, its inherent right and duty, in obedience to reason at all times, conservative of what is just, no matter how recent or novel, antagonistic and resistant to all however imposing by authority, that is evil, if enlightened and conservative to itself of rectitude.

The mighty object of all such minds, so constituted, should be to counteract the intolerant and bigoted fanaticism that interferes with the restoration of order and general brotherhood throughout the world.

This state of mind bespeaks high knowledge of what mind itself is capable by analogous review of past weakness, and criminal outrages in numerous modes disgusting to it, enlightened and raised to its elevated scale of reason.

In all ages, and in much of social intercourse, the weakness, follies and vices of mind have prevailed, under an odious feudalism, in all departments too where mind should be free and act independently.

From martial despotism to assuming criticism, this tyranny over mind is sought to be perpetrated.

When mind is brought properly to examine correctly for itself in the funds of cultivation, uninfluenced by any prejudice or improper motive, into the matured code of systems and principles all sooner or later practicable, then its universal assent will expedite what is so highly necessary to general welfare; and then, as wisdom increases, purity and independence of mind will necessarily increase and elevate themselves to a just position.

The intelligence and reason of mind are forever its best sentinels for its freedom, religion, and happiness.

By such position mind is valid to expose and rule out all hostile to its best interests and well-being.

Sound future improvement is thus premised as a necessary result on the proper operations of mind.

The excellence of mind is indispensable and invaluable for the best fruition of the present and future.

Man's best duty and highest intellectual action are a just appreciation of Deity's attributes.

This presents a fundamental starting point, that corrects much of fatal future deeds.

This position is indispensable to give a correct and sincere faith, that none can ever renounce, but all must entertain with the highest exultation and hope.

It is the essence of wisdom, the triumph of mind, the purity of philosophy, the glory of religion.

None can recant unless mind subsequently becomes deluded, and reason is lost.

Man's duty is identified with commission and omission, that involve mind and reason in all transactions in the performance of good and avoidance of evil actions, words, and thoughts.

The beauty and strength of this doctrine are, its capacity complete to present to the world, in the full recognition of mind, true definition and apprehension of the subject, its moral good and bearing, its resulting blessing, the honesty of human nature, as far as the best can rest on the supreme effect of an absolutely identified and exclusive Creator.

This doctrine does away with all the elements of antagonism; ever willing to be right, it refuses no tuition for correction, and no correction for exaltation.

The reform of the world is progressive improvement, varied but increasing in the hands of Deity, that embraces all his potent agencies and energies.

All these, man should ever seek, with due humility, to analyze, not libel any of God's acts, by miserable views and assumptions of God's character; by his own botch-work and tinkering, seeking to correct a world of God's elaboration, and thus ignobly becoming amenable to self-impeachment in his own weak and erroneous impressions and perceptions. The first part of exalted religion was mind's humility and appropriate confidence in God.

Man's part is to begin rightly, with humble and modest but just inquiry, and refer the end and accomplishment to the Supreme, with the most liberal conception of God's universal power and virtues.

Nothing sectarian or bigoted, nor ever contracted; nothing short of fair and liberal investigation of both and all sides of all questions, to arrive at truth, rational and just, should cross his path, to build up a creed or faith correspondent, that will necessarily decay sooner or later, be the delusion popular or fanciful.

This is to be the platform of principles, whose comprehension is as extensive as the universe, as desirable as time to eternity, as conservative and universal as God's attributes, that are to be the only standard; for none other is genuine, or can exist!

Unless man adopts such, all will be vain in his short-sightedness, with improper, deficient, antagonistic, peculiar faith, that leads to idolatrous devotion or man-worship; that poisons mind and all its true sources of legitimate enjoyment; all which can never enter into true faith, recognised by mind, in its enlightened reason.

Amidst the toil of circumstances arises triumphant mind, secured a worthy government of true principles, for the toleration and direction of one's own opinions and rightful actions, with a freedom of discussion, a righteous decision, a fearless assertion of manly dignity for true religion, a proper devotion to the Almighty; that all wise and true-minded freemen will acknowledge and duly reverence, as a proper construction of duty.

Intellectual freedom of mind enables it to analyze, with the justest obligation, any doctrine, to discard any or all points that enlightened reason revolts at, without being libelled and classed with any others, than those who seek to maintain the noblest character and principles of true religion.

These are American rights and freedom's blessings, hostile to none but the enemies of God, and the deceivers of mind.

The enlightened mind of the world will shake off the vassal shackles of ignorance and superstition, and adhere to no custom not sanctioned by reason and justice.

The mind, of a liberal education, attains the height of its capacity.

No matter where mind exists, it is distinguished, guided, moulded, modified, characterized, and protected by liberal education, that is one of the holiest principles of monotheism.

Then the question very rightly settles upon no locality, creed, or platform of crude opinions; no inquisition, bigotry, fanaticism, dogma, nor assumption of temporal power, no exclusive divine rights, nothing peculiar, no expounder for the principles or thing expounded, but on a proper education fund at the right time, to give forethoughts ever, not look foolishly at impotent afterthoughts; to promote mind's right cultivation, to render it well balanced and self-sustaining, pure as to the past, innocent in all, fully stored for present and future demands, for all life's drafts in its immortal treasury!

The great and vital question is, is mind invaluable, competent and able to wrestle with the gigantic conflicts in life with all the varied powers successfully and triumphantly.—Mind, that has been so grossly imposed upon for thousands of years, and cheated by all antagonistic dynasties?

Its panoply is in principles, that it must know how and when to use. It must give its own works, not peculiar faith, which is mere credulity that belongs not to the secret recesses of the immortal soul.

This is the paramount question for mind to consider all the time, and to reach. There can be none more important.

Then if mind has not made a right start, having right views, when conviction flashes with its vivid light, it must and will repent of time misspent, of faith misunderstood and misapplied, and of actions misdirected.

If untrammeled, as all mind should be forever, only aided by sound suggestions, it will seek its own best correction in referring as the most holy offering of its vows, its petitions and purity, its best actions to God, the only object of its adoration as witness.

The seal is by its best deeds and its most comprehensive duties, as its chastest designs, and the permanent resolution of its hopes and its just faith in him that only saves.

The light of one mind thus endowed and inspired reflects honor on mind, enabling the mass to become enlightened and rejoice, and gives an impulse irresistible to every age thus bound, on correct principles, to advance with firm and tenacious hold on the enlightened steps of its predecessor.

Great as every age of mind thus illumined, the future must be more so, if it be wise.

Liberal education takes away mind's trammels, remnants of dark ages, the vassal tenure that enslaves and darkens, and the glory of mind proclaims itself to the world.

The world has been most debased by tyranny of mind perverted in all the quagmires of superstition.

But brilliant lights of mind are bursting forth by the powers of liberal education, that frees mind enslaved by despotism of bigotry and superstition.

IN MIND'S PURPOSE;

Mind has to tower over all its obstacles to be itself.

In the world's school mind has to grapple, and on the world's theatre it has to declare its independence, and never be contracted to an odious localized existence.

A correct history of mind's analysis will show it, next the mighty potentate of the universe, rising forever to a higher sphere of greatness and happiness, with its progress through almost insuperable difficulties, that conquered, build up its tower, advancing to an interminable elevation, to its future refinement, worthy of greater and advancing promise,—the end the means—the means self-generating.

In feudal times, only more obsequious than the present, when castellated towers gave an earnest of the best protection to the mass circle, mind became menial, and individual liberty was merged into strong necessity and force.

Then was it that martial prowess was apparently omnipotent, and the iron weapons subdued the mental.

But all such games of life, too serious to be played with, showed the temporary defeat of mind.

The present age cannot plead such ignominy, unless by its own consent. Then it is a degrading step, when light shows the iniquity thereof.

Now victories of mind are the only ones of value, fortified by moral and religious rectitude.

Those of brute force are allied to neither worth or character before the author of mind.

The first are sublimated by purity: the last are degraded and sunk by evil results.

The duel and rencontre were decreed once, by the vices of past ages, the mighty attributes of correct decision, but now are never needed in a just and righteous cause.

How often have they been designed, and malicious assassinations, made so by all premeditated intentions and false pretences, from skilful use of arms and superior adroitness?

The tables might be turned when weapons are proposed that equalize the parties, or that the bully is not skilled in the use of; or when it is fixed that as one is to be victimized that both should die the same death, or run equal risks at once; best of all by religious legislation, where principles declare the best avenging penalties.

When man, individually or in mass, sees that he is participant of danger as well as of honors, that he can do nothing important wrong without conviction and exposure, and nothing deeply injurious with impunity, then he is not only made to pause in even his mad career, but is arrested in his execution of serious crimes, by the interposition of the wise statesman's best veto, next to enlightened public opinion.

This new regime of self-government, of order from the powers of order, weaves a chaplet to mind's power and character, and the purity of the age.

What supposed evil is there but has a counterbalancing good in the mighty potency of mind?

Then let mind be duly and rightly instructed in wisdom's lessons at the right time, and protected by all its best guardians, the right ægis of wise laws, intelligent customs, and well ordered society, then mind is nearest right of necessity.

Mind is right by knowledge, and so by necessity of habit, that is the nature of things, if not so by the highest influences.—Let all such be pure.

In the development of mental light, like man's age, many lights are nurtured to create an effulgent blaze for the vista of time previously dim to man, as mind must have enlightened mind to create the master genius.

Bright lights preceded to help to form such a master mind, that looked intellectually so high as to assert the Great First Cause, and acted so candidly to avow it in the face of tyrannical superstition forever disgraced by the rejection.

No light burst into magnificence so pure and great at once. Time, no less than mind, is to be examined and analyzed to secure the right recognition of the adequate advantages of both.

The history of nations who have advanced as the world has proceeded, step by step, teaches us to be rational and just, and to profit by the useful treasures of mind and time.

Centuries of time have advanced the development of principles to their proportionate mastery, until the mighty accumulations of light mutually irradiated each other.

Time and light have brought mind to a point actually outstripping recognised written land-marks.

The lesser luminaries are lost amid greater lights.

Under the best and safest views, then, mind has to act for itself rightly, circumspectly, and independently.

The mighty mastery of mind is conspicuously needed to avoid, in this sophisticated, humbugging world, all the varieties of forms and peculiar kinds of faith, and select that which accords with principles, which are to direct it, the beneficiary, to the true and safe issue.

A pure independence of cultivated mind is absolutely needed to protect the world from all its tricks, and all its degrading and grinding tyranny.

A want of it has engendered a peculiar faith, blinded to reason; and peculiar faith engenders a world of iniquity. Such faith is horrible, and ruinous to universal bliss of mind.

Many good citizens, seeing all professed peculiar faith so defective, believe in not even that of God, that is peremptorily necessary for the law of good morals, and the religion of principles, in the happiest management of mind.

Illustrious mind, aided by philosophical science, marks out to all the household, friends, relations, and citizens of the whole world, to reject unsafe pilotage over the many breakers of life, having character and nature not of the right stamp for universal brotherhood and power. Whatever mortal affects any other, is an impostor, and impiously discloses his character at once.

Any other than those of mind are counterfeits, that cannot pass current however much good is affected, and however sophistry, prating about faith, no more nor less than miserable credulity and superstition, delude their votaries.

It is time that mind, exalted to the lights of the present time, should assert its dignity, and claim its rights.

Down with the sophistry and pretences that thwart mind in possessing its own.

Of all the races of mankind reflecting God's innate principles, all individually must have paramount claim through mind, in degree at least.

All their claims to God's notice can only be by or through mind, man's guardian and vital pilot.

Mind can only be reflected on by science, which is knowledge and inspiration of God's conservative principles, an inspiration superior to miracles, prophecies and mysteries of all tradition bibles, whose writers are limited to the state of the times. All persons can only be reached by created mind, and mind can only be reached by and through reason, that of itself is built upon mind sound unto wisdom.

All successful tuition and missions are predicated on these principles and faculty.

Mind is the conservative for science, and can never be superseded by peculiar faith.

Its claims were established when existence commenced, and its value has increased as man's best consciousness and recognition have been awakened to its holy dignity. It truly represents Deity, its creator, and exhorts to reason, its friend and patron.

The light of mind raised itself up over the dull glare of imperfect peculiar false faith, and triumphs over fanaticism and superstition, bigotry and sophistry.

Let mind go on untrammeled under its only proper inspiration from God, and it will do the balance.

Mind perverted is to be counteracted and prevented by mind enlightened and correct.

The fund of mind is inexhaustible, from the inexhaustible treasures of the universe, proving mind a free moral and religious agent.

Every honest mind has a direct diploma from God, to whom alone that mind is responsible, whilst every dishonest and untruthful mind has comparatively renounced it, and has lost the best part of its privilege of using this most invaluable capital.

Those who see that the support arises with the God of truth and mind, resort to no false paintings.

It is the true interest of mind not to be misled by the devices of hierarchy, fanaticism or false enthusiasm—any blind misleadings or delusions of others or of self, however fascinating or seducing.

Let all conservative principles have fair play, obscured by no pretences, assailed by no influences, then, even with silent revolution, immortal good results to mind aspiring to immortality.

Every proper incentive should be furnished for proper action, and no evil obstacle interposed.

Principles, and all that they command the world through, must come sooner or later into play. Bad minds may and do pervert their order, but such men will be silenced finally.

The paramount principles of Deity will decide for the whole, and acquiescence will be wisdom for universal protection and illustrious benefits too elevated to be lost, too commanding to be neglected.

Wise men appreciate penalties as well as rewards, consequently with the liberalized advance and improvement rightly begun, with correct habits fixed and matured, a properly self-sustaining mind, their progress must be upwards and onwards.

The supposed weakness of the popular mass results too much from excessive confidence in the circle of mind, perverted and too apt to deceive them.

Profession of peculiar faith, and not that of principles, makes no difference, when latitude of power permits. All mankind must be tested, on fullest experience. Profession is a siren spirit, that has preyed on every age.

The people have the inherent means of correction amply in their own hands, if they will analyze truly that condition, and exclude the base factions hostile to them, when self-aggrandizement is the object.

The severest rebuke, the most effectual restraint on all the petty tyrants of society and of the world exists with the enlightened people, who should always make their country too hot to hold any species of absolutism.

Who can fear where facts omnipotent prevail, for the result must be happy, as all the good-minded, if unimpeded, will proceed to the right point.

The true shepherds are needed, as tyrants of all grades consider the mass like sheep or bees, obliged to follow leaders, who are too often misled by others!

The popular mass needs confidence in themselves, and much more in principles, their best protectors.

Their leaders are principles, not men above principles.

Cunning and designing men practice all kinds of deceit to get the people's confidence.

Such men are unworthy of it, thereby proving clearly their calibre.

Of course men, mere hacks when they assume to be what they are not, as proved by their course, cannot be repulsed and discarded too soon by the people. While the towering minds of the world feel above such intrigues, and rest on their talents and the principles that they respect!

Their virtues must descend, to be commemorated in their country's annals.

Mind of proper organization and natural endowments, having brains or organs expansive in depth and breadth, well balanced by judgment, conscience and will, able to impart much competent analysis of momentous subjects in the right way, should be duly estimated when possessed of virtuous patriotism.

The majority of the people generally may get out of the pale of safety, if they do not appreciate the public duties.

Can they be too well prepared to solve the difficulties that pertain to all public duties?

Their mind, if cultivated in principles, prompts them to the adoption of the select, unless debarred by absolutism that may tyrannize in social circles of even free countries. All profound minds must concede that the world needs protection. Now what is that protection?

Is it in flatterers and sycophants, deceivers and absolutists? In storms, wise men do not trust to rotten planks. The mass needs guardians—a right construction of the guardianship of the principles universally the gift of the Creator, alienated from them by various means of treachery, when they can sustain all wisely and properly. Too many minds are now crushed and withering, by the pretended wisdom of conceited leaders.

When the touchstone of principle that cultivated mind honors, is preferred by all wise people to any man or set of men, then man-worship must be abolished, as the people will wish to be safe.

All public virtues should be duly rewarded, beyond that the people injure themselves.

A wise people, duly enlightened, must ever inquire for correct principles.

Will they blindly submit to any set of mortals, all being fallible, to conduct them independent of mind, reason and principles?

They are then the vassal slaves of the worst absolutism. The absolutism over mind uncultivated of professions that are insidious disguises by names, is the most dangerous to the world's freedom and noblest interests.

Man's own action on the best light of mind should save him from the curse of omission and neglect that deluged for centuries continents in blood, for mad ambition, conquest and rapine and most wicked church power, from the curse of even seeing mind wrecked in the tortures of inquisitorial tyranny and bigotry of absolutism, therefore he cannot exert too much, on his own best resources, all the powers of his cultivated intellect.

Plausible bigotry upheld by brutal force, has been too prevalent in every age, disgraced by the effusions of the blood of millions shed for centuries over the world, for mad, reckless, and lawless passions, conquest and dominion. These are upheld by sophistry, that fostered the mad conflicts of contending ignorance and prejudice. And what a hold has sophistry on the world?

She paints with all colors, and subdues captive, the mighty mind that is to rule and reign over her superiors. What is this that deceives men? They deceive themselves. The mind of God is only recognised by man's mind; all instruction of the first, is addressed to the latter.

Mind can therefore rightly have no prejudice, as benevolence of man must extend to man, but could not, if its principles were not universal. It is the error and fault of education. True knowledge and science must be conservative.

Emanating from all compatible freedom, the mind seeks its own pure rights, an equal and general participation here, and an everlasting fruition on a base sure and certain to obtain it, a base whose purity possessed guarantees not only immortality, but that most desirable.

Without the ever watchful action of mind, no one is safe. All mind's prospects are uncertain for time and eternity, when all stop short necessarily of the true object of creation. The mind endowed with freedom with man, a free agent from its Creator, will rise higher upwards and onwards, to its ultimate titles in fee simple given by the exclusive proprietor, and will dash to the dust all that impede its progress. It is expected to act to the full, in accordance with a sound faith and professions, that are for man's safety, not for the world's direst oppression and cruel ruin.

Then let mind adopt by all means, the wisest and best, the only ones that can insure salvation.

Mind in every age and country, is analogously situated. Take away the light of reason, which means comparative refined mental knowledge with its inherent power, and mind is destitute indeed, and society most deeply injured. The progress of the social blessings is stopped, and to advance, the same circle has to be gone over eternally.

Thanks to the improvement and invention of printing, one of the inspirations of mind, the records of science are now fixed, and the records of vice distinctly mirrored. Mind must be totally blind, to overlook the reflections from such obvious truths. Its freedom and virtue rest on immutable principles vouchsafed by the Creator, and fortunately rest in the keeping of no sect or creed, but in its own illumined treasury. The great question how best cultivate these principles after they are ascertained, is unmistakably addressed to the world. The world depends on better means and capacity for improvement, than the botches of profession appreciate, whose vitiated and abominable doctrines mar its beauties, and condemn these workers of iniquity, of foul deeds, and ignoble ingratitude.

What is more becoming than for man to acquiesce in the fixed laws of nature, and devote them to their legitimate purposes? To all this cultivated mind must bring all its best powers, that vulgar errors should be duly corrected, however sanctioned by absurd customs. The masses of every age are unfortunately check-mated by the cunning devices of those who are bound to do mind justice, but who avail themselves of its weak points, render them vicious or perverted, to secure more important parts of their complete mastery.

Never will this be fully corrected till every mind is its own best committee of the world's affairs, to the extent of its innate capacity, untrammeled by insidious advice.

Self-exposed errors are the worst of all, and hardest to be eradicated.

The Creator gave organs of mind, and fixed them by laws that cannot be easily reversed after habit has decided. All the world's legislators should premise correct positions at once, and do everything right at first, always. All officials of constitutional government must address mind through Monotheism. Mind acting on mind, has passed on by the silent but effectual agency of thought inspired by its mighty author.

Mind must not disgrace its best gifts, its own talents and its own analysis, its self-knowledge and its self-government, its capacity for avoidance of merited penalties, and its meritorious security of rewards, by embrace of superstition in any of its delusive characters compromising escape of injuries terrestrial, and its immortal anticipations of things to come.

God made mind as it is, for mind to correct itself, that it might have merit when called to account for its jewel attributes.

Mind has to take its position in the midst of the universe, and perform with promptness and alacrity the right functions in the right soul, all that is required of it to reach the best future position attainable. That is the only safety. What are those functions? It has to learn in the school of the world, its only comprehensive theatre.

While mind is modest in its ignorance, discards errors, not libels itself, much less its author, God, the will may be taken by the God of mercy for the deed.

Deity never intended for mind to be deformed by superstition, or polluted by man's base speculations and traffic in professions, designs, intrigues, ambitions, corruptions that must as improper fundamental evils, run out to the final injury of all that come in the sphere of their malign influence.

God gave mind capable of being God-like, by reaching the perfection of its capacity and attributes. God is then to be appreciated by the best action of mind, not libeled by ungrateful demoralization of its nature. The question of its proper sense is not, why did God not give man a better sphere of existence? but, what sphere of future enjoyment shall he obtain by his merit on this present sphere?

Mind must not speculate in discontent here, while it has every reason, obligation and nobler impulses, to improve that condition.

Physical existence of itself, is not independent of morals and religion. Their union bespeaks the highest theme for mind to act on, to improve all as a faithful guardian, responsible to the proprietor universal, not peculiar, for that would be man.

Are the lights of mind in the van, battling against superstition? No, they are often full fed on its gorgeous pamperings. Such often act or say, that one faith may be as good as another!

In the dark ages, when mind was incapable of assertion of rights and protection of self, permitting wars of no principle, but ignoble purposes, plunder and conquest, throughout the world; we could expect no elevation of sentiment, but now the reverse of circumstances should cause us to put the reverse of the dark ages.

Then it was that mind's power and light were negatived, for reason held no tribunal.

To the shrine of the mass thus corrupted, sectarian and bigoted views of selfish ambition sacrificed.

Ask one who has generalized his views, why there are barbarians, cannibals, &c.

The advocate for bible traditions may affect that it is for want of the gospel.

The philosopher who advocates rational views in the whole problem of life, will prove it is for want of light of mind and civilization. That light and reason will lead to the expression of religion and social duty of man to man.

The analyst will see but little or no difference between the cannibalism of savages and the butchery of those who affect the highest civilization, if it do not preclude the degrading crimes of slaughter and bloodshed, unless in the noble position of self-preservation, any other will put all into the same category of life-destruction. And is this the position of the boasted faiths of the present day, after all their peculiar pretensions instituted so many centuries for this and all other purposes of civilization. After all, the best of them are only an advance in peculiar faith, not in universal civilization, which it cannot reach, as it has been debarred from most of the world at all times! After eighteen centuries of the earth's annual revolutions, the highest boasts of all such faiths cannot begin to enter where God's creation birth-right, the religion of mind, has been in existence all the time! The dupes of peculiar faith may not see all this, but any other knowingly affecting the supremacy of this faith before the real supremacy of mind, outlaws himself from the best benefits of mind. How many nations of the world have had no gospel of bible tradition, yet they were more or less civilized, as mind was permitted expansion in all its glories, the true freedom of acting on mind by truth and rational discussion.

Many of the ancient nations, and conspicuously among them the Greeks and the Romans, improved in their laws and civilization, in the progress of time.

All countries will improve in time by the lights of the world, through commerce, navigation, science, industrial labor, manufactures, or fall back to dark ages, by abominable wars, that produce barbarism.

But the great question before the world is not, What shall be done with the scriptures, that are not only not essential to its happiness, but have been one of its worst detriments and nuisances, but, What has mind to do?

In the first place, mind has to assert and vindicate its own exalted supreme worth, as the greatest gift of the universe, and knowing the object of its exclusive adoration and all the appropriate functions.

In the next place, mind has to aid in ridding the world of all exploded and obsolete doctrines of messiahships.

Is it possible for any rational mind to believe that the Supreme would introduce any such system, that was not only a usurpation on his rights, but a stultifying himself by the proof too of his own imbecility?

This is the insignificant degradation of mind that peculiar faith elaborates.

How and when could this absurd nonsense arise, that reflects the knavery of the originators on the stupidity of all the propagators?

Give in rational religion forever all the full, decisive proof, that reason tells her high minded and intelligent faith to adopt, otherwise be wisely silent in refusal, as the faith that skulks from investigation is dishonest. This should be from the essential nature of things; for if such be not faithfully produced, then the mind is surrendered, as that of the juggernaut devotee, to self-delusion.

We then believe things on mere assertion, because it is called religion, and its characters of authorship gods, while at the same time, if our minds were free to investigate, we should speedily denounce the whole imposition, sustained by temporal force of absolutism, and the sophisticated one of superstition.

Mind when perverted sticks at nothing, sacred or profane, to attain its base purposes, especially if fanaticism and superstition excite it; there is no bound to its credulity, no more than that under the influence of psychology; then sound and correct minds must counteract all such, by all the conservative principles of their nature. Let no name or authority of mortals impose on minds, unauthorized on the unmistakable principles of mind. Mind owes it to itself to take cognizance of all belief, and scan all the circumstances.

Belief leads to action—impulse, weal or wo—proscription, tyranny—unless reason arrest at the right point.

It is obligatory on toleration to give due and liberal credit, for all minds seeking eternal salvation, for purity of motives, in all their peculiar creeds, however erroneous, until their light of knowledge enables them to do better. Propriety of feeling and freedom of mind urge all this in rational opinions.

The next question then, is, how put them in the right way? Appeal to that which governs the universe, reason forever.

None but deceivers, knowing it to be false, can pretend that the people cannot recognise what is their interest, if all the facts be duly discussed.

Equal liberality in faith is to be mutually accorded by liberal and enlightened minds, till reason convinces to the right one, as all are equally good till her decision is made.

In the past dark ages, not yet elapsed, anything but reason, when interest spoke, shaped the course of faith of all kinds; and that will ever be, until God's conservative principles master every demagogue, that affects to be master of peculiar systems, the most outrageous of all mind despotisms.

There are always two parties for mind's operations, and both have to stand to no peculiarity that can never exist, but to the right decision of reason.

The right stands to reason. All others are self-delusion martyrs of the true stamp, as Socrates, suffered for rights of mind.

Others, as the Juggernaut devotees and martyrs, so called, though acting under delusion, have suffered for a correct principle, unfortunately misdirected.

Their sincerity of belief, though wrong, proves their honest conviction of mind, but not the correctness of that faith, nor the light of that mind.

They suffered for the right of mind, the independence of thought, that was ultimately to see the clear light of rational religion, by rational discussion.

This martyrdom the true braves of the world suffer in many respects, political or any other; all subserving the noblest purposes at the sacrifice of life, when ruthlessly taken. Rodgers suffered for principles of thinking right, though he was under delusion. He was a martyr, as millions, to the freedom of thought, however misdirected.

The right point can only be attained by proper discussion, in time by philosophical science, proper freedom of principles, that vindicate themselves.

Is not mind disgusted with all the antagonisms of peculiar faith? She can end all this, once and forever, when enlightened. What right has any man to deny the rights of mind in any part of its domain?

Mind must be ever grateful to all that labor purely for rational views, for it owes no other obligations.

The clergy that operate by the benevolence of the age, that would rebuke anything less, are with mind and its rational labors.

The people are ever disposed to be on the right side, if they look at their best permanent interests; they cannot be anywhere else; but deep, designing, and base leaders, have misled them too often to their ruin and deepest regret. The spirit of God is always in advance, and beckons so plainly that all minds can take the best heed.

But here is the difficulty.

How can we expect mind perverted with priestocracy, those deriving personal advantages from the existing order of things, disposed to change voluntarily, when the government of all is in their hands?

As bad as absolutism is, productive of evil to the most, who expects it voluntarily to change for constitutional government, that gives good to the most, to all? Will any absolutism of perverted mind willingly yield?

The class of absolutism, a multitudinous number in conflict, and antagonistic with the best condition of man, brings forth collusions most insidious, to defeat the best efforts of mind.

Mind must be properly disciplined in science education, ever watchful, and aroused in its proper efforts, and must counteract all at the start, else it may be circumvented in toils of sophistry.

All resorts to sophistry the most cunning, the negative to true philosophy, will be used under all disguises, even in the name of rational religion.

We can see this system for victory constantly used in contests political as well as faith.

This plausible personage assumes the costume of philosophy, as well as her titles, until ignominiously expelled from her base pretensions, universally at the tribunal of reason and worth.

She dealeth in self-delusion and logical folly, but her footsteps are backward to monomania.

She is a destructive genius all the time, especially to those she particularly promises to defend.

Her slippery tongue promises successful results to basest characters, but she breaketh her promises as soon as made, for if she be bravely followed she is an exposed cheat and a miserably false-pretender, directing wrong and perverting good all the time.

Her wisdom is cunning, her cunning folly and deception, and the end ruinous and disgraceful.

All will be well repaid to look faithfully at the profound analysis of the human mind, the wondrous gift of the Almighty—from the infant's step, from innocence to reason and wisdom, bound to its physical encasement, inseparable and indivisible on earth, progressive in appreciation and enjoyment.

How beautifully consistent is the analogy of mind's structure, for future purposes under the proper direction.

There is no delusion worse than that of self-delusion, no injury worse than that which produces self-reproach.

Who so destitute in reason, that he has no proper base for self-protection, must receive it from public guardianship.

What gives law protection but the agency of mind?

What has any form of peculiar faith to do with this?

The principles of law and religion are indissoluble, but no form is requisite at all.

There might as well be a church for law as for forms of faith.

Both are executed in each other's temple, the mind.

Let the theatre of operations for mind be first mind itself. The innocent mind is not to be sacrificed as a victim to misguided education, so miscalled, to become the cannibal of society, the fanatic, idolator, or whatever the custom of circumstances imposes upon the benighted intellect. Such mind, modified by such circumstances, is ready to do the bidding of demoralizing superstition, to call an impostor master, and the possessor refuse the only allegiance to its own noblest gift, a sound mind, and to its most Omnipotent Author.

The possessor may blunder in the rubbish of prejudice, where he might reign triumphantly as a man, and claim mind's sacred prerogatives, if such being could appreciate his position.

Then it becomes all good citizens to plan for the best views that reason authorizes, to protect mind as self-preservation.

When mortals commune with God the Author of mind, to whom all their reverence is exclusively due, that mind owes and can pay at all, a debt of gratitude that is glorious to the debtor; they commune with themselves, thereby exerting the most salutary influence in improvement of themselves in mind and its best improvable qualities.

In seeking that improvement we get the best standard, and secure the improvement of the whole, soul, body and attributes, to the limited extent of our nature and capacity of our resources.

Humanity, enlightened and instructed in the lights of mind's treasures, enables us to pay the appropriate tribute to all to whom tribute is due, in any area of the five grand divisions of the world where we toil for man's good.

Such humanity, good feeling and action, enable us to reach our whole duty to man, and constitute the excellence of the human character.

People, sovereigns of the world, must act up to the high commands of mind, that sublime gift of man, that is the possessor to its appropriate sphere, not a fanatical brute that demands faith-restrictions, and compels it by tortures for self-power or ignoble revenge.

Mind of this age is not to monopolize for a moment, as it will afterward be accursed in men's memories.

This is not the time for bigotry, that bends all mental materials with impious sophistry to superstition, rising from absurd and stupid idolatry to sacrifices of people's rights and feelings, and that has sacrificed human victims, in past times, without pity.

She has broken recusants to her absurd faith on the wheel of torture and death, butchered millions in civil and crusade, miscalled holy wars, has tyrannized in every age with brute force, subservient to blind acquiescence to the absurd notions and peculiar faiths of the day, that never thinks of one of the noblest attributes of progressive improvement and independent mind.

Due credit must be given to mind and facts, and the legitimate deductions that reason draws from them.

Mind must never be trammeled by any peculiar faith alien to its good.

All faith other than rational, that of true religion, is alien to mind's welfare and the world's happiness.

All sectarian faiths will subside on proper improvement of mind to a rational perception of duty, that enjoins then the belief in the one living God to be universal, as proved by all principles and all sense that is right in the universe.

Man must not act the vassal, like animals that follow a certain fellow leader.

He is constituted with mind, his leader to God his Creator.

Man, then, is not the leader; man's work, bible tradition, is not the leader, but mind acting on mind and evolving reason.

All people have some errors, the wisest seek the least, except the adherents of tradition-faith to which they are blindly devoted by the worship of idolatry.

Most are not master minds to originate the true state of things, therefore the world has to review at every principal period of time, like individuals, its position.

Happy is the people that can secure the genuine free benefits of revolution, without its scourges. That ought to be the present state of mind, and would be, but for the curses of monopoly and usurpation.

In all the intricacies of superstition, mind cultivated to its liberal capacity, is expedient for the best correction. All depend on science, to be elicited by wise investigation and comprehensive elucidation.

By this process many of the strongholds have fallen. Most of the assigned virtues of the moon and stars, another edition of priestocracy, are either exploded or surely assailable.

The moon only presents mathematical appearances of changes in her form from the earth's shadows, not from any intrinsic characteristic changes.

Most all such of past phenomena, looked upon as influential, are analogous.

Eclipses have actually alarmed the minds of many nations, just emerging from barbarism.

Few of mankind can correctly analyze: they act by impulse and passive induction, and vassal obedience.

Potency of mind, sovereign creature of the universe, thou art to be cultivated with the most strenuous care and regard, to be the protectress of worth, guardian of rights, and the lever of character.

The potency of this mightiest element is for weal or wo, like other elements, and its errors must be mastered, else it may cast all to utter fragments, as misdirected steam.

The right cultivation is essential to the essential appreciation and enjoyment of life.

That individual nation or world only partially exists, that does not enjoy the pre-requisites of mind, whose powers most rationally cultivated are next to omnipotence.

The mind crushed by absolutism requires ages before men can refrain from being womanish, women childish by superstition, that may render all brutish.

No doubt absolutists, and all the adherents of power, the interested participants, and the host of menials that bow to those that honor them as office holders, all these minions had peculiar faith superstitious aids to bind the frail human mind under its weak and assailable points, to the governmental influences.

Mind with its full fund of elemental knowledge cannot be trammeled, in its rightful operations.

It cannot be excluded from the verdict of reason, that is universal protection among free and enlightened minds.

Mind was at first endowed with inherent and innate capacity, faculty, and function of religion by God, that can never be eradicated surely in a sound state, and their evolution is best facilitated by proper cultivation of mind that refers to all conservative principles.

Mind, then, has not science at first creation, that is rational, but its science is evolved by mind acting on mind; thus man has been elevated instead of fallen, as bible tradition would have us believe.

The Creator inspires mind to the best, and consequently, the idea of some that the Ruler of all things, making man as he is, entitled mankind to exemption from penalty of transgression, is not tenable to common observation.

Mind, in its kind and character, is influenced by education, that limits mankind to its character more or less; how important then that the fund of mind should be of the noblest calibre and quality.

Of all the blasphemies that could be possibly devised, of all the detestable machinery for punishment, what could be more execrable to mankind that aspire to the proper standard of mind, than the trammels of superstition that uses the brute force of the inquisition, and the insidious knavery of sophistry?

The good citizens of the world must have patience for time to correct all, that principles may be vindicated.

The conservative state of mind is an innate faculty fund of principle from the Creator, identified with mind, and all identified with education most rational.

Fundamental principles never can be divided.

Enlighten mind in the midst of the world's circumstances with the best funds of science, to attain its best possible triumph.

Mind is located in the centre of various routes and only one right; all the rest are those of sophistry and superstition. In the wilderness of uncertainty, mind alone, when rightly cultivated, can master the right one.

It will then discard the bigotry of traditional faith and the errors of chance direction, soliciting the rational only as the true faith, because it is the only safe one, considering all else false and finally unsafe.

Let the world act becoming the better progress of mind. Man's mind has been downtrodden for too many ages, and crushed by the severest circumstances of absolutism, governmental and church, and therefore must pass through its transition states.

Mind must learn the lessons of freedom and help itself by conservative revolution, to burst asunder the immense chains around the necks of the people who cannot otherwise be divested thereof, till the blood of millions flows.

Families of nations will arise to the feast of freedom that will lower absolutism.

The successor of those who exacted homage of royal heads, has been a petitioner for the aid of royal hands, but has obtained the favor of republicans so called, against his revolutionized people.

Principles are everything, professions nothing, in France, Italy, or the world.

Mind has not yet reached its elevation, where it has been so long crushed. One of the proofs of absolutism has yet been left in the ascendency, and this the hierarchy has given its insidious blow to freedom and the dearest interests of mind.

But thrones shall be as dust, before freedom and true religion, and peculiar faith in all its hierarchies will yet do obeisance to rational religion, that honors true government of the sovereign people.

God will favor strong minds and right actions.

The present age should dispense all practicable tuition to the world, and place the mind independent of feudal traditions, and secure the rightful benefits delayed by prostituted and imbecile criticism.

Where was criticism, that should honor mind and science much of past time?

Silenced and martyrized, one of the only true martyrs, a sufferer for the truth.

Rise, light and vindicator of the world, of God, of religion, of justice, and science. Teach man his true duty, and that his pretences, if unjust, are all vain and perishable.

All that obey thy pure precepts recollect that unprincipled man has been paid by the spoils of conquest, and the object is of little moment provided he attains them; that the talisman of superstition, disguised under peculiar faith, has rioted again and again, without being yet satiated with human gore and human suffering: that it is the pay of speculation that makes these trades, about which the conscience of ambition, stimulated by avarice, has acted in past scenes. And what limit has such conscience, no matter how called or painted, no matter under what banner or sign?

We might as well ask, what would be the limit of pirates, perjurers, and felons, but for the action of wise laws?

Thine is the mighty function of conscience, free and rational mind, a province supreme over all the pretences of the messiahships of the world, that cannot begin to effect any such divine inspiration. Thus is the Lord of the universe able to characterize his supreme greatness, over all man's pretensions.

Mind, then, can adapt itself to its select choice, subject to the supreme supervising conservative principles ever existent and active.

Intolerance, then, is not to be put down by undue influence, but to be corrected by light of rational mind in rational discussion.

Mind should be protected against the weak and blind deception of perversion, perjury, &c.

It is science, and the God of science and philosophy, who act on mind.

Mind is the beneficiary, the self and free agent.

But are not the lights of science and philosophy the true friends of wise men, not as plain in all the other deformities of superstition?

When will be their due present time, to be honored and crowned in triumph? Will it be always the future?

The solution of this paramount question belongs to enlightened freemen.

Are you free, and not enlightened? Or are you enlightened, but timid to act?

All nature cries aloud for man to assert his dignity with progressive intelligence, truth her sphere, then Deity will have his entire supremacy on the free agency of mind.

It is for the world to appreciate its treasure blessings, to evolve them, the trust-fund, the treasury exhaustless, by mind, potent representative of Omniscience.

Mind has to be ever modest to construe God rightly through his works, to which time will introduce it by science, otherwise it libels him and his deeds most vilely.

A sacred silence must preside over its ratiocination, when any other than due peace is likely to be the result.

Mind, not God, creates an original devil or a fallen angel. What a compliment, unworthy of its own powers of analysis that exalts Deity, not disgraces itself by impiety to the bible's heaven.

The world in good faith to its intelligence and its author, must unlearn all its myths that universally libel God. Who of sound mind and action, wants any of all the creeds of the faith world, but the proper one? Of whom shall we inquire, but of God alone, by and through mind the beneficiary?

How miserable may be some duped of their wealth by gilded baits through degraded men, or by some just means of retribution, but how much more miserable to be defrauded of their soul's immortal rights, by any bible games of humbug or electioneering, that are played in this world over mind!

When mighty baits are held out, the temptation is irresistible unless mind wisely counteracts them all. But the best thing to sustain mankind in life, is fair and honest dealing in truth, at all times for adversity or life's close, and all that is comprehended by rational religion.

Mankind must ever consider not what the world thinks, but what God knows is right.

It has to correct on past errors, and act rightly and consistently, with just duty.

The various ages of the world teach man much to benefit, for none are barren of the blessings of nature's wisdom.

This duty is to progress not retrograde, and enlarge the stock of previous intellectual and moral worth, obedient to reason's friends, virtue, &c.

The error of brutalizing human nature can be fundamentally corrected, in prior correction of mind's persuasions.

The strictest attention of mind discovers duty, and performs it.

The Infinite God originates all, but the finite creatures can only appropriate the result, and if with no thanks or justice, are usurpers.

What is the holy alliance but that of the people, to uphold the crushed mind of oppression?

Mind then has ever to regard its titles.

What proof does the history of sects afford, that furnishes the best evidences of mind's imbecility and corruption, but a piece of cunning machinery for priests' and preachers' benefit, however prejudicial to the whole people besides?

Here then is the highest proof of mind on one side, that of priestocracy, for ever antagonistical to that of the people.

Who can overlook the best displays of mind in the comforts of the lonely stranger Park, in Africa, among his colored guests, or the comparatively pure displays of conscience of the ancient philosopher Socrates, all showing the impress of one great Being Creator of the means to originate this mighty union of the world? Mind is the means of improvement, in all relations of God and man There can be no other at all, under God's inspiration.

It is the means of reward, and the cause of punishment, all of it at least in this world.

It is that which takes cognizance in conscience, and in a state of remorse suffers one of the deepest and severest punishments.

On the death-bed, much agony may be embraced in minutes even.

What is the bible of inspiration, but the bible of mind?

Is it not the act of the light of mind rising to its loftiest powers, self-government, that characterizes mind, as the endowment of the Creator on animated nature of man in various gradations?

Mind can detect the whole game of life.

When mind comes forward to assert its own, it is wantonly intrigued against even by its own household, and the various impositions to be the plausible substitutes, and made to assume by all the wiles of deluding and seducing sophistry, every appearance of the true claimants.

Reason having been called on, quickly decides the whole question of right, and gives the potency of truth her beautiful strength.

When persons ask what is to be done, if the substitutes for mind be taken away in the show of bible pretences and vicegerentships, seeing that they have the mighty power of mind their only true friend, they are like boys who wish to cleave very erroneously to bladders all the time, and are at a loss to know how they can possibly do without them for overcoming the mighty element, the ocean, though they have those main functions that mainly constitute them, adepts for self-preservation, their own strong limbs and powers inherent in the body combined with the nature of the element, so well adapted to the best processes of mind properly directed. They forget that their own ships are the appropriate means of navigation. Arouse mind all the time, assert thy rights that are the richest, and thy claims and merits that are invaluable. Thy destiny is command of souls; thy province is to reach immortality, through maturity of virtues; a blossom on this earth to fructify and expand in all the riches of thy glory, thy sphere cannot be confined to earth, when thou diffusest thyself among the universe, and thy duty is self-introduction to the pure presence of Deity, Almighty mind's creator, thy necessary monitor, only guardian and faithful preserver.

Mind then is to protect the world, not to fall under par to Deity.

Is the world to lose its right hold on science, philosophy and civilization of mind for peculiar faith, worth nothing after all?

The wisest institutions of mind all the time, must be made to head otherwise insuperable difficulties; hence, we see the necessity of honoring mind's action all the time, as the master agent of God, the only Messiah, to apply most wisely his doctrines. But for the self-preservation of mind, where would be the world, but perpetually at the feet of absolutism in all its wiles, and most inextricably so?

Nations of non-resistance would have to yield to base nations, who would tyrannize over the world in proportion to peculiar power.

Weak-minded individuals would be at the mercy of unreasonable people, who would become more unprincipled the more they obtained impunity.

All the peculiar advantages of peculiar action of mind would be dangerously carried out to the worst abuses of the world, if principles of mind did not withstand them.

But now, mind every day, is asserting God's principles that vindicate their position; hence, if right and justice be done, the reputation of the party is most powerfully sustained against encroachments.

Mind can overcome all the difficulties of the world, if mind be addressed through reason.

This, then, is the regeneration of the world, where mind's cultivation elicits the enlightened conscience, that comes on God's teaching and inspiration in the various conditions of man's being and feelings, as from national and individual positions. The death of relations and of friends causes man to feel, think, and experience reflections, that may often change the course of the worst habits.

It is time and principle, that work on mind.

Who is not wiser to-day than yesterday, has never been a beneficiary of mind, and presents a monstrosity in nature abhorrent to the universe.

Philosophy is common and proper sense, embracing mind, reason and principles. The progressive improvement of religion continues to arise from the simplest impressions, suited to the capacity of all minds, and is a stultified object of peculiar faith only a matter of degradation, if Messiahship be embraced.

Religion and philosophy, are the telegraphs of God's mind. They teach that mind must be honorable, and honest to God alone, for if it pay obeisance to anything more, it dishonors God and itself by abominations.

None go to infants, savages, or cannibals about religion, until mind can operate fully and effectually in all such subjects, through mental, moral, and science cultivation, for it is perfectly unreasonable to do otherwise.

Mind is, then, the noblest gift of God.

It is only mind that commences from or with God. Mind can only be rightly conscious of God, of no other power can it take equal or right cognizance.

Who, without full, fair, satisfactory, and intellectual energies, could conceive the iniquity of perverted and ignorant mind?

It is for mind to arouse up its energy and retain its truth, as most do not honor the last, and the least of the many possess the first as a rational friend.

The great end and aim of moral and religious science is to govern intellectually the whole mind, to embrace the circle of its cultivation, to comprehend its duties and its appreciations of God, whose magnanimity cannot be dwarfed by mind's incapacity, however mind exposes its own infatuation, foibles, and libels, from perversion of education.

Mind must seek its present good by wise restrictions self-imposed, making virtues of self-denial, forbearance and self-government, and secure its future happiness by adequate and worthy exertions, relying on right sources.

Who can appreciate all the inherent virtues of cultivated intellect?

What man resolves particularly to his immediate interest and narrow views, any day bad absolutely, when such cannot be in due consideration to an all-wise Deity, or to all persons of the world? God creates no evil. The God of nature gives the greatest good to the most, not to any peculiar people; and if the day be wet and rainy, the water promoted navigation, commerce, agriculture, and various healthy and necessary modifications of the atmosphere.

We must take the most comprehensive view in religion, morals, physics, and mind, otherwise mind is an eternal libeller of God.

No philosophical mind can believe that all men and women have their price. It is a libel on the race by corrupt men themselves of corrupt times, age, and circle, breathing a vitiated atmosphere.

The conservative virtue is in mind, that must be regenerated by the highest moral, intellectual and religious civilization.

Under the best state of such position, who believes that there can be purchase by money of friendship, that can be duly estimated by the world? Could all the world's gold have purchased the chastity of a Lucretia, or the friendship of Damon and Pythias? Partial analysis of mind and society causes their libels.

Who that hears of low life in large cities but must be struck with the bold fact, that society requires new organizations to correct errors and vices, from the unnatural division by fictitious, not genuine, distinction; not merits of mind, but demerits of dollars. The frame work of society is in an unnatural state, and demands correction. Crime, then, is in excess by reason of mind not asserting its proper empire. The proper tuition of mind demands precedence of wealth. By ignorance and resulting error it is easy to fall into vice; all can do that; very few can raise themselves at once into virtue. The world needs an independent start in life, and mind requires innocent culture. What have we not to gain in timely cultivation of the unsophisticated, candid mind, to prepare it to meet and triumph over the wily intrigues of perverted minds?

What a jewel is mind if rightly cultivated and polished!

Legions mislead in history, judgment, and tradition, therefore mind must have its own funds to create a sound judgment, a correct independence, exempt from all flagrant impressions.

Most minds would follow the physiological and phrenological organic developments, but for mental government, the best of all governments received from schools. Let, then, the best tuition regulate all minds.

With firmness, justice, and talents, rightly directed, mind towers in the world, therefore, a great triumph of mind is over the passions. Rational mind does that supremely best.

We consider that mind and its operations take precedence of faith of any particular, peculiar character, distinct from the true principles connected to mind.

Let faith be what it may, still, without mind where would faith be? and this decides at once and forever, without controversy or difficulty, that mind must invariably, for two reasons, take precedence of faith, as the object to be attained is paramount safety of mind, and through its own powers and qualities.

What would the universe be but for mind? A blank.

The universe was created for mind by God, that is more than its soul, as he is Supreme Intelligence itself.

Mind is God's chiefest good, and greatest care.

It is not miracles but life occurrences mind has to analyze, meet, and fulfil. Miracles are alien to its subject at this day of science. Messiahships cannot supersede mind in any respect, nor command the confidence and respect of the rightful beneficiary, an honorable mind; much less, then, can they supersede God's impression on mind, when finally corrected by the verifications of science.

Nothing of the kind uniformly protects, but is left to the action of time, a most uncertain contingency.

Such stand as perishing memorials, whereas God's is eternal, and endures as long as man and mind.

The progress and advance of mind are so extensive as to cause us to congratulate ourselves on the glorious results.

Mind enables us to reach the standard of respect, when we are right and rational; we cannot be far wrong when we seek to approach the same.

How can we protect ourselves best from the world? By being right, appreciated by mind's knowledge, that necessarily embraces the most philosophical science.

Good and true citizens will act to their and country's honor, independent of laws from principles, and superior to all absurd and bad legislation by the highest actions of mind.

The proper analysis of most things may be unknown to the people in general, but none can mistake the intention that to be right should always be pure.

The standard of public morals is not generally high enough in all circles of the world, certainly not in a corrupt society of what is called civilization.

The low bred are generally great nuisances in all countries where mind cannot become the rational leader, and take precedence of peculiar faith.

Is there aught but what cultivated mind is not the guardian?

Some tribes of Indians are as wise as the wisest in looking to the Great Spirit, if unrestricted in that position, without the aid of a more refined priestocracy; but they should be enlightened in philosophical science, if practicable, to render their minds the great beneficiaries of the world, benefactors in turn to mankind.

Mind's highest attributes and qualities are not the work of accident, but of uniform enlightenment. Its various organs are to be duly and constantly cultivated in the legitimate sphere, and pre-eminently as that of conscientiousness, that so conspicuously rules much of free agency.

Believing that the fundamental principles of phrenology, as defined by physiology, are magnificently great and elevated God-like endowments, whereby mind is thus constituted to act, the results, thought, understanding, and wisdom, cannot be too highly exalted.

The difficulties, dangers and trials of life are to be met by mastery of mind, not by the battlings of brute force, that demoralizes the world.

We all need self and well balanced minds.

All matured minds that are rational, will admit the need of correct education and views of society that unfortunately too many never get till too late, if ever mind must be balanced, and ever independent of extraneous causes, to exclude bigotry, sectarian, and partisan tyrant.

Universal toleration of opinion goes really to freedom of mind and reason, that certainly are given to scan peculiar faith, that may involve antagonism to fundamental principles, according as men are influenced by peculiar motives.

Bigotry must be effectually vanquished by the light, independence and blessings of rational minds.

It becomes persons of mind to cultivate that mind in the best lights of liberal and rational conscience, that its cultivation may properly reach general and substantial science, in all that comes within their scope to enlighten and adorn.

They must recollect that honesty and truth are principles of religion, and not at all by excellence of church or sect.

Honest and truthful minds dislike the fellowship of the many stumbling blocks already there, men who might cast reproach upon them, and whose antagonism might be effectual, in a church trial, of not only traducing worth of character far above them, but even to convict improperly.

This may be a bane of society.

The world would be a penitentiary more than man's theatre, were it not for mind that avails itself of capital and labor for economists.

The duty of mind is to the Creator of the universe, its exclusive object of adoration.

Any other is untrue, and the error so dangerous to the public, as the sooner excluded the better.

Many several kinds are supported but with invidious sophistry, that usurps truth and beguiles mankind.

The only revelation of the God of the universe is mind's universal inspiration, lighted up at the temple of science and proper sense, through the creation, as recognised universally by mind and reason.

All else is false pretences more or less contradictory, and clashing with God's eternal principles.

God's book and scriptures are in the universe alike imperishable, that shows an Almighty Architect, Preserver and Self-sustained.

All others are an imposition and counterfeit in the whole system of truth.

The advocates of pretended revelation must let alone all systems of faith that do not do universal good to man, and accord the only glory to God, appreciating God's exclusive attributes.

All else is superstition, that utters constant blasphemy in giving part of creation to others by subtle sophistry, and raising up fictions about beings not in existence by God's creation.

All systems then of superstition are dangerous to mankind, and a mockery to God.

How can we reach the proper decision, than by mind and reason?

Why do we hear any sermons and how do we decide, but by rational mind? All preachers contradict themselves, when they advance other views.

It is not only absurd but dishonest to talk of any other mode of safety or salvation to man.

Most men are mind-vassals to some one individual. Most follow example without analysis, and the balance have some object of ambition in view.

Few are intelligent to separate themselves from the world's deceivers, or as good as intelligent.

Take no individualities and men's traditions before principles, or puritanism before science, to produce any perversion.

Condemned be the mind that perverts truth any way, but especially fundamental truth and principles in science. This all arises from man's peculiar faith, that cannot produce universal approbation.

When the organs of conscientiousness and reason are well balanced, the mind is so constituted that it cannot be satisfied with less than respectable and trustworthy proof.

Such mind does not seek to know whether the position is popular, but right.

What shall we say of any set of men in this age seeking to destroy the majesty of mind?

The progress of mind is in the great power of invention and discovery, that no virtuous honorable man will see trammeled by the imposition of usurpation and monopoly, nor by the ignorance and reckless folly of criminality.

All such light will be exercised through the principles of ratiocination to overcome the prejudices of the times, to reform society into original elements of honesty and truth, to get right from all imposition.

If mind be just to itself, the world will honor it.

The paramount rights of the people are the decrees of nature's God.

"The greatest good to the greatest number," can only be accomplished by the rightful action of cultivated minds of the people who have always had, if they had known, this divine right. The simpler this truth, the more fixed the fact.

It is not that you have talents inferior to the mighty question of religion, your highest duty, but of not doing justice to them, but permitting yourself to be hoodwinked by the priestocracy that have constituted one of the strongest links in absolutism ever since mind was its vassal.

Thus you should never forsake old friends, however humble, if avoidable by your minds.

All rational intellects then, properly imbued, must feel most reverential to Deity, so much so as not to divide his exclusive creatorship, and render his a demi-godship.

Thanks to Deity for the liberty and light of rational mind, as of the means to aid us, that of education, the press, that if untrammeled, will act for general good with the best results.

Mind must claim reason, if it can claim itself.

We go for conservation, not destructiveness.

Man has to work out his own duty by proper respect to his own mind.

There are many harassing scenes in life, many difficulties and trials to meet, and this can only be wisely done by mind liberal and cultivated over all the bigoted notions of the day, so fatal to the welfare of the many. It is an outrage on mind's divine rights, that man should undertake to define the limits and scope of the mind, by the morose, contracted and narrow bigotry of any age, and pass that off for the only true faith, degraded as it may be by superstition and want of reason, guarded in its defects by all the effrontery of sophistry and errors, that have a most perverted influence on mind and its best interests.

Time must and will come, when all this will be swept away before the light of mind and reason.

Mind, when enlisted under the banner of civil and religious liberty, will advance national and individual benefits together.

Then we shall witness the success of useful inventions and discoveries as brilliant, as peaceful revolutions for a world's benefit and reformation, progress and prosperity.

The virtues and sciences mutually aid each other. Organic principles are now advancing in this age of utilitarianism and substantial enjoyment, surpassing that of poetry and speculation.

Take mind from the universe, and the last is a perfect blank.

If mind be not perfectly cultivated, mind is a perversion, and the universe is more or less a blank to it.

Mind, cultivated to its capability, governs the elements of creation, and creates the elements of its own greatness.

Mind's discoveries and inventions of every age, among the most brilliant of which are the press, steam, electricity and true constitutional government, aid in evolving the blessings of civilization, that is advancing with advancing navigation, commerce, manufactures, mining and agriculture.

All the mighty trials and difficulties of life are given to mind as its circumstances to be overcome, whereby the mastery of mind may vindicate itself, and create its own greatness, and decide its own happiness and enjoyment.

Mind must be filled with suitable action to its light and knowledge, to tower over all the world's temptations and corruptions, that ensnare, enslave, and destroy.

Self-examination is necessary to self-preservation.

How can anything but mind realize religion at any time?

Who expects the exercise of idiotic, infantile, maniacal faith?

Why not expect such?

Because there is no soundness of mind for reason to act on.

And who can expect reason of intellect, perverted by blind and implicit faith and reckless infatuation?

Science, philosophy, and truth, are what God deals in, to perfect rational religion.

Mind has already entered into immortal functions, by the exercise of reason, in the analysis of parts of the universe, and in the performance of its duty.

A suitable, well-balanced mind attains the best judgment, that particularly distinguishes great men.

The corruption and cunning of the world are deep and hard to estimate, from the malign influence of feudal vassalage that prevails in society; therefore mind must be fully enlightened, to meet this world-wide question.

It must recognise menials of power, money, fraud, avarice, and ambition, to escape the infatuation.

Who cannot observe the degradation of mind by lust, drunkenness, and all the low characteristics of meanness?

Our age is better when it improves progressively, as with the best light of mind come the best light of knowledge, and best results for universal good of mankind.

All hail, benevolent societies of the world, for universal good. Such can clash with no principles.

Thanks to the lights of an age of progressive civilization of mind, that makes deeds of dark ages felony and piracy.

Who can set limits to his own improvement, if he keep his mind always open to receive truth?

Both for himself and the world should man act, to secure the full blessings of mind.

Mind has gradation in organs, and is proved by gradation of improvement, as talents are proved by actions of those emerging from mental darkness.

But how futile the idea, that if the bibles of tradition were taken out of the world, that minds would have nothing else to rely on. This is the ridiculous, of the mighty sophists.

Where is God Almighty's bible? that of mind?

The first has defective translations, pretended revelations of mysteries, all for the priestocracy to decipher; and not for the people even to read!

Do not all these bibles deceive? All then are defective, weak, impotent, demoralizing, coming from a bigoted clique.

God's is all-sufficient, and calls for mind's best improvement, by science and reason. It is the only one.

We are all assured of the frailties of human nature, therefore we must protect those frailties at the right time, and point, by enlightened parents and wise legislation, and all the only means of rational mind.

Give us wise legislation, arising from the principles of matured mind enlightened, and give all the preachers of peculiar faith, to the greatest number practicable, all their peculiar bibles, and we shall secure an incomparably better world, despite of the preached hell and all its sulphur machinery.

But they preach, "Repent and be baptized."

The last is not essential, while the other is embraced in domestic discipline of morals and religion, all life-time.

Behold what can be done in the goodly land of mind, when missionaries are sent thither to convert the people to peculiar faith dogmas! To change from the practical efficiency of mind, to the nullity of peculiar faith.

The light of the Principal and not of the assistant must enlighten the people; instituting his glorious elements from the very creation.

Let the light of science enlighten the world.

These are necessary and universal truths, that cant or hypocrisy cannot deprive the mind of.

By the influence of perversion, sophistry may deprave, defraud, but the faculty of mind will assert its noble functions for freedom and purity of thought.

Mind, enlightened, must discover that faith without reason is a monster, most tyrannical and hideous.

The old advocates of peculiar faith, as the representatives and authors of Moses' Dispensation and Bible, usurped the province of mind, and the present canters of the day continue it.

The operations of mind insure the discovery of all pertinent to its own faculties, and must not be divested of its own legitimate functions.

The man that does it, is a felon.

The brain is the galvanic battery, and the will is to operate on the brain, that arouses the electricity that sets the nerves to action, and they move the muscles into play.

The organs correspond physiologically, and are modified by temperaments.

All this supports the doctrine of rational religion, that improves on the improvement of mind, and the advancement of science.

How then can bibles of tradition, that come to a dead halt in mind and science, have worthy elements to teach us moral truth; built, as they all necessarily are, on falsehoods?

All are grossly ignorant of natural science.

Either natural science is wrong, or the bibles of tradition.

We must go by exact science, if we go by God's works, to read correctly his book, that is in the universe, which is clearly libeled by the bibles of tradition.

God's works teach that God has all moral and religious attributes, else the universe could not stand.

God created all things, with reason, intelligence, science, philosophy and wisdom.

All wise provisions were elaborated by a perfect, sublime power, at the beginning.

All this is discovered by mind, not in one age, but in many ages of the world, by the progressive improvement in science, that comprehends finally the most practicable to mortals. Hence, it is not fair, wise, nor just, to say that mind did not tell all this at once, seeing that it did not attain the relative advancement.

GENIUS AND DISCOVERY.

He that originated thoughts of brilliant genius, that lifted the veil that concealed the mighty cabinet of God on this earth, has contributed more than all the bible of tradition pretenders.

He that taught the blind to read with their fingers, excelled all messiahs in miracles.

He that taught God's messenger, electricity, to telegraph the world's events to man, created a fund that out-did all mystery-mongers.

The improvements of the moderns have outstripped the prophecies of the ancients, and have subverted their obsolete views.

The inspiration of God is with mind, that respects the mighty science of nature.

The cunning of the ancient priests was not up to God's wisdom, nor the science of the moderns.

What new continent is that, new to all the rest?

It is one that modern genius has disentombed from the bowels of the mighty ocean, and science crowns with triumph.

Whence comes its light, that bursts upon the dazzled view of the Old World?

It is that of liberty, that spreads her refulgent blaze of rational mind, itself irradiated by constitutional principles, that render religious adoration to God.

What would have been the tyranny of the old world, but for the genial influence of the liberty of the new. All this is the inspiration of minds operated on by science, the mighty work of an Almighty.

Let the mind, conscious to itself of rectitude, look at the safe and uniform protection of principles, science and virtue.

Let all proper new lights burst upon the world, by all public instruction.

Science and philosophy can rear their best tributes as life-saving benevolent associations, life boats, mortars to throw rockets with lines attached, from the shore to the wreck, in cases of utter necessity.

Thanks to mind, after God, for the comparative blessings of the world in the comforts of life, as good clothing, nourishing and healthy diet and food, transportation safe, easy and expeditious, by ocean and land, over the world in definite certainty, in most instances of steamers and railroads; means commercial and national, interchange of productions of the world most effectual, preventive of famine; of news, facilities for mind's improvement, excellent government, protection personally and materially, leading to the highest enjoyment and spread of rational religion.

Who can criticise the wise economy of the world, must be able to scan the universe; mortals then have to maintain a wise silence, or the most circumspect reverence to the Creator.

Mind's supposed evils, are in the remedies of mind, by right actions. The province of reason is to investigate the principles of the universe.

Man has nothing else than mind to use to determine in the constant sophistries of the world's pretences, and is perfectly responsible for the right use of it. Then mind is absolutely compelled to abjure all peculiar faiths. Man is an animal in any other position.

Mind enlightened by reason, asserts its empire exempt from all pretences of miracles, to rescue mankind from the clutches of bigots.

Do not disgrace mind by superstition, but as long as peculiar faith continues, so long must prejudice and superstition prevail.

Have no inglorious surrender of mind to any peculiar faith, however popular at Rome or elsewhere.

Act in good faith to mind and society, and you who deplore the errors of fallible faith, should now select, with us, fundamental religion!

Whence arises the flourishing condition of free countries, but the benefit from free mind?

It is a libel, an insult to injury on mind, to say that mind could not originally conceive of the Great First Cause, a school boy's solution. It is one of the ignoble, false pretences of the stupid knavish priestocracy.

Mind by inspiration from God, does good, if mind's works are the result of good faith. But mind's works are the result of faith good or bad, as influenced by irrational or rational education. How faithful then ought rational education to be to the whole world, that is subject to such malign influences.

No creeds of predestination that carried man to the scaffold, could fix rational mind and faith there, because it was unreasonable, unjust, cruel and viciously criminal.

These men of peculiar creed and its faith, were the basest tyrants of mind, enslaving and vitiating mind's best qualities, brutalizing and victimizing it.

They manufacture a hell out of the earth's volcanoes that are its mere safety-valves, earth's cannons.

They degrade fictitious angels from their paltry heaven, and scandalize God's munificence with ignorant ribaldry, to cover up their own hideous deformities.

All exact and proper investigations, will expose them to their deserved contempt of mind.

The mind expels the absurd idea of book mysteries, when man desired to do what was necessary, and therefore must have had a plainer scope for correct action, therefore a mystery mocks mind's sense, God's attributes, and religion's dignity.

Principles are for all time and systems that are right. The originals stand in abeyance to the reflective progressive state of mind, in the advance of reform and revolution.

We need a system for religion that gives no countenance to, but counteracts any of the thousand forms of licentiousness, as mind in this liberal age of reason is still servile and vassal, being spell-bound to the car of sophistry, bigotry and fanatical superstition

At the first dawn of consciousness, mind may not be impressed with principles, but may be in the toils of sectarianism or of designing men, without any system of self-protection, therefore the necessity of rational codes.

The sophistry that we meet with in some form or other every day, and in most parts of the day, is to be counteracted by the richest funds of a sound and healthful mind, that are needed to fulfil mind's duty properly and correctly. Its destiny or better purpose rests then, on the omnipotent principles of causation.

The mind is the mouth-piece of God the Creator, the supreme gift that originates and selects the scriptures, is strictly eclectic, the only avenue for the scriptures of thought, the only link of connection between man and God, evinced in its purest concentration, the conscience.

Messiahship must necessarily displace mind or God, one or both, and is not only useless, but detrimental, an abominable nuisance of priestocracy.

As the picture of the object seen is painted on the retina, the expansion of the optic nerve of the eye in vision, so in mind's eye is the inherent appreciation of God painted by the innate faculty of religion. There is no learning of correct faith but with truth through mind, and the deep-felt conviction rests on the affection, the refined faculties of soul.

The passions avow sympathy that should be rightly directed on a rational basis, else it degenerates into fanaticism.

Physiology rejects any other than these; to her is the proper appeal, as philosophy referring to history of facts. The Creator having endowed mind as the master creation, never can truth say that any written document is supreme over mind, for it is the right and commanding function of mind, to receive or reject all written documents until satisfactorily proved.

Any usurper of mind's rights may pretend that scriptures are above mind, the minor above the major, but that is certainly a false pretence not worthy of mind. The mind is the best treasure of the world. The work of mind is superior to all books of tradition. There must be no forcing tuition prior to seven years, to make any prodigy or genius, over-burdening mind or memory, but let the book be last, the world-school most to insure ripe judgment.

Mind ever gets its innate reaction and reflection, and all the legitimate ideas of God the Creator, by his works.

All should bide their time as the least of evils, and consider mind when cultivated rightly, the means of conquest of all that is worthy of mind's attention. Mind and judgment must meet any crisis.

One of the greatest curses of the world, is by corruption of the mind. It will take a revolution deep and strong, of popular opinion the most enlightened, refined, and civilized, social and religious, before matters essential to the world's happiness are rightly settled.

Whatever custom the parents have transmitted to the children, mind should be consulted as the responsible enlightened free agent, improving in each successive age on fair advantages, ere that custom be valid by right, or enslave by the potency of its tyranny. Parents are bound on the highest obligations, as far as practicable, to render the mind of their children innocent and rational. In this way, mind asserts its noblest principles, and freedom her most high-minded legitimacy, all exploding the worst humbugs.

What mind is there with proper calibre and cultivation, that cannot conquer all practicable difficulties of the world, if that world will be just to itself?

By its best improvements and reforms, the world is regenerated first in the arrest of mankind's oppressions to continents and nations.

The wisest legislation pertains to the right action of enlightened mind, to counteract the bad and perverse actions of stupid and perverted minds.

The only revelation is that by mind enlightened, just and truthful, honest and virtuous in universal principles.

How can we overlook the characteristics of the human races, in their form of phrenological developments?

Can abstract or rational principles affect mind most? Nothing, is principle bereft of rationality, hence, peculiar faith is a nullity. Perversion of mind represents it.

What is mind capable of doing? What is its duty?

All the prizes ever attainable, were mind's inalienably by creation's grace.

God has given mind to fathom and attain all.

When and how? Reason and rational mind declare the constant mode, the only practicable one of truth.

They read the scriptures of an immortal God, undead and undying, written on the universe.

No doctrine contrary to reason, can be the word of God.

Mind requires a full exercise of God's principles, a part of creation with the universal elements, and we shall have all ever exacted by God.

We can have no more by any system, nor any less.

No system but that of rational religion, can give us all.

Mind, not peculiar faith, gives the defences of civil protection.

Where would American freedom have been, but for our civil revolution that is indebted to mind?

Where would have been the revolutionists, but for their admirable constitution, that sound minds elaborated?

Exalted science of mind reflects the most exalted of the world's benefits, an exact justice, in regard to the nature of mind and of the universe.

What have miracles to do with mind, but to prove its reckless ignorance of natural phenomena?

They form no part of mind's existence or blessings, but evidently are its curse.

The moderns are, no doubt, as a mass, better and wiser than their predecessors, and are so not by miracles or prophecies, much less by bible mysteries, but by mind, that entitles all to their full benefit when possible to be realized.

No wonder that the last discoursed so weakly and ignorantly about the heart, instead of the mind thereby superseded by ignorance.

If God governed by miracles the universe, then mind could not be rational: but analysis proves reason and not miracle to be the attribute of mind that rejects faith, if the last reject truth and facts.

Civilized enlightened mind, teaches man all that can be rightly taught on this earth. The Creator has so ordered it. His omnipotence includes mind's potency.

While human reason may commit mistakes that time may rectify, superstitious fanaticism and degraded bigotry commit crime, vices, and high treason, against the whole world. Will its present priestocracy continue all such?

While the faculties and functions of mind bid us hope, when no man is certain by tradition about the realities of another world, as all its assumptions cannot satisfy because there is no title but imposition, no one in his senses can deny to God the creation of the universe, that has its moral and physical preservation so conspicuous in conservative laws, that include all practicable redemption, from which man's libel on mind excludes Deity's rights!

Mind must be ever rightly employed all the time.

The tyranny of man has resulted by perversion of the great principles of mind.

Mind has yielded up its paramount rights, and tyrants have encroached by all the avenues of absolutism, till the unprincipled, degraded, and base intriguer, has but too successfully tyrannized over the world.

It is mind's fault, folly, and crime, not to profit by wisdom, when good and evil are so much in the possession of mind, according to its will and capacity.

Mind has to combat the vagaries of modern socialism and communism, to radicalism, and all the antagonisms of sectarianism, in all its dangers and fanaticism, to all the present advancements, as mormonism.

Mind has ever to be on its guard, or submit to the slavery and vassalage of brutal degradation, that with no principles has no mercy with absolutism.

Perverted learning, that makes mind dishonest or cunning, is to be shunned in all the departments of its theatre.

Benefit and usefulness to mankind are the great objects of patriotic minds, that cannot obey fashion, faith nor custom, independent of truth and religion.

Rational mind that comprehends all, seeks the best security to govern the worst passions.

Its domestic economy includes all that bears on safety.

It has the least trouble to govern domestics, where the reverse gives the worst or severest difficulty.

Under its legitimate influence, children know best how to obey their proper guardians, as taught all such.

Its light and action cause the world to flourish in freedom and riches, with the most satisfactory comparisons in life.

But the inquisitor of peculiar faith has exerted the powers of absolutism, by all the slavery and vassalage of mind, and by all its tortures to the stake and faggot, to stifle this noblest of man's rights.

When printing did not exist, what but a chaos of uncertain tradition prevailed in regard to science, and bibles of tradition? Then they could be mind-factured with all the licentiousness of reckless and bold myths and fable. Then man had power, that excluded the world's rights. Men were burnt at the stake, as Bruno, in 1600, for fair appreciation of science. Peculiar faith is the quintessence of peculiar cruelty and tyranny.

"The heretic had to expiate the crime of open defiance to the dogmas proclaimed by the church."

All indignities were practiced on heretics so called.

What country can flourish by peculiar faith?

Well is it, that mind masters it finally.

At best it is a mere incident, and certainly an impossibility, when peculiar faith of christianity has burnt books and destroyed authors, to arrest science, whose light excludes all such as its and the world's tyrant.

The varied benefits of reform, individual and universal, are needed, and the necessity of society shows mind's immediate responsibility and accountability.

Hence, from the deficiency of mind's action, we must consider its perversion.

Mind requires all to think for themselves, but how few of the world have done it? How many have been victimized for assertion of correct independent thought!

What little stock of reflective or original ideas is there among people, that submit to the wiles of perverted mind, whose embrace is more poisonous than the adder!

The highest power on earth, mind endowed with reason, impeaches this pernicious state of things.

Bigotry and superstition, backed by ambition and self-interest of the priests, have bound the ignorant mind, and debased, perverted, and enslaved it.

Give mind its weight and power in science, to civilize the world, and arrest the fanatic phrenzy, bigotry, and superstition of peculiar faith, while there flourish religious toleration and freedom.

All expedients to direct mind in faith are of absolutism, that seeks to deceive and enslave mind.

These must be counteracted by the mother and father, the rightful guardians; schools, societies, and associations, free and enlightened rational discussions, wise legislation, valuable books and codes.

All books that mislead by errors, are worthless trash.

God extracts good out of much apparent evil, and makes the mind agent for mind and good.

Why so much perversion of mind, but from self-agency of mind?

The analysis of mind must give with the analysis of the universe, the only just appreciation of Deity. His appreciation leads to the depreciation of all messiahships and originators.

By mind's illustrious free institutions the vassalage of most nations is ceasing to exist, as slavery ceases by mind's acknowledgment, when free labor becomes cheapest.

Let mind's whole position be equitably established, and the world will, as it must, become right.

Mind decides against amalgamation as the worst demoralization, and returns to the shores of the once barbarous, but now civilizing Africa, mind of African races ennobled. Mind will comprehend its own problem. The first part of mind is innocence, that requires the greatest cultivation for protection of its innate greatness; but the intermediate presents by ignorance and error, bigotry, and all the evils and dangers of barbarism.

Mind is only to be treated in the legitimate way.

As no country can flourish without adequate improvement on religion, so none, we we will prove, can secure it without mind and civilization, that exalt the world's blessings the more they are advanced.

God endowed man with the noblest gift, mind, and that has to endow itself with the noblest ornament, reason.

How sublime the liberty; how chaste and refined the position. The people of the world do not appreciate their gifts, the very best of which is mind, that they permit their passions to enslave. The greatest slavery is voluntary.

The evils of corrupt education, as piracy, and all evil deeds, are to be corrected and reclaimed from, by reason.

This teaches us that restitution is by acts of mind, and its offerings are wisely to anticipate the penalty of blood, which is peculiar to those affected by sins that produce it.

The loss of blood adds to sin, not detracts from it.

We do not address the idiot, maniac, infant, or savage, to proselyte, because we cannot reach their minds.

Next to these, are the wilfully blind, fanatics, bigots, those prejudiced by self-interest, corrupt and ignorant. They murder the light of mind, and should be deprived of their capacity for evil, as they are not equal to the demands of good.

All cultivated minds must see and acknowledge as honest, that the highest philosophy is the highest religion, that looks into the mightiest realms of the universe, where beams science in every point, the work of an Almighty, perfect in all attributes.

The divinest religious feelings, the most refined and the loftiest, are those ever given to man by mind, that scans by the best light of rational education, the whole theatre of its action.

Mind alone approaches the matter of an exhaustless universe, and reason improves its religion as rational, as God's nature requires.

Mind is placed above the brutes, and has therefore the highest rational duties to perform.

Brutes have innate faculties, whence originate ideas and impulses, for food and drink, and can reason in that circle, and all the available capacities of self-preservation, as habits of range, or course, distance, locality and time; but mind alone recognises religion, that elevates man above all creation.

Mind has nothing to do with any rite or ceremony, baptism, sprinkling or christening. This is all theatrical, in man's customs of peculiar faith. The moral and religious sublime, are from God's own innate gifts, ideas and faculties; no other can put a genuine mark there, as mind is pre-occupied.

All the substitutes for God and religion are counterfeit, that cannot take proper hold, even when the best impressions of God and religion are worn down, and nearly obliterated.

Youth, should improve by the age and light of science, correct their parents' views, not adopt their absurdities, that show the small process of mind, and little or no brains.

It is not that parents know so little, or that children know so much, it is that science speaks, mind learns, God commands and teaches.

So far from sectarians exposing their ignorance and their exploded doctrines, they ought to thank the age for the mighty spirit of light, otherwise the progress of mind will be obstructed by prejudices.

The use of the mind must be exercised on general principles, else the most disastrous effects may ensue.

God has implanted the right faculties, and mind must produce the right action by these faculties on these principles. A perfect God has established the faculties of mind, capable of reaching perfection by a purification incidental, in the progress of its action through the universe.

Sound minds duly cultivated, will pursue principles.

This position establishes the proper appreciation of Deity. If weak minds submit to the perversion of their capacity and rights, if they seek the desert, the ocean or dangers unprepared by safe means, or reckless of food, and are caught in that folly, and suffer from fatal hunger, then God is not responsible for the transgressions of these plain and obvious principles of life.

Trace out the legitimate results that bring famine, disease, and war, and mind must be abundantly responsible.

Mind is the beneficiary from God's benefits, and is its own defaulter in their negative.

Each man is as to the gifts and right cultivation of mind, constituted on physiological and phrenological facts.

Mankind is ever addressed through mind, in seeking its best judgment, or blind submission.

Mind has to look out for the breakers of life, the desert, ocean, famine, and adopt all life's mighty beacons, watch self, and avoid self-treachery.

It becomes the worthy great minds to counteract the arts of superstition; to do that, they must be rightly cultivated universally, to the legitimate demands of mind's-fund of science and philosophy. They must renounce all the pigmy, petty and paltry game of demagogism. This is the very best basis of equality to get rid of vulgar superstition and vassal sectarianism, and insure more universal happiness.

Fortified, as the world will thus be, it is a libel on the wise and good part of it, that they will scoff at the right thing in any respect.

It is said that the world is a humbug, but base and unprincipled minds have made it so, and stupid minds have thus adopted it.

The people are fond of being humbugged, only by perversion of mind, if that were not the case, the most would die out at once.

All such reflects on the state of mind that adopts miracles. The people are deceived by the antagonists of the genuine in all science, government and religion, that yield so much power, as power of all other powers. These are mighty stakes, and are played for by mind, by all the means, that perverted mind adopts in the most important games.

It is gambling on the most extensive scale, and is the most dangerous business. The people should seek to recognise their mental faculties, as the mighty gifts of Deity. Who can claim the title of Divine Right, but the universal people, who have it through mind by the universal title of God himself, author of the universe, recognised always by rational religion?

If minds were capable of peculiar national appropriation, then they might be peculiar people of God, which is disproved by all the facts of history, reason and truth.

Some minds are perfect pirates in society, victimizers of all that is consecrated by mind.

Penalties should be adequate for proper correction and prevention. Is capital punishment demanded?

Mind is organized phrenologically, and one must be different from another, more or less by that organization, consequently all differently organized and constituted, could not have similar crimes, vices, or virtues, but all in the degree modified with its education. In this the world of mind is displayed, the richest magnificence of the organizer, the universe architect.

The aim of rational philosophy, that is religion, is the best effort of mind to obtain all knowledge, as well of God as man, as well of immortal as mortal things, to rely on analogy for the balance.

All things to be acted on must pass the action of mind.

Reason accounts satisfactorily for its own history in the analysis of mind, and rejects all miracles as neither God's nor mind's, but rank impostures.

Honest intellectual truth rejects unqualifiedly all such.

All truths are provcable before rational minds, while the reverse rejects reason, light, and truth.

God gave mind pure and innocent as this earthly theatre can permit, in the morning of its existence, to the guardianship of parents, who, then, must exert the potency of free agency with their children.

They should not pet them one moment and treat them as slaves the next.

Nurses are to be aids, not substitutes; mothers should look to this.

The greatest slavery is the delusion of mind in supposed religion, and in pursuit of evanescent wealth, in all which soul and body are worsted most unprofitably for life, without recompense or satisfaction, in hopeless mental servitude, the butt and scorn of a better appreciation.

Only think of being a vassal to a blasphemer, usurper, and counterfeit, instead of moral truthfulness in adopting the right titles of the only Supreme Sovereign.

In carrying out all the legitimate demands of mind at once, no one, however popular, can be entrusted with power above the laws, or any ways irresponsible to rational views of life.

Mind must take cognizance to put down all tyrants of all superstitions, as a bounden duty to patriotism, and the highest rights of humanity.

As to excluding the rights of mind and reason, it is no wonder when the rights of the Mighty God of the universe, all adorable as he is for attributes, are excluded by the false lights of Messiahs, assumed blasphemously.

We ask for the legitimate position for civilization, to give mind and reason fair play, not a Jesuitical stifling, assuming the darkness of past ages.

There has been no fairer test of either, in regard to the religion that emanates from the loftiest appreciation of Deity.

But attempts have been made to reach the right position as to religion the last century, but all were miserable failures when other means were used than the bibles of tradition.

The tyranny of the despots of Paris last century were for enslavement of their country; they did not care for God or country, or the highest obligations of religion.

Mind is as God created it, on a fit theatre, the present earth. If the earth was no better than it is, mind better than it is would be unsuited in its abiding place, and would be much more dissatisfied. The earth then could be no fit abiding place for superior intelligences.

The mind may be stultified and deluded on all subjects; what but mind can expose the whole?

We ask and commend, require and prescribe an indispensable duty to the whole world to educate mind of all rational beings by faithful parents, guardians, and scholars, in the best of schools, academies, colleges, and universities, above all in the world's school, aided by Lycea, societies, mutual associations, lectures, libraries and the press, only on rational principles; and when mankind travel over the face of the globe, they will find that peculiar faith assumes, in its mighty divisions, to have for itself the orthodox infallible peculiar faith, on which their minds, through reason, have to act, to escape the wiles and defects of corrupt education.

God takes the will for the deed, and will duly estimate sophists who assume philosophy, and hypocrites who make faith worse—enslavers of their country, as Robespierre, Marat, and Danton, who cared neither for God, country, or religion.

It is the deep thraldom of past ages, perpetrated by imperfect and imbecile minds, claiming to be leaders, but false lights, that have produced this almost inextricable vassalage of the present age.

Mind degraded, brutalized, loses almost the very instinct that protects animals. Mind is for true analysis. It is power. How can you use this power rightly without rational education? The spirit of protection to mind is mind competent to analyze, adequate to comprehend, qualified to declare all light and right before all the world.

On account of the imbecility of mind and reason, the safeguards of freedom, arising from the circumstances of the age, blasphemous impostors have been rewarded as those of Christ, Mahomet, Smith.

All peculiar faith must be excluded when we have no vassalage of mind.

When freemen get rid of all the corruptions of past ages, they will universally adopt God's religion of principles, not of mere particulars.

If some differ for a time, they will maintain the essentials of right.

The diversity of the human race, exhibiting the proper elements of mind and its highest obligations, evinces the unlimited powers of the creative faculty, that bible-mongers wish to dwarf to their paltry notion, to falsify nature's laws to uphold their falsehood. We need not refer to history, when mind is at its best illustration. I ask nothing of impracticable testimony in the face of the independent universe-demonstration, that annihilates atheists and all that clan.

Let the majesty of mind of independent people put down all the vassals of social cliques and clans, teach and rebuke them effectually as serfs. O mind, be watchful as well of those who call themselves holy and divine, as the worst of the world. Sacrifice not thy only divine rights, thy independent attributes, to those selfish curses of the world. Respect principles all the time for the conservation.

The ancients knew not the science of mind's rights, or its mighty inherent powers. It is the character of low, petty monopoly and usurpation to decry all the efforts of mind with which they conflict, if its genius-discovery aid the people over their ignoble pretences and vulgar contentions. Mind, enjoy thy rights, thy blessings, not create evils for all mankind, thy universal brotherhood.

The supremacy of rational mind, religion, then order, and law, will follow no names. Let mind settle at once, now and forever, this paramount question of religion. God has settled it.

The Americans, adhering to the quagmire of peculiar faith, have stopped awfully short of the imperative requisitions of mind. All the ancients were the most abominable plagiarists of mind in advancing all the false pretences of oracular faith as supreme, and the Jews affect to have done this peculiarly.

All peculiar faith, as that of the Romans, despoils God's attributes even by language. All the world would be as bad off as the people of China and Russia, Rome and Thibet, with their head autocrats, pontiffs, high priests, if rational mind had allowed it. That is the only supreme providence for all such impostors. Americans ought to be most grateful to their Creator that religion is not in the corrupt keeping of such men, who know nothing of conservative principles, that expose them as degraded impostors, and vindicate the Creator, whom they effectually represent.

Mind then needs the solution of the Great First Cause of the whole creation, and can only best approach it by all the best elements of cultivation.

If any authority declare for capital punishment, of course it is bound by all highest obligations to cause the mind of the world to avoid violation of essential principles.

What is the paramount duty of citizens as parent, wife or husband, child? The first has not only the province of being the author of vital existence, but its guardian, teacher, friend and instructor. All such must respect the highest intellectual, moral and religious principles.

Thus fornication and adultery cannot exist in the code of exact morals. The best instruction is the best self-government of passions.

Parents are responsible for tyranny that may engender the deepest ruin of their offspring, and the deepest injury to society. The exactness of truth must be properly secured, not by forcing lies, but inculcating rational principles. The whipping arguments are silencing means, but may accumulate results much the worst for all parties.

Childhood must be rightly cultivated, never tyrannized over. The virtues resulting from the faculty of mind, are not to be expected by the cogency of force.

Beware, parents, that you do not pervert the minds committed to your charge, as to injure all, deceive all, and destroy all.

If you rear your children rightly they will honor you and their own minds, their soul being in unison with the best sympathies with mankind, but if you do not direct rightly the best energies of their souls in the legitimate channel, you may arouse the worst of dormant faculties among them, as revenge, the most odious, embittering your sympathies with the human race. Above all, beware how you force marriages, as little less than prostitution for money may ever be the curse. Parents should not crush the spirit of their children, nor the government do that for its citizens. Parents must not expect too much of their children to support them unnecessarily, and therefore should act intelligently and with mind in their own independence for life, at the same time helping their children in the real time of need, when they first start out in life, and when it is so difficult to get that first right start. Their offspring should not be pushed upon the world uninstructed in the use and value of money, time, talents, and mind's best functions, as green pigeons, to be plucked by every sharper, gambler, and prostitute, the most dangerous of mankind.

Parents should never deprive their children of the necessaries of life, among them the best mind-fund education, to leave them luxuries that they cannot rightly use. In having mercy on themselves at the right time, they may be spared the sight of much wanton injury to themselves and society through their children. The question of mind is not whether their children are disbelievers in any bible of tradition, but whether they are infidels in the only Supreme Being, who is duly appreciated by the right code of mind.

Reason, then, will exert the most potent influences of all influences in the right employment of that mind; that is the world's best and noblest protector. Let us have no overworked, overtasked or ignorant mind, to make existence a curse instead of a blessing.

It is too late after the deed is done in the whole annals of mind's injuries, after the crush of the feelings has been committed, and the victims of a thousand follies and crimes been made.

How much is due from mind to mind in rational education, that may correct the one predominant idea that may be the master and exclusive passion of all others for the time being, causing suicide, murder, crime, or indiscretion.

None should dictate in this world, as that is tyranny of opinion, but submit to paramount principles of truth and honesty, not as individuals interpret them, but as they interpret themselves.

Who can be the standard while all are amenable to sin, error, ignorance, caprice and perverse will, but the master standard of the universe, its Almighty Creator? Who but absolutists would confine, thwart or defeat genius or principles? Not only appreciate the best gifts of mind, but cultivate them to best advantage of right and wisdom. What but this governs the elephant and cages the lion of the world?

What mind is so doltish, that sees not that the universe revolves in science, and is lighted by philosophy, but the odious reptile, the mere bible bigot?

This work is intended as original as far as practicable. The author is indebted to advance of public sentiment and mind for the balance. The object is to render this a useful code for youth, especially those needing useful advice at first.

In analysis of this paramount subject of religion, we may have been anticipated in some things, but the legitimate may be elicited by most minds.

Freemen, are you actually afraid to read a code styled the Bible of Mind?

What are you afraid of?

That if the bible of tradition be superseded, that we shall have no other! All these were only bibles of mind perverted and debased.

This age enables mind to offer its bible to meet that difficulty, to remove away the rotten building ere the destruction of its inhabitants.

The bible of mind is the only one of God for religion; any other is by man for peculiar faith that is dust indeed.

There can be no one living who believes stronger than the author in the existence of an eternal Great First Cause, and of the absolute necessity of accountability in the deepest reverence to his holy attributes, and respect to his conservative principles; but then he distrusts, impeaches and necessarily discards the bibles of tradition, that were written at a time when neither science, nor mathematics, much less astronomy, were understood; but would not mislead others for his life, nor be misled himself; therefore he asks for all the essential proof of their divine authenticity. An honorable defence, based on the merits of the question, is requested. We advocate the cause of rational and honest minds.

The peculiar faith people ignorantly tell the world to get religion, to do what they know nothing about. All minds, if rational, have religion, and have only to improve it. The people, though, never look into the noblest operations of their own minds, but are misled by vassals as herds, flocks, swarms of insects. There are the fewest original thinkers. Can there be, after due investigation, any doubt in a rational mind of its supremacy in the world's civilization? Historical records and all the lights of mind conclusively decide that position.

When we contemplate the four stages of mind in its progress, every step admonishes most truly of that. What, are not the teachings of savage life in bibles of tradition, oral traditions, &c.?

Formerly, as the author is informed, he states that the Creek Indians burnt their deformed offspring, or infants, as decreed by solemn meetings.

Indians have their superstition, their rain-witches, &c. A statement was made to the author, that not many years past a Choctaw rain-witch, not succeeding to her ambition in procuring rain in a great drought, disclosed to her chiefs and warriors the important item that another rain-witch, living at a distance, had counteracted her efforts to procure rain, and that it was essential that she should be killed forthwith, whereupon these sage savages proceeded to the residence of the rival rain-queen and murdered her accordingly. Mind that is slave to peculiar faith and superstition, is vassal indeed all over the world. One of its horrors is the fear of volcanic punishment from its brimstone and sulphur; to be swallowed up is one of its fears.

Science will disclose its blessings, to relieve the natural elements of a greater disruption, ever present to vulgar ignorance.

Enlightened public opinion will be a mighty engine of mind and of God, in process of time. It will put down despotisms of governments and peculiar faiths, in one breath.

What was it but the exaltation of mind that put down absolutism within the last century, when its brute force and bribery were the means of tyrants, before persuasion?

What but mind, exalted, is to teach America her mighty destiny, the light to all nations, the benefactress to the world? How sounds benefactress of the world, before its conqueress? The one diffuses diamonds, the other sheds blood! What will America be, when her countless resources are developed? But what will be the whole world, impelled by the same universal principles?

Universal legislation, that may be bad in all governments, if not enlightened by wisdom, has to be exempt from all perversions. The vitals of liberty are overwhelmed by perversions of mind. Universal rationalism must correct and rule mind universally.

The antagonisms of universal society, the rich and the poor, can only be obviated on principles.

The day will come when it will have been better for absolutists to have been humble citizens.

A revolution conservative must arise, in the world's society. Families, as nations, should have the tuition of philosophers of science, not the sophists of peculiar faith. Philosophers of science are necessary to better the world, by light of mind.

What others can enlighten the world?

There may be wise and good people among ministers and priests, not from their profession but in despite of it, however incorrect the way they take to prove it. As part of the human race, they should devote the best principles in the right way to secure mind its appropriate blessings.

The process of induction, by thought, is the way mind learns; but that process must be unbiased and uninfluenced.

We have our senses, to teach us by objects, without which, as by protracted solitude in prison, the mind may become demented.

The intentions of the mind present best prayer in actions. Recollect that in all your millions of errors, you must not censure, blame, or libel God once. It is your errors, not God's, you have to correct; turn your mind to the correction, not harrass God, by greater imbecilities.

How then can you address God, but by actions?

The best appreciation of mind proves that it was created for the great purpose of religion, the sublimest subject of the universe. Shall mind be ever deceived, cheated, by false pretences, and bound vassal to the car of peculiar faith, when it can most ably repel the whole attempt, and expose the felony?

The mighty result of rational education, if free, liberal, and right, is to teach mind to think, and be mind.

Mind has its rights, powers and attributes. One of its greatest is knowledge, of which the consummation is religion in its purity. The faculty of mind is to receive ideas through the senses, not by insidious, peculiar teaching, nor brute force. As there can be no innate ideas, mind should be purely handled. No tinkers should botch its ideas.

Men of thought are emphatically men of reason, and would be the world's lights, if not trammeled by peculiar education, the worst vassalage of mind.

Mind, enlightened and pure, can best procure every reasonable blessing, and best shun every supposed evil.

One thing alone, principle, will give mind advantage of the whole world on right basis. Religion binds the mind-universe.

Without principle, the world has the advantage of mind. A better world can be obtained by the world of mind, and that cultivated and elevated by exalted worth. The constant use of mind is the preservation of mankind.

Mind enables us to prove and demand proof of every thing, in religion.

Mind is indebted to mind for science, itself inspiring mind; all inspired from God of Intelligence.

The tribute is due to science of mind.

God presides over our science and mind.

What mighty benefits await the world, through the best lights and freedom of mind.

What cannot the lights of philosophy, in government of man and mind, in agriculture, commerce, navigation, mining, manufactures, the schools of science, effect? The present position of mind is that of a subordinate, that must be self-ennobled to supremacy. The right one should honor itself by rational religion, carried to its highest legitimate practice, and all its societies ever referred to the mighty central standard.

What has mind done for rational religion, that has done for mind everything necessary and expedient?

Mind will be cowed by humbug, and crushed by peculiar faith; though possessed of right and power, yet it is to be silenced before its and the people's pulpit, by the pretences of base assumptions.

Intelligent freemen, do you stand to all this?

The light of mind excludes all ultraism, all extremes, and sectional interpositions, reflecting the noblest deeds and influence of its powers.

It is the full perfection of mind, that gives the full benefits of the social circles.

No system, however glorified by names, can tolerate a crusade against reason and rational mind.

Is it fair, honorable, and just, to exclude the rights of mind, and bind it to exploded, obsolete ideas?

The paramount duty of mind is due to God alone, in the true way that purity of mind can be displayed. The past history of the world proves the errors of mind, in obtaining the best means of happiness. To answer all the cavils of disputants and sophists, will be to countenance the libels of imbecile minds. Time and science will decide, all that may be the balance. Let mind be right, and act uprightly, and there is nothing more to do. Reason is the self-preservation of mind. No man is honest, that discards reason in any department that mind can recognise. Honorable minds should discard such as a nuisance.

There can be nothing inconsistent with the right action of mind, that rejects faith and all its associations, if devoid of truth.

What mind can recognise all this, without reason?

Shall mind ever be in abeyance to the dynasty of peculiar faith? Shall there not be freedom of rational discussion, to investigate satisfactorily for all minds, this most important subject of rational religion?

Can we get the honest people of the world to discuss it, in the right way, not by an ignoble blinking of main and essential truths? Are they not afraid to do it, from the suggestion of pious frauds?

Crush mind, tyrant, ere you deprive it of correct religion, or the proper means to ascertain the correct position.

Mind must not be paralyzed by either sophistry or martial prowess, that usurped the rights of ignorant people. What shall be the arbiter of opinion, that varies so much? Science. Opinions, unless based upon philosophical science, eternally vary.

But how is it that men of science differ so much in opinion? From this very reason, both parties have not been equally enlightened by philosophical science; that, as the vicegerent, or minister of Deity, probes all opinions. That is only freedom of mind, that recognises full improvement of intellect and its legitimate rational principles; for you cannot declare the position of intellect without reason.

When the bibles of tradition were adopted, but the fewest in thousands could read and write.

Now it is a misfortune, if not a disgrace, to be unable to do either. Then others were necessarily proxies; and mind, dependent on circumstances of the age, necessarily became vassal. But her lever of independence, rational education, has been raised, and the cover of imposition, fraud and imbecility, has been lifted; hence, discovery teaches the true state of things. The sooner the world gets out of its antiquated notions, and learns of philosophical science, the better. When mind is rightly improved, it is justly independent. But yet it is not elevated in the best countries, to its noblest degree of refinement.

The power of original thought is too much for the masses, and the fewest are the pioneers by high-mindedness, independence of thought and firmness, that being necessarily of the phalanx of conservative revolution to obsolete notions, are opposed.

There are minds centuries in advance of their age, but they are the objects of envy, and of course obloquy with those behind them adhering to the last, to their base usurpations and monopolies. The pseudo-moralists are alarmed at the state of their bibles of tradition, that must necessarily perish because of their errors and demoralization, without being able to see the imperative need, adequate sufficiency and potency of bibles of rational mind, for purest morals. What influence the statistics of crime, but the deplorable state of mind's ignorance, errors and need of rational cultivation, that all bibles of tradition never can relieve?

How do evils cure themselves, but by the free exercise of mind illuminated? Let all this prevail, and all irrational repudiation, sectional agitation and fanaticism, will die the death of ignoble mortals. Mind that profits by the intelligence of agricultural science, to provide for the world's wants against famine, that dispenses to the world a most benignant commerce, that invokes all the aids of philosophical science to counteract pestilence, and that avows all the principles of universal brotherhood to guard against the evils of war, bids man recur to the true fund of creation.

The mind still needs organization, and all proper protection. Does any know half of the corruption of the world? Let him commence in the right of his own inventions and discovery, and then he will see the dishonor, perfidy and felony of it. Let all be progress possessing a legitimate order, and seeking if not enjoying the government of constitutional law.

Mind is to render the world like a plant bed, a flower garden; beautify, embellish and fertilize it.

Mind is helpless at first, and the beauty is, that it must rise on its own exertions and greatness, and overcome all conquerable difficulties.

Mind is to be prepared for future good.

Vassals of the various professional characters, cause the mind to be like humbugs, most clearly. Mind is to analyze itself, as it may be the dupe of the world. But mind likes humbuggery—unless put right, it may become perverted. Who believes that the world-mind likes humbugs? Its perversions, bad, morbid taste, cause that.

God appoints every mind to address, adore and revere him, as he ought to be. Intellectual existence is a bright dawn of mind. Beware of envy, avarice, inordinate and unprincipled ambition and malice, by which mind is perverted and falls overwhelmed and crushed.

Do not forfeit your rights in mind. How few use the principles of mind, the only sure basis of safety.

In the trackless ocean, what is your only safety? It is in the means of safety, of approved and conservative character. It is in chart and compass; your standards are the universe spheres, by which you correct your reckoning and amend your errors. By rules of exact science, you steer. God is the Creator; whom else can mind have; by whom else can it be sustained? Mind owes nothing to peculiar faith, but has experienced many of its curses. Do you know how to appreciate aught of life's functions, but by mind properly cultivated, in civilization? Suffer a partial loss of one of your senses, as that of hearing, then you may thank your God for his mercies and grace.

Are you going to forfeit your claims to these? Then you do when you permit usurpers to use you as a vassal, and when you pretend to adopt an intercessor, messiah or priestocracy, who have no such functions over mind the beneficiary. It is only over mind the impostor or the dupe.

Do not unite with hypocrites, traitors and unprincipled oppositions. Priestocracy is a rabid tory-pulpit to mind, and a traitor to its rights.

Mind must have all the elements of its greatness, the dignity and freedom, light of intellect, liberality, rationality—truthfulness.

The human mind will become vulgar and low, if not watchful of itself. Analyze your mind, and do not be victimized by ambition, avarice, lust, envy. Keep your mind your diamond, intact from corruption.

Mind has to act compatibly with the circumstances of the universe and God, whether free agency be the question or not. There is no tyranny in this: the evil is in the reverse. The property of mind is the paramount question for mind; it has to look to God for protection, and exert itself as a free agent all lifetime, by universal means.

What is man but as mind makes him? What accompany that mind, but all its elementary endowments that the Creator gave? Hence there is no need of, as there can be no substitute. All such is folly, man's most stupid presumptions. How can mind be substituted? Without mind all your messiahships are nought. With mind they are worse than useless, and of course they are worthless.

Mind that appreciates its own pure analysis, scouts and scorns such miserable nonsense.

The mind is God's lever, and his principles are its fulcra or points of support. Show the superiority of mind over muscle.

No bibles of tradition can furnish correct models for mind, while it is indebted for all its principles to the God of its creation. A great class of the world, it is that of mind that arises on the potency of its own greatness. In the future generations of the world, the last part will be best, by the best polish of the mental diamond. God is in all this.

The inalienable rights of creation entitle every mind to expect an appropriate position of its Creator.

Rational mind is the preacher, reason is the corrector, conscience is the auditor. Do you hesitate one moment at the real benefit of mind in civilization? The steamboat invention has put commerce under obligations, that in turn has caused the world to be inappreciably indebted to mind. We are in the infancy of science. All the operations of the universe refer to mind, else the last had been created in vain, and still more to the immortal soul, the noblest of all.

Who can estimate the mighty potency of mind-fund, that teaches the true taste, that teaches mind; while all should seek to soar above to proper fame, a laudable object, all should seek to avoid mere notoriety.

But how is man a being of free agency? He is created without his own volition, and acts without his own consent. Hardly, as he knows the difference between right and wrong, and is capable of dignifying his own actions.

The history of individuals and nations proves this conclusively. The Creator is bound to adjust matters compatibly with his obligations, but then man has something to do; he has to improve that mind in science, to read the God of nature's works. Under the circumstances of his creation, he is to avail himself of all the lights, all the aids before him to progress in his own best conceived happiness, that he independently sketches out. He has the aid of God's grace, and God estimates the will of the world's mind for the deed; but for that, what would the world be?

Do you know the value of an intelligent, sensitive soul? Do you crush the true spirit of mind, of the world, of worth, of both? The whole crime of deeds is in mind's conviction. Mind of the mass cannot analyze under malign peculiar education, it is minion to others' interests, and antagonistical thereby to mind.

The chances that occur for greatness to be displayed by mind cultivated to its execution, place it as the agent among the greatest deeds of the Creator.

How much of the world is sacrificed to mental imbecility? A free and intellectual press, is mind's lever in the world. The improvement going on in the Sandwich Islands is considered by the advocates of peculiar faith, as due to their missionaries, but it is the merit of mind to which it is indebted.

There can be no standing, invariable pattern for mind, only as the munificence of mind, allows it for mechanical arts by the best cultivation of legitimate taste. The world, as the universe, comes under principles, immutable laws. The mind is the only effectual means of elevation in life. Do not neglect its mighty and sovereign functions, its noblest rights. Mind now makes government lighter, revolutionizing it from despotisms. What was the state when the Hebrews were subject to priestocracies?

It is difficult to tell how far vassalage of mind extends. It produces the worst defects and disruptions of society. Be not surprised at vassal mind, that is like a whipt spaniel; it stoops after being crushed by perversions.

Mind is made straw, overrun, yet mind recovers from the peculiar faith contentions that blast it most deeply.

Which is best off as to peculiar faith, the heathen and the savages, all that have their superstition, or the most refined of those assuming to be civilized? The refinements of mind make the difference, and secure all rights. Mind must not be trammeled by any of the obligations of life's courtesies, as hospitality, nor by anything less than absolute rights. Modesty is becoming, and rational custom is obligatory for reserved rights. Let mind produce a generous and exalted rivalry of nations; all on the most liberal competition. Commerce is for the world's benefit, and furnishes competition and improvement, a noble position. What was mind for but to expand on such brilliant means?

Brain, or material organism alone, does not constitute mind without the soul or supreme element,—the functionary mind does not recognise animal, but soul-materialism. Industry and surety of living means to maintain existence, begin now to characterize mind of the present age; one of mind's triumphs.

Man in the world must be treated as a being of mind, not of mere muscle; not brutalized, but exalted here on this earth. What bespeaks mind's dignity and freedom more than the votes of the people? That liberty of the people carried out, presents a brilliant solution of freedom.

How many neglect their health, body, mind, their souls. To neglect the mind is to neglect the soul. To soil the mind is to soil the soul. What vassalage of mind is in the world, in villages and circles, in cities that analyzed, present villages. Vassalage of mind is the abuse on conservative unity. The best settlement of world-agitation questions is by the cultivated honest intellect.

Mind is created as God created it, as we find by rational experience and science, placed under the circumstances of creation, with free agency, to work out perfection, undergoing appropriate purification.

If mind was perfect on this sphere of action, we should be doubtful of its perfect bliss. Its sphere is that of preparation, not of consummation of felicity. All systems, even of monotheism, are amenable to the proper decisions of rational mind, that has to look to it, a perfect standard, as religion of principles.

You advance a peculiar system of some peculiar bible of some peculiar nation, claiming to have a peculiar God, all which pretend to denounce the balance of the world with eternal damnation if it do not believe! We claim the protection of a free agent, as American, before we can believe. We must be assured by proof conclusive that all is right, to proceed with a clear and satisfied mind, and eyes open. Mind is essentially important, there is more in man than land, world, or mere universe. The mind is in trust, and to be improved, for time and eternity. It is not excellent, then bad; that is absurd. The bible writers were actually ignorant of the analysis of mind. In writing this work we draw on the great treasury of mind—the store-house of rational mind. It might as well be said that the human body was to be destitute of clothing, as that the mind was not to complete its own improvement by the unchangeable laws that rule nature. What a dangerous state of things would rule the world if mind did not now preponderate. Look at the despotism of peculiar faith, that would lay this world in ruins if not governed by the ruling forces of mind. Look at the Mormons, driven from

State to State, expelled by force of arms. What if they had numerical force connected with their peculiar social position? Would not the world soon learn by the motion and power of that force? Peculiar faith rests not on truth, but on numbers and sophistry. Where would be the Christian if the Mormon had his millions to back him? None such rest on principles, all must be propagated by fraud. This is now the time of rational, not vassal mind.

Preconceived notions injure the world when they do not accord with principles. It is only rational to suppose that mind is created as God created it, rather than it was good, and that it fell because of God's rival, the devil. In the first is proveable to a demonstration that the devil is not the successful rival of the Creator of the universe, and that, of course, he never caused the fall of mind. The party who conceived of the devil had not the capacity of complex ideas, as the free agency of mind destroys all devils.

It is the imperious duty of all minds to investigate all important science before the world, and above all, the great enigma that they have made of mind.

What is public opinion but mind set in thought progressive; a tyrant in its ignorance, but a blessing in its wisdom and rationality? Do not overtask the mind by the monstrosities of its perversions. Mind must be modest in declaring, as it is slow in progress. Much experience is necessary to verify facts. Investigate nature, not adopt the errors of preconceived opinions, no matter when, how and where recorded, whether in the so called bibles or otherwise. The only proper record is in the universe. Who will act traitor, vassal to mind? How much treachery is there to mind, to arrest all justice of light to mind!

The mind is originator of legitimate motion and power, if mental derangement, that also refers to physical, moral and religious derangement, is not insidiously introduced.

Congratulate yourselves that this is an age of mind's presidency, and its progressive lights.

Mind has to rescue mind out of its state of ignorance.

There is no messiah known beside that can act if honesty be consulted. The Creator Almighty is the head of mind, to be enlightened in physics, morals, and religion. Let mind obtain a mind-fund or capital, then it evolves the whole cabinet of its own treasure. Away with the villifiers, libelers of mind and God.

Mind is beautifully adapted to the progress of God's light, revealed in endless and exhaustless succession, that otherwise would require an endless succession of inspiration.

None but mind can fulfil it for the time, and the whole.

See, now, how deficient always has been every attempt otherwise; eminently proving man's incapacity, but God's perfection. Mind gets truth by successive inspirations of genius and mind, whereas the old messiahships become obsolete in the light of science, and state false pretences. Any other revelations are so extraordinary that it is not safe to mind and truth to rely on any assertion short of extraordinary proof.

The only evidence of divine inspiration is mind's appreciation of God's works by science, and by its own progress in excellency of civilization. The potency of mind is constantly progressing, with each end the means, the last irradiating the preceding, and enlarging the circumference, enriched at an exhaustless mine.

Electricity, that was one of the gods of ignorance, becomes obedient to the action of philosophy, and subject to the laws and wisdom of science.

Mind, rightly cultivated and directed, permits no hopes of any to be taken away, but gives the benefits of a right investigation. Mind ought not to omit any of the legitimate demands of civilization or religionization.

What does it remain to this age, that humbugs are actually necessary to be used by mind for faith?

Would you not prefer the pure deductions of mind to the false bible that gives poison to, along with its other matter? The mind of civilization rejects the bibles of tradition of dark ages; and all are dark with superstition.

The reason of civilization can be satisfied with what is rationally satisfactory. Mind has a birth-right claim on Deity, provided its merits are adequate for safety. The sophisticated, morbid state of feeling and of mind is miserable. Only see the effects of Moses' legends about witches and ghosts; such false impressions, made by peculiar education, are hardly ever eradicated properly. Well, whence did they emanate but from the source of superstition. That same fund for a world's morals, the bible, gives it its worst funds of superstition. We should speak all the time of conservation of mind, not of heart. As to public opinion, we want none short of a comprehensive and philosophical view, as less than that is what is made of bibles of tradition, as the witch murders were those of public opinion, founded on the false position of such bibles.

It is mind for ever that gets out of the difficulty, by free and rational discussion. Do always what is right, practice all the virtues that enlightened mind approves and requires. Let the people know what is right. Let all principles govern the fallacy of bigotry and sophistry. Lay a right foundation. The mind should have something good to do. Mind is for science, science for morals, and morals for religion, which cannot be for less than the soul's immortality and happiness. Mind must regard all social improvements, as those of public virtue and independence. The blessed virtue of patriotism, calls for all the legitimate demands on the world, whilst religion invokes those for eternity and the universe. We recognise improvement by the advance of mind in everything, but old obsolete bigotry and its explositions.

The great obligations of society include mind all the time. But for the light and inspiration of mind, where now would be the law for witches, the priestocracy, and all such? Mind must become wiser and better every moment, or not exist finally in the result of eternity, that commands the conservation of principles.

Justice and virtue require the advocacy of high-mindedness. As the treasures of the earth are developed by mind, so are mind's richest purest treasures to be developed.

Mind is the true and only inspiration through science and truth, which is inspiration. As mind will believe the errors of a false education, the truths of rational education must predominate. The only proper dispensation effected in bibles, is the covenant of mind, and that did not require the false pretences of any priestocracy.

If these ancient and modern blunderers, stumblers on plain even ground, had appreciated a complex idea, they would not have involved themselves in these absurdities. In improving mind, we lay proper foundations for all other improvements, as in country, race, law, all things expedient, and learn to appreciate with just knowledge, the utter worthlessness of kings, and the reckless pretences of bibles of peculiar faith.

Mind is conservative in the world's imbecility.

What is the fatalism of Mohammed, when compared with the free agency of mind, that monotheism inculcates? What is any peculiar faith before the omnipotent free agency of mind? What, at once, may we say, is error, compared with truth? It takes mind cultivated to its supremacy of rationality, to decide rational questions.

Mind is the mighty lever to remove popular ignorance.

How much injury of the world springs from the sheerest ignorance? The mind, next to God, shapes the policy of the world, that should be based universally in principles, to meet vital difficulties, and secure its general prosperity and happiness.

What are all local superiorities and peculiar notions without the mind of science? Stay not back the value of potent mind, by any stay-laws of exploded bibles of tradition, the veriest trash, not fit to cover the shelf of an honest-minded conscience. Many men assume to know much more than cultivated mind recognises: mind must counteract their false opinions. Act only when ready by mind, and be very prompt to be right.

All the actions of the world are based on mind, that is ever addressed. Hail, rational messenger of truth.

Mind cannot define all facts, but it has improved progressively in its ideas of God, as science advances; hence, its rational religion has improved, and must become perfect.

Mind must seek correction of many terms obsolete, from the ignorant idea that introduced them.

The mind when disciplined and practiced, responds to the pure demands of civilization. At the stern with principles, it steers through the rocks and breakers of life.

The power of mind is to move the whole world masses, for mind's protection, not oppression.

For what object is religion, but to make mind act to the highest intrinsic capacity and calibre; no system hitherto has done that, for all declared have traduced and degraded it. The character of mind is to sustain its good faith to the world without any oath.

Perverted minds seek to make an apology of their sins, by a non-entity, the devil. Why continue the exploded humbug for the world's strife? Is not robbery of God's attributes enough, much less the episode of such fictions?

Mind should become the constitutional government of the world. Shall the agitators of the world disturb it, by the inculcation of such flagrant evil as its usurpation? The true analysis of mind is, what is needed for the world? The brain must not be excited too much by paltry faith; it must be balanced by right and faithful education. Never let your God-gifted mind be polluted by superstition and bigotry, the advocates of which have traduced, lowered and belittled it, and have made it dependent on the veriest trash on earth.

But mind establishes the world's great constitutional rights, that world-intelligence that is spreading over all.

Had they previously prevailed in centuries past, there had been much less of the world's bitter wrongs that have convulsed it. Rational education must guard against the fanaticism of the human mind.

Beware of the slavery of mind. When we speak of the difficulties of the ancients, we speak of the difficulties of mind unenlightened and uncultivated, whether pagan or christian. Without mind the world is blank, with it cultivated, it is all that God ever intended.

We abjure paganisms, all bibles of tradition, all that is in antagonism to rational mind, all that can be claimed of the false positions of Robespierre and all his confederates, all that is not mind rational.

Be tender with the human mind, as it may be crushed.

If the world's history was exactly written by the spirit of truth, mind as rational as it should be, how different would much of it appear! Mind cannot ever be too modestly and rationally cultivated, or aim too high, when by peculiar education it may fall too low.

The greatest creation God ever gave is mind, that over-ruleth all peculiar faith, that is necessarily false; and yet there are no miracles, as they exist only in the ignorance of mind. If there could be miracles, they would be what the works of the universe are. As to individual perverse mind, where is the mass of the world-mind? It is progressing better and better. Who but God elaborated mind? The vassalage of mind prevents conservative revolutions. Next to God of mind, is mind itself. This world is indebted to its beauties and wisdom.

It was mind that took Columbus across the ocean to this new continent, compared to ancient civilization; and that caused the Americans to rise from the oppression of tyranny to liberty.

By the improvidence of mind may come all its bankruptcy, as of property, character, &c. The peculiar heaven and earth have been moved to christianize the world, and convert it to its peculiar faith; but all will not do; they cannot usurp the functions of mind, that in its excellency of civilization will vindicate itself and God its author.

Call the world from its lowest degradations by science of mind. The most that can be accorded to all sects is, that they helped to aid by general mind, when not perverted, but then how could that be?

The functions of mind or sectarianism are two different things. What ruins nations and individuals? Want of cultivated intellect, mind, and the right use of it.

All minds should be taken out of the current of peculiar education, as antagonistic to their best interests when founded on principles, or what is the same thing, of all the errors the correction of which ought to be sought. People of mind must regard it the means to rebuke the world's iniquities, through God's principles. Is life to be a vulgar existence, in abeyance to all the vulgar impostors, charlatans of mind? What less than mind can recall vassal cattle? What less than talents can make this world the proper embellishment designed by God?

And what is it that precludes us from seeing and realizing the hidden treasures of the universe, that would give greater perfection to mind's knowledge and wisdom? It is the want of science and mind.

We have to resort to mind to make exceptions in the bible, and it is best for mind that is invoked to rule in its own right. We must go for the freedom, as purity of mind.

Mind has been betrayed, humbugged; the worst is self-delusion. The prince of characters is he who rules circumstances on principles, without being governed by those without them. The great principle of mind's right cultivation gives the right principles of logic, proper sense, and rational science, with honest intentions, not obtained by mere church membership. The mind under peculiar faith, is at enmity with God, unless regenerated by rational religion. The history of the world, and all science, eminently proves, and that most conclusively, that mind is the agent through the grace and spirit of God. Mind is at antagonism, but science of mind teaches the error. What was it that elicited our noble constitutional government?

Was it christianity? She who had been, and is now, prostituted to the union of church and state, from the days of Constantine, the emperor? When she, as all sacerdotal despotism, has been allied to all absolutism of church and state, bigots must see and acknowledge at once, that it was mind. But churchmen of America, aided in that revolution. Not as churchmen, but as lights of mind, and this can be affirmed of all their noble deeds throughout the world.

We wish only to be right, not in error against an iota of errorists. The mind that seeks the conservative revolution of the world, has much of its unprincipled baseness to contend with. Mind elevates man's situation in civilization, puts down affected masters, and rouses up the crushed feelings of the peon, and bids him be a man. Only mind cultivated, unravels the mighty convolutions of its own life problem, and gives them their purest solutions to bless existence temporal and eternal. The ancient mind, as even that of the Jews, knew not God. They had not gone far enough; had not science enough. The most comprehensive revelation of God, is to mind, by his creation. Cultivated mind could not have discovered the bible of tradition, for it is clearly the peculiar work of the priestocracy, who have pretended to many assumptions inadmissible on earth. Mind is to elaborate its own good, that is the difference with the old regime. It is clear, that it has none perfected at first.

It perfects it through life, as far as mind can.

It relies on God, who made and endowed mind, what it is. All the object of instruction and culture, is to teach mind to think rightly, to fill its blanks and complete its mission.

Do all things right by mind, that is to do all things right by reason and religion. Do not complain or murmur about God, much less libel him, and if things be not right blame your own agency, and redress through mind.

What causes the elevation of civilization; what makes the world flourish? The right direction of mind.

To overcome the various difficult antagonisms of obsolete opinions and vain customs, effete notions and idle pretences of faith, a conservative revolution must be accomplished. A moral revolution deferred must necessarily produce a physical one surely, or the reverse, both or worse. Do not let your mind run into sophisms, that have produced the sacrifice of human victims. What is the slaveocracy of mind? The mass is slave to demagogues, that flourish in every age on the ignorance, the servility of the people, who decide matters still by custom and usage, not by mind and exact justice to original thought. We are all identified to mind in all the departments of life, action by mind, pleasure or pain, hope and joy, all through mind. Mind that is brutalized, degrades itself below animals. Mind has to act for the world; the ancients had mind, but they were behind in science. The moderns who adopt peculiar faith, make that take precedence of science in the full legitimate comprehension. Our governmental institutions have decided much, that mind must take precedence of peculiar faith. The faculties of the mind are perverted by peculiar education, that disturbs the just relation of society and deprives the world of its best rights. Yet what are we not to think of mind, when it fixes a telegraph, whose electricity, as the emanation of Deity, out-travels time as measuring the earth's motions? But alas, there are two conditions and classes of minds, the one exalted, advancing; the other perverted, retrograding, going down to the sinks of misery. While its electric telegraph advances before time the earth's motion, and the time may be when it will be diffused as means of intelligence over the civilized world, and hold all intelligence in close and rapid union, aiding all rational means to promote one universal brotherhood, that mind must be rational to tower over, and command itself. What an achievement mind-culture bestows, when self-control is attainable. A mind well matured by culture, bestows the only practicable equilibrium. Mind is for universal purposes. Let man pay due respect to his own mind. The moral and religious, as intellectual world will get right, if there be no counterbalancing perturbations. We have too little of mind's protection, in all the operations of life. Mind has to exert itself. Mind must seek the best thought and ingenuity with wisdom, but candor and firmness to avowal. How does man rise superior to animals? By mind that decides his superiority, and still more does it decide for him among races, endowing with power and potency. Mind alone will reduce unprincipled ambition, that is not satisfied with the whole world, to its proper legitimate position of noble daring.

It is difficult to appreciate the value of enlightened mind. Mind is to enable man to secure the safest position in life, in all its legitimate matters; among them is religion. Mind has to trade on the capital of the world, and rescue the world from all difficulties, and avail itself of all practical advantages that are legitimate. We must not permit ourselves to be cheated out of our rights, therefore we must presume on nothing, or take nothing for granted, in any of man's mind's professions. The more you rationally cultivate mind, the more it goes against mean influences, ghosts and witches, dreams and visions, moonshine bibles. So far from waiting on the moon and such stuff, agriculturalists will act when ready; mind that is rational will act when right.

Mind-culture teaches to best regulate ambition on any excess of passion, as any violation of the laws of nature will bring signal penalty. What detraction can be greater than want of merit? The appropriate conversation is one of the great funds for mind's improvement on rational discussion.

There are many mind's so constituted, that they have to plumb the track of leaders. Mind must so regulate the world, that it may cause it to rejoice in its own general prosperity. Mind must be able to scan the malign advice of persons, meanly advising far-sighted but selfish measures, to benefit themselves but not the undertakers. The world's history presents this! Mind gives us the luxury of thinking, and genius avoids the trammels of the schools and bibles of tradition, that belittle and degrade Deity—libel him.

The social parties of mind cannot be those of peculiar faith. Mind has to relieve the world's necessities, counteract its oppression, prevent its baseness. We must watch all the time the functions of mind and time. Mind must overcome the malign influence of passions. Command your own resources; your own, if a right way, through the excellence of mind. Without the best use of mind, the world may use you up.

Break all the fetters and bonds of mind that is vassal. Independence alone brings nations and individuals to their senses, for the triumph of mind, whose rights must not be usurped, whose duty must not be violated. The proper use of mind under favorable circumstances, ought to render most possessors rich enough, if they live long enough, at least independent.

The great error of mankind, is in not using mind to the requisite degree of analysis, not looking deep enough into matters. Mind is the master of all the social and religious relations, under paramount principles. Command circumstances by mind, as far as practicable, otherwise you are their slave.

Indulge not in luxury and effeminate ease, if you seek to hold intellectual vigor. Mind must counteract the intrigues of life. The little brief authority is always rising up, in every little circle, even of republicans. Selfish ambition too often takes precedence of principle.

It is time that mind be freed from its trammels and proscriptions. People have now learned to think for themselves; they cannot be humbugged much longer. All tuition is for mind's reflection and benefit; any proposition to the mind, the more serious the more it involves reason and the reasoning powers, of course; above all is that of religion. This, of course, includes good faith, as this is belief in proper testimony, and nothing less. The rational religion of mind, having enlightened conscience, is the only thing to abolish sectarianism—a blot on the human mind, martyrizing public opinion, and botching up mind. Mind must be a conservative revolutionist. We must arouse the independent, self-relying mind. Why is mind alone, not self and free agent? How long shall the world be in abeyance to her charlatans and botchers of mind? The world is to be made a garden, to be embellished with roses, instead of mere thorns and thistles; to supersede the slavish passions of ambition, avarice, lust, and intemperance, by virtues; war, by peace; ignorance, by philosophical science; superstition, by rational religion. Under fraud, mind loses its self-respect. The world is only to be known and acted on, through mind that is its own agent.

Mind is to give us independence, genius, to tower over, not be curbed by, ignoble brutes. Nothing is valuable, if mind, forethought, and forecast do not preside.

Mind, inspired with truth and reason, vindicates God. Then rational education will instil all, that can enable it to do it satisfactorily. The vassal mind can be made to do anything. Mind, when serious, cool, and calculating, will do justice to itself, and can well be mixed with mind ardent, impulsive, and candid. We go for the immense moral power of intellectual greatness. We must go for a strict adherence to the constitution of mind: the bible of tradition presents no such thing. Why do people govern themselves even, without forms of government? Because the good of society absolutely required this, as necessary to be done.

What can be worse than the tyranny of public opinion, oppressive to free and enlightened inquiry?

The bible of mind is intended for the bible of truth, reason, and rightful action. To remove most of the supposed evils of the world by progress of light, and effect of the mighty cause, we must have the religious crisis, that of mind. Remove the ignis fatuus of bibles of tradition, then mind can hew out, by inherent genius, its mighty resolves. But for mind, peculiar faith would have ruined the world long ago. It has perverted it for thousands of years. Once upon a time, martial prowess and all its adjuvants, necromancy, divination, prevailed; but now rational mind, the oracle of God, inspired by true philosophical science, speaks out truly. The billions rush to hear, to read, to heed, at the fountains of instruction; the world becomes wiser and more virtuous. For what, as responsible moral agents, are we indebted, but to mind, that has to operate on principles? Why preach at all, if mind be not addressed?

The resources of the mind are to be elicited by mind; that must be sustained on the functions of its means. Do rightly, consult mind, act intellectually, not be crushed to suicide, when principles will render all remedial and triumphant. Giant minds now mould and direct public sentiment, on liberal and enlightened principles. The difference of races shows the value of mind. Why do nations perish, if not from want of energy, provision, and forecast of mind? We can only approach the holy of God through mind, not the priestocracy, who cannot analyze the distinction. The mind ought to be prepared now, by right culture.

Myriads ignobly conceal their right opinions. Mind must seek the triumph of mind, in all things. We should never neglect the blazing and brilliant light, in diamond mind, that has been desecrated for thousands of years to the most unhallowed purposes. To become the gentleman, the civilized man, all are interested in best restrictions, to govern his own wayward nature best. Mind can only begin the elements of its knowledge, and its existence. Mind is now indebted to mind. Let the plain proposition be stated of all things, submitted to mind, to investigate untrammeled for itself. The pure and sacred holy functions of mind have been invaded and usurped, blasphemously so. Let mind always decide, right and honestly.

When we analyze the human mind, what an amount of influences, actions, impulses, and interests, the position in society brings! The more peculiar, the more difficult for its rights to be maintained. Mind must expect one conservative revolution after another, as a necessary consequence of existence, till the mighty problem of life is solved. The mass of the people is very curious when it mistakes doctrines for principles. When one bolts, most bolt.

The wide world is made of sectional parties, that are deeply engaged in crushing the rights of the others, not in maintaining the justice of their own, the whole.

The right universal position of mind is to receive, at all times, right impressions, but repel all false pretences, rites, ceremonies, fasts, or feasts.

Mind, not messiahs, had the mission, whereby universal justice and action are done. Our minds are created as they are, to improve on the elements of right impressions already there, proportionately, as rationality is developed. Mind is not equal to its capacity, from peculiar education, as the sophists have taken possession of the world to a great extent. Justice must take possession of them.

The greatest power of mind is the true inspiration of genius, that cannot be too highly cultivated in all the primary blessings of rational education.

What is man but for his mind, rationally cultivated? What is mind but for the soul? What is that but for immortality; and what are all but for God the Creator?

A satisfied state of mind is essential to happiness; therefore, one should make up his or her mind to be practically satisfied with the world. The religious contributions of society establish that position.

Mind proves rational religion—no other can be proved. Mind, and that cultivated to its proper elevation, is the only protection to man. It is his holy guardian in religion. It was by mind usurped, that all the councils of the priestocracy voted in their bibles, having first thereby manufactured them. Now it must be by mind, that rational education of the world must correct all that. The present bigoted sociality changes and deranges the mind's noblest sociality. The present is venial, and derogatory to mind's noblest position of independence.

We must not forget what belongs to race, as gift of organization, and the endowments of science, that aid in concurrent reformation.

The mass of the people, if senseless, must be without principles, and therefore dangerous.

The world has grown older and better, as mind is cultivated which civilizes the world. All the means of mind-instruction is essential to this result; consequently, the fourth or last age has just been commenced to this elaboration.

The enlightened mind is clearest of idolatry.

Look at the physical, moral, and religious condition of the world. Mind has to operate on it for future good; hence, its liberal, moral, and intellectual agency is requisite and undeniable. As free agent, the mind was not enlightened by science at first.

When a man leaves the sublimity of mind's innocence, he has the degradation of brutes, and may be assimilated to their general natures, more or less combined. Mind must recognise the merits of all cases, as well of religion as of science.

When mind commences, it is to receive impressions, of course of the right kind. The object of all rational education is to procure the highest balance of mind. How ignominiously have mind's rights, qualities, and powers, been overlooked and crushed! How was Europe recovered from the degradation of the dark ages, but by mind? What has put America before the whole world, in the true principles of government, but mind?

What can we think of those bigots who have not the materials or elements of friendship, and will sacrifice to the false views of society at the anxious bidding of popularity, all that is dear and sacred to mind? The facilities of postage will enable the transmission of much improvable means by mail, to reach the universal wants of mind. We have gained much knowledge considering the difficulties of perverted mind; how much more would it not be, if all superstitious faith was laid aside, and the mind left free to act rationally? The mind is not left free, and never will be, till rational education liberates it. Mind has disregarded religious science taught by God's works and word, as in his edition, not man's, and must rely on rational education. The supremacy of mind comes into play everywhere, for the best good of the world. Let this be menaced with many potent elements of trouble, yet let the gifted sons of earth arise superior to all. What is it that mind must not take hold of in this world? All that genius can invent, mind has to do. Her very inventions and discoveries excite still new theatres. The mighty inventions pertinent to navigation, to steam, all demand further protection of mind. The fatal collision of ships and steamers at sea, in night fogs, are among the first.

Mind should ever make triumph out of supposed defeats. All proper relative allowances must be made for mind, under all its circumstances. Should a steamer have appeared to the ignorant ancients without any intimation, it is likely that they would have worshipped it for a god; yet the ancients made some great discoveries.

PHRENOLOGY ACCORDING TO PHYSIOLOGY.

But what is mind? It is not the mere functional action of the brain—the mental organ as known to mind somewhat analogous to the appreciation of Deity's attributes through the universe, but it is some element with functional attributes. The mind analyst, then, can read somewhat of mind's characteristics through the phenomena. It may perceive the individual calibre, and some of its qualities.

One of the best results is the appropriate cultivation of the various organs to benefit individually, socially and universally. Beware of mind's abuse. No overworked mind should destroy the brain, by severe intense action thereon.

The overworked mind, of authors especially, breaks down. Southey, Scott and others prove this most sadly. When mankind resort to stimulus, as opium, they may become its slaves, to the ruin of health, principles and character.

Night watching and study may be deeply injurious. The best position in life is to have a well balanced mind properly directed in well balanced physical and mental labor, to secure the best safety for mind and body, to counteract the various passions and emotions, as grief and fear, that affect the nervous system.

Fortunately, a necessary abstraction of mind by natural causes prevents much injury that the possessors are not aware of.

Before genius lays aside her wand, let her inquire if the felon monopolists of the world are still holding the people's mind's-rights in abeyance, and let her properly direct the best organs to counteract them.

The organ of conscientiousness is one of the noblest in the whole. That of firmness is next to that of conscientiousness; cultivate both organs, as well as the intellectual, with the intensest care, as the best conservatives of mind's purity, innocence, greatness and magnanimity. These important organs have a protective influence over man's noblest character, and promote the ultimate designs of Deity; but what organ of the mind can be legitimately neglected?

The world must be put on the basis of conservative revolution by mind, as it needs a high-minded independence to make the purse-proud and money-power loving and usurping know their places. The world needs to be satisfied in mind, and should be. Respect what cultivated mind enjoins, not to stifle its rights, but let it possess the benefit of rational education.

The most extraordinary thing in the world is, that the world should prostrate itself for the benefit of cliques and despotisms; but it is even so. Where is rational mind? Will it never learn, and assert its rights? Mind should not remain imbecile and helpless, but must rise on its own exertions. All matters in the world have direct reference by the wisest design to the whole world, which mind masters. Mind cheats itself worse than the world cheats it. Some minds, no matter the calibre, without education, rational of course, cannot reach their elevation. With peculiar education the best minds are warped like crooked guns; no matter the calibre, they dare not shoot straight, cannot get over the defects of sophistry. With rational education, all rational minds can trade properly on the world's rational capital. Now all peculiar faiths trade on the capital of rational religion, and most ungratefully deny it. They act by aid of mind, and corrupt it. The legitimate, pure, chaste taste of refined mind begets rational religion, and nothing else. If God never created evil, as he did not, what then must be mind's perversions. Mind must look rightly at the great world-capital. The only aristocracy is that of mind, embellished in its noblest intrinsic virtues and magnanimity. The wisest actions of cultivated and refined mind are needed to meet the mighty fluctuations of contingences in the world. Who can come up to the noble requisitions of mind?

Mind is the holy conservation of the Creator; therefore let not the priestocracy profane, pollute or corrupt it.

A proper cultivation of mind will decide nothing in favor of pride, but all for high-mindedness. The world should beware of vulgar extravagance, enervating luxury, and the foibles of pride and vanity to keep up appearances, that may keep out independence. To appear gorgeous, one may make himself miserable. The only real aristocracy of the world is that of mind, and itself measured by the world-benefit and patriotism it produces.

The real sovereignty of mind bespeaks the noblest intellectuality. In regard to the rejection of all untruths, the bible among them, a plain honest duty is before the world-mind. The rational world-fund is for talents, genius, mind successfully employed.

But mind alone will not do, when we come to consider the real intention. Rational mind is the very thing, having the soul and emotions.

They who seek to bind mind to the bible of tradition, do the rankest injustice to the mind of mankind. The motto, never give up any thing rational, will bring the world to its sublime rationality. What is not rational on earth to mind is to be avoided. Peculiar faith is not rational.

The world will necessarily bow to the majesty of intellect, the aristocracy of mind, that must rule out all the vassal impositions. The debt of parentage and country is to promote the noblest good to the greatest number by rational education. When this is done to the world, religion, that is put far behind the progress of constitutional government, even in America, that now ought to be its equal and certainly must precede, is made to be in abeyance to the odious political capital of peculiar faith. Patriots and statesmen, sages and philosophers, do not permit it any longer. Even God does not make mind vassal, when he nobly endowed it with moral, intellectual free-agency, under the wise limits of creation; how then can even an autocrat do it?

THE MIND OF INFANTS.

Children have the most pure and unadulterated minds, the reflection of Deity, and ask for the duty and purity of mind's action and right education.

The best impression of mind is already there in the purity and innocence of its capacity, identified with their creation and birth-right for the wisest and best purposes.

The world is fully interested in its preservation, and must exert all to spare the spoliation of such a noble gift, that has the most exalted innate faculties.

Wisdom and purity are enlisted to prevent its being despoiled for false gods, pretences, powers, and miserable emoluments, that lay waste the fairest portion of God's creation.

The world is deepest interested in seeing that such mind is not polluted by ideas revolting to reason and God, nor fall short of the fund that protects, defines, and renders happy.

The consolation on one's death-couch will be sustaining as one of the best in life's annals, to uphold the helpless and innocent mind, incapable of defence, against the difficulties and conflicts of a wrong faith or position.

If sectarian that faith, no matter how fanciful and richly painted, it will be hopeless, and the inherent expectations, however high wrought, will and must have an end ere long, in the universal power of the one living God, who looks alone to mind and reason. Of what moment will it be, to convert to an evanescent doctrine, that must perish before the bright light of truth?

Children become the citizens of the world, to labor for the great ends of their Creator and his true glory, not as apostates for men's vain glory and dying pretensions.

Theirs, rightly nurtured, will be a true fame, and is a mighty power, to shield souls in safety by rectitude of mind.

Look to its principles, and invoke their best truthful tuition, and leave the balance to mind, that is accountable for its own choice.

The infant mind must be taught self-independence to look alone to itself, for its own accountability on the best performance of its whole duty.

Let mind be most liberally cultivated by rational education, that it may elicit its own glorious salvation from its own richest funds, with a freedom that is lovely, and a wisdom that is full and comprehensive of God's magnificent purposes of creation.

Such mind, if put right, will honor the true God, seek the true way, and be a true follower of true religion.

How difficult is it to eradicate false conceptions of peculiar faith, when once established: the noble mind should not be misled for priestocracy, sordid lucre, and false systems of faith, that truly analyzed, are abominable and demoralizing superstition and false, senseless worship.

Let mind be truly and nobly enlightened, that it may not miss the way that the purest inspiration leads. There is a right and wrong way as different. Both cannot be right.

A right cultivation rightly directs, as a plain sign-board, and has an unmistakable stamp, that no mortal can put thereon.

The other is necessarily counterfeit.

Whoever have been taught wrong, should not persist in the error of their ways, but rectify their errors by the light of their reason and philosophy, the shortest expression of proper sense, and then they shall stand amid the wisest and trustiest of the land. How accursed are those that mislead the mind of the innocent to wrong faith, no matter the object, but especially the bigot, the sectarian, and all that deny to God his just sphere and attributes.

The proper education and cultivation of mind from infancy to manhood, or mind's full maturity in the world's school, are to give the right direction and the genuine bullion, that each possessor can fashion by his or her own taste and genius, to the highest elevation in refined civilization.

It is to teach all to act aright under all untried circumstances, knowingly and satisfactorily, to escape the wiles and duplicity of sophistry, that ever takes her advantages, the counterfeit of truth.

THE MIND OF YOUTH

Is to be trained to eschew flattery and sophistry, and to speak boldly and candidly the truth in all its comprehensive bearings, when necessary for public good. It must have sound principles, the best guide for life and correct faith, whatever that faith may be.

Nothing, then, can be withheld in the compass of its whole duty, through craftship, or anything under the power of the Creator, to invalidate or control its first and constant perception of its duty.

Youth's mind is to be moulded according to its mental quality and inherent calibre, and come weal or wo to sects and denominations, truth must be adopted. Truth begets truth, whilst sophistry begets sophistry. The progeny must be like the parents.

Paramount truths should never be withheld from the world from paramount reasons, as the best and purest should be given as the portion.

Accursed be that tuition that leads to untruths, for perjury and corruption of the people have had their foundation at the same time.

All youths should have an independent mind fostered, to overcome sectarian views, that have been propagated by tradition recorded, as if book sophistry was any the less sophistry, and bibles were less fables, when fables and legends were their foundations, and faith any less than blind credulity resting on them.

What cannot stand the tests of mind, the analysis of truth, be it covered with the silver locks of old age, or the cobwebs of past ages, is unworthy of mind's respect.

Truth only is to be reverenced by youth in faith.

THE MATURED MIND AND SOUND JUDGMENT.

Does educated, cultivated, and enlightened mind, hesitate at its best good?

Does such mind fear man rather than God?

Such mind easily sees, when abstracted from all the malign influences too potent in blind credulity, that the present state of peculiar faith of the world is most accommodating and credulous, that adopts much of absurd and contradictory traditions, no matter from what source.

Such mind must see that all, when reduced to reason, and tried faithfully by her tribunal, are dissipated like mist before the meridian sun.

Such mind, triumphant in its intrinsic sagacity will aver most satisfactorily, that there is no supreme reverence due to any but to the Creator. That whenever mortals violate correct principles, their claim to mind's respect is cut off, on the rightful policy of truth and self-preservation. All wise minds will ever try all things, without exception, by analysis and analogy, reason.

If any exception be made, no matter in what, religion or any invaluable subject, then the position is blind faith, dishonest and stupid in full.

No enlightened mind can be spell-bound by any irrational faith, as it will always demand that all faith and all testimony be submitted to reason and truth. Hence, faith, no matter what, is worthless, unless substantiated on this basis of rationality.

The practice of the world is to test all others by such standard, if forced to assume honesty.

Neither Deity nor duty can be appreciated, except through the agency of cultivated mind.

The appropriate mental fund, matured in the richness of its own innate greatness, ripens a plentiful harvest of native independence, that divests mind of feudal vassalage, confines best to the strict limits that virtue creates, and avoids all the torturing penalties of vital errors, the most dangerous under the licentious sway of ignorance and vice.

The conclusive bearing of all these views, leads all, with ample and just confidence, to certain definite and ennobling results, that give the best independence and consolation. The paramount duty of enlightened reason arises therefrom, to refine humanity with all the graces of civilization, adorn her with all the courtesies of life that can bless mind; to liberalize the soul in its stateliest capacity, not only avoid all the results of equivocal character, in daily intercourse with the world, but to do most positive good to the greatest extent and number, and refer to the most certain and authentic genuine Author of all good.

He that views his duty and his secret professions aright, must not waver, doubt, or defer the right action, at the right time.

Man must, then, do his part dutifully and most faithfully, to secure the co-operation of Him who thus announces and secures the correct position.

THE DIVINE RIGHTS OF MIND THAT IS OF THE PEOPLE, THE ONLY ONES ON EARTH.

All children should learn to think, and speak the truth. But how can they, under this ignoble regime of absolutism, conceived most cunningly, for the good of the vulgar pretences of those mastering the divine rights of the people? Rational popular mind lays the foundation of the people's future usefulness and character. They can then reflect the greatest of all legacies, the principles of mind, on the past and the future, on parents and posterity.

All good states, the whole world, will be the mighty gainers.

This is what rational religion inculcates, all the time. All proper physical and mental development must be promoted; how can that be, if peculiar faith bigotry dwarfs and warps the mind by its peculiar sophistry. All sound, rational minds should have a proper, rational, scholastic education, and all should choose or be apprenticed to professions, trade, or business, as far as expedient or necessary, to maintain that healthy existence that nature requires, or that independence that social virtues adorn.

No children can be sectarian, without pretending earthly leaders mislead, or they pervert themselves from sinister motives, at this present age.

The numerous oppositions of sectarians affecting divine faith, to the genuine faith, can speedily die out, if peculiar faith be not inculcated prematurely in mind of youth, and made a part of the curses of sectarian education.

Let no tender mind be reared in fanaticism, social, moral, or religious, that separates the world with unsuitable antagonism.

What are all bibles and their teachers worth, that commend the slavish doctrine of divine rights of absolutism, for the only divine rights, those of the people. To whom should freemen, enlightened in their government, resort for tuition in religion? Surely not to any that show a vestige of absolutism.

Mind, that has obtained its dignity by the principles of freedom in its own fundamental institutions, should never place itself in abeyance to the enslaved mind of any country, degenerated by her luxury and overwhelmed by her imbecile faith.

The people of the ancient, or monarchical world, were and are miserably enslaved, by its priestocracy, in horrible superstition, and cannot give its peculiar faith to the free of America, when all is condemned by truth.

Religion is in proportion to national elevation, intellectual and moral civilization. America should exact the true. She should seek to diffuse the true light, that the stains of superstition on mind in every past age may be obliterated.

It is due to freedom of government, to secure full, pure freedom of faith, seen in rational religion.

The mighty power of the people should participate, in all rightful attributes.

Prospects may have been most gloomy, as those of freedom's past revolutions, but the result was most brilliant, for continents and the world.

The most liberal, rational, and just deportment, procures the best results to all the world in general. Freemen, have you esteemed, valued, and availed yourself of your noblest liberty, privileges, and rights, in all the attainable points of life?

Have you helped to put down ignorance and error, repulsed bigotry, dispelled superstition, and overcome sophistry?

Have you sustained the defence of nature's rights, on her free and lofty principles?

The world has ever been overrun by vile and degraded demagogues, thirsting for power and self-interest, reckless of consequences; ready with their trainband vassals and retainers, to swear to any and everything base and perjured, in order to succeed.

In injuring mankind, we seek to injure their Creator. To do justice to principles, we must comprehend the whole relations to their Author.

SOCIAL AND RELIGIOUS DUTY OF MAN, TAUGHT BY MIND AND TIME. THE FAITHFUL OPERATIONS OF MIND.

MAN must look faithfully and wisely all the time into the operations and functions of mind, as their character alone safely guides to correct and profitable conclusions, essential to vital benefit and immortal happiness.

Man seeks the reward of his merit, in the various grades of its worth. He clearly has to abide the penalties of demerit.

As certainly as virtue that is the practice of correct principles is rewarded on principles, in her various attributes abundantly on this earth, too plainly for the eye of philosophy to mistake, if principles be faithfully taken into the whole account, in action and estimation, so surely has vice, which is a violation of the certain laws of creation relatively to strict religion to God, and social duty to man, to sustain undeniable penalties for violation of such inherent principles that vindicate themselves to assert the supremacy of their author, who is pure, perfect and almighty.

Those principles then become universal laws for all. In the progress of time, a more correct knowledge of principles that are inherent, the growth of centuries matured, as philosophical science was developed, and man's highest duty, as his own best self-preservation socially and individually requires their most faithful observance, and is the promotion of their future eminence and elevation.

It is individually or in mass, that organic principles apply, and they decide authoritatively for mind's best good, if it act the part of true and enlightened wisdom.

The mind's powers were developing from age to age, each reflecting circles more or less enlarged, till they burst forth in development, in more universal good and liberal progress.

Minor lights had glimmered in the vastness of space and remote obscure durations of time, till master fires were enkindled in various mighty revolutions; then it was that the greater luminaries were conspicuous, and their beams beneficially effulgent, until now the whole series begin to be irradiated, and blind is the mind that will not see, stupid its constitution, that will not discard irrational superstition.

The mighty functions of mind and time co-operating, have taught men to think systematically, and respect principles that they cannot now overlook, as tending to the great ends of the Creator.

System that bespeaks science, finally brings man to know and record his proper codes of ethics, most essentially important and absolutely necessary, and seeing their comprehension in the world's wide theatre to an endless eternity, mankind is better enlisted to the proper performance of all duties to God and man. The world, whose large majority, unless perverted by habit, is disposed to act up to its rights, seeks to know them rightly, to perform them appropriately.

None but bigots, cowards and blockheads are afraid of science in theology and in all matters.

In the morning of his days, man enters the beautiful edifice of his existence; innocence supplies the place of severer science, and throws the mantle of its noble protection over his halcyon moments. His mind realizing the benefits of reason, leads him finally to the conception and exercise of its best functions; good habit secures the certain results of his duty, and patient perseverance joined to true confidence, rational faith, arising from true knowledge of the laws of his nature, give him a triumphant vital career.

Perfecting sound science by seeking true wisdom, it becomes all men to test by experience, which is testing light of mind by time, his whole position, and declares the manly intention of being wiser in future. Mind's first and last duty ever points to its Creator and attributes.

CONVERSION.

This is claimed to be a change or a new birth, in a second human nature. Now can there be any change but by light of mind, that comes by rational education? When is the victory for individual mind, in the whole world? It must embrace conservative principles, otherwise it has an uncertain tenure of elements dangerous and suicidal.

Religion then, is, when deciphered, mind yielded up by reason into the embraces of soul and emotions, but all must be under the commands of mind's highest and soundest duty. Religion is the true expansion of the human rational mind.

Without this, the world is strange, because perversion of mind perverts it or makes it strange.

Religion then, sets the proper seal on mind.

Where is the limit to any doctrine adopted, but reason? Can you as a good and true citizen, exclude mind's best friend, reason? You may affect spiritualization, enthusiasm, ecstacies endorsed by feelings, zeal, devotion to martyrdom, but all must be tested by reason and Monotheism.

The perverted world can get up any creed of any peculiar faith, but for reason, all the time mind's protector. But reason may mislead.

Reason as all others, must be ruled by the universal standard, to be right. But reason has been rejected by faith.

Now we see where priests have misled us, where we and the world are.

Faith and reason are two great principles of the God of nature, and cannot possibly clash. The clashing is all from mind's perversion.

Faith has superseded reason, and of course faith of all kinds we have with a vengeance.

The world pays the expiation of all this treachery to God and reason, by billions of humanity sacrificed on faith's bloody altars.

How can we thus erect enlightened public opinion, that is the supreme ruler, as high as man can go? It is hid under faith's sneaking pretensions.

There are some inhumane, almost lost to all conventional rules of society. What of that?

The bigot in peculiar faith is apt to be a brute in friendship, ungrateful and stupid.

Have you ever analyzed human nature, the world?

Were you always in affluence, so as to look at the sunshine only, and not at the shade?

Why is there education of mind, if entirely and absolutely a free agent? It is to give it command of circumstances of creation, the universe. To do so, the soul has to perform its universe-solution problem.

To train and evolve rightly the affections along with the intellect, the mind, with all its appropriate functions, is the work of the most comprehensive education. But let the question be fairly stated. Reason that operates, if perverted by malign effect, with valid perversion on society, is to possess its equilibrium on all just educational principles, to do justice to mind and Creator. When the question of the judiciary is asked, is the culprit insane, or of responsible mind, the full amount of free agency under the circumstances of its education is admitted. Free agency of mind implies a liberty of will and choice with a becoming knowledge, to insure a proper responsibility.

When the soul governs adverse circumstances, that is what a right rational education is for, to be the true director of reason. An enlightened free agency, results from the religion of principles; thus the mind is ever under the influence of peculiar or rational education, in the first of which it is misdirected by faith, and in the last, guided by religion. Adam and Eve, the Jew bible pretended first parents, were perfect, and put into an Eden, a paradise so called, and yet fell in their perfection. That is a libel on mind and its Creator.

THE PRESIDENCY OF MIND.

Mind was ruler when time began.

Do not let the world injure you. How will you prevent it? By the proper use of mind, that calls for a wise legislation, administration, and due execution of proper laws, that are equitable, just, and constitutional.

The world must yield to rational mind all that it is entitled to. To whom else can the tribute be rightfully paid? Mind is to solve the problem of life and soul. Do not be tory to them—to the noblest principles of the richest legacy and heraldry of the universe.

Absolutism is a world-tory conspirator against the rights of mind, the people. Is the world tory to mind? Rationality is to govern rational minds, that know no faith but through that channel; all else is false and bad, perverse, wicked, and evil.

Embellish mind, the earth, society, duty, government.

It is for sovereign mind to explode that old dotard, the old regime, the tyrant. Meet all the world-questions with mind, not as charlatans.

Have discussions every seventh day, to perpetuate the blessings of mind's progress through science, philosophy, and religion, in their sublimest principles known, not as now, in hearing what does not improve mind, but renders it bigot. The universe is always in motion, and time, the exponent, declares that, and requires of mind proper action. If rational universal education be not universally fostered, then the deficiency reflects on the world in all the departments, and in none less than in religion. Each mind must be rationally cultivated, else it may degenerate into horrid superstition, that is only graduated by the light of the times, even to human sacrifices. The sovereign people must not relax their comprehensive vigilance, through the proper operations of the human mind.

The last best rise on earth is that of rational mind to its highest rationality. This teaches the world that the height of logic is not to use rhetoric, but argument; not to resort to sophistry, but expel it, analyze it in its most insidious world-coils, under its most extravagant disguises and assumptions.

When mind declares its world-independence of peculiar faith, it will be the most glorious day of refined civilization. Mind is to overcome all life and world difficulties. The mind has God-elements of religion, and knows its Creator by its five senses, operated upon by the universe. Any other view is peculiar, and is the result of peculiar education. However sacred be feelings, still soundness of judgment ought not to be alienated for minor objects.

The recognition of God is by and through mind. How shall this question be otherwise properly decided? It must be decided by supreme rationality, referable to the supreme standard of the universe. It does not depend on man's books, that cannot touch the question in their present absurdity. All that exclude the civilizers of the world are guilty of high treason to mind—rational education. Do not turn traitor or tory to the noblest intellectual rights of mind. Cultivation of mind by science and philosophy is expedient all the time.

Give the proper liberal expansion to rationality of the world. I have a duty to perform to my mind, the world, that must not be omitted. Let rational mind have no trammels of the bigot partisan, but obey the high behest of principles.

In eliciting the proper resources of mind, we elicit the proper resources of the world.

All rational minds should have nothing short of a rational education. Mind that has no laudable curiosity has necessarily great ignorance; the more bigotry it has, the less rationality.

FREE AGENCY OF MIND.

On the best principles of free agency, the intelligence of mind, in perfect equilibrium, would correctly decide that question; but these bible worthies write as if this was the only world, and that mind could be here perfect; a perfect nonsense. This is only a perfect world, and mind can only attain through life a perfect state at best comparatively. That is the great question, how far that worldly perfection can be attained by mind. Now as to God's not giving mind the proper issue, the proper direction, that is a libel, as proved by the religion of principles.

All minds are bound to act from the circumstances of the universe, and act with the best taste, that moral spirit is the only true test of greatness.

Mind has free agency for good or evil, as it is properly educated to maintain its just equilibrium on rational principles, that master all up to the circumstances of creation. What creates a sound public opinion? That which builds up the noblest light of mind. What are mind's attributes? Those of Deity must be considered to solve the question. All in the universe subserve the noblest inspirations of mind and soul.

It has been said that Deity has not given mind light to reach the solution of its purpose.

This is a libel, for these are the universe marks, too visible to be mistaken, that is, the consecration of mind and soul's physical, moral, and religious being, that leads to the sublimity of universal happiness, and the avoidance of individual misery. The Great First Cause adopts all as instrumentalities for future good.

In the present corrupt frame-work of society, mind, the superior, is held in miserable thraldom to creeds and notions, all being false of course.

The supremacy of mind is proved by making the best available legitimate capital out of one's errors, follies, and crimes. Mind must not depend on others to do its own best correction, to redress its own wrongs and injuries, when its capital is the best in the universe, that of principle. In all institutions rational mind can most satisfactorily protect itself, its best reputation, by a proper check and balance.

The necessity that compels mind is that for the universal comprehension of principles. It is the area of fruitful religion, that consummates its eternal happiness. Mind is a free agent under the wisest dispensations, else God the Creator had been responsible for moral delinquencies. God is responsible for the complete comprehension, and mind is bound to embrace it in the purview of its immortal fruition. To have mind fully right, it must have full and complete rational education, in full and complete maturity of time and ways. Educate the mind rationally in time, to eradicate superstition.

Supersede churches by all the noblest means of rational education. Spread all the best lights of principles, and the world must and will be duly enlightened.

What can compensate for the loss of functions? Money; trash, shadows!

Provided that mind acts consistently to its enlightened functions, the whole world could in a short time be fully vindicated from the thraldom of ignorance, and the curses of perversion. The mind's perfection cannot be attained on this stage of being; other portions of the universe are requisite.

God, infinitely perfect, should in justice render mind adequate and equal to the reformation of its own abuses. He has clearly done so. Free agency of mind is to secure the noblest results. The highest tuition of the universe is religion, that teaches in the beautiful and consistent principles of cause and effect, all forming the noblest circumstances for mind's illustrious triumphs.

An innate principle, cognizant of right and wrong, presupposes an enlightened conscience that is best matured by self-denial and education. It is not that education will mislead, but that rational education should comprehend all the available principles of intellect, morals and religion. Take cause and effect out of the universe, and all the theatre of reason is annihilated. Will bible bigots underrate all these because their monomania renders them crazy? It will not do to say that mind is the creature of necessity, and acts by impulse. That is only a part of the mighty subject, that looks through the universe to its Creator. If the immediate assigned influence of sensual gratification should cause the deplorable viciousness of mind, why there is the master countervailing influence of penalty, if mind did not look to a nobler influence of religion.

Say that in Europe the pauper could not command enough to eat, the master influence of eternal hope would counteract bad impulses, when his presence in America decides the special providence of mind. Now, call it nature, what you choose, a blind materialism you cannot make it, when all the Great First Cause is Providence, whose exponent is principles, the consummation of which is religion.

The intricate question of free agency should teach mind the noblest position of Providence, universal as to God, and the most rational, if special, as to mind or soul.

By the magnificent power of mind man has to solve the problem of religion, the soul and the balance, and to do this a universe problem, a rationality, is expedient universally. Is mind a free agent, or does it not act from necessity? Whatever is, is right with God, who created the universe on certain conservative principles that constitute the especial circumstances for will and action, that should be according to an enlightened conscience, an innate consciousness of right from wrong. As to all sin, that implies a departure from universal principles, and is to be corrected by their best appreciation. All this implies the right exercise of the whole powers, or means in power, and to be attained. The broad platform of monotheism implies all this, and predicates the proper position of rational education.

If free agency of mind was only according to peculiar imparted education, then the position of self-improvement would be fallacious. What is the rational world doing? Improving the mind by all rational means of education, as discussion. The paramount object is to reach the most elevated, that has paramount influence. Why are all the organs of penalty for infraction of principles? Because all moral and religious, as physical, must be obeyed implicitly when appreciated. The State must see that all its constituents must have the best abiding practical interest in rational education. There is the richest treasure, the capital of which realizes compound interest. Rational education commands all commandable circumstances.

Religion, the most exalted of all teaching, puts every thing on principle, which solves the whole question. Principles command all Christs, Mahomets, Smiths, Tinkers, and all their mongers.

To make mind fully responsible, educate it all the time rationally, that its functions may be rightfully employed. Mind has its functions, and is responsible for their appropriate exercise.

The responsibility rests somewhere, positively. Freedom of choice, will, volition, implies responsibility. When people sin all their lives, and at the last dying moment, when retributive justice was impracticable in this world by wanton wicked life, then by fiction of the priestocracy they are forgiven. This is not, in the nature of the universe or things, real.

Mind has free agency under the circumstances of creation. Then it has to inquire, what are those circumstances, that freedom, and that responsibility? There are no mysteries in well defined duties, and what can be better defined than by uniform principles? The bible people did not understand their subject, and committed themselves wofully and ludicrously.

The Jews fell, as all the ancients did, and all even the universe would, because they needed the religion of principles. The moderns thrive, the more deference they pay to mind and its holiest purposes. Has mind used all the means available in its power to rescue itself? If it do, assuredly it will put down witches and world-spirits, superstition, priestocracy, and all their odious, contemptible, infamous bibles, all the abusers of trusts of the most valuable character, being burlesques on religion, and its violation. Mind has weighed them in the balance, and found them wanting.

As to mind's free agency under the circumstance of creation, we must give the proper analysis. The proper functions of mind present an independent individuality, the soul placed on this theatre to master all the elements subservient to its purpose through rational education. In this sense, it has a perfect free agency. Does mind act from necessity, a mere creature of circumstances? A partial view would consider it in abeyance, but a masterly comprehension renders it a triumph—the position of mind and analysis of its functions, of thoughts, words, will, deed or action. It enters into the audience of three beliefs, that act for general weal or wo. Now all should be presented fairly, for correct appreciation or adoption, as it can only select one as the best: it discards the others.

Mind is brought forth to battle with the elements of creation and master them. This brings us into cause and effect, without which nothing in the universe can be done or thought of. That at once decides rational belief, for monotheism alone takes proper cognizance of this whole subject, and comprehends rational mind in its guardian care. The functions of mind decide its commissions and rights. Mind presents in its agency all the best considerations, educational, legislative and judicial, and invokes the noblest talents of most expansive minds to this particular.

The great emblem of mind and its functions is the self-adjusting capacity of maintaining its proper equilibrium over all evils that beset its dignity. What can be more disgraceful than the attempt to make mind responsible to bibles of peculiar faith, that is totally irresponsible to truth? Mind should adopt the most enlightened associations to discuss the truths of religion, to which it is ever in abeyance.

Man's free agency of mind would be nullified, and his sins would be superseded, if they originated from an evil genius, and a monster without responsibility; and God, the essence of purity, would be a party to the guilt of imbecile mortals, and of corrupting immortals; to such absurdity and crime, do evil systems, of worldly-minded speculation, lead unthinking minds.

If Satan was a fallen angel, then an impurity, sin, a mere negative quality, not a positive existence, can enter a pure place, and the presence of a pure being, a palpable absurdity, and contradiction; and Deity then could not help himself in his imbecility, against the misrule of his evil cabinet, stupidly adopted and countenanced, nor his choice spirits, or even his future charge, though billions! Where even, is his own protection? For all this false pretence decides the Creator's impotency, which, if true, the universe would demonstrate.

O, mind perverted! that could impeach thyself so low, by such demoralizing fictions. Where was thy blush?

This delusion and wilful stupid blindness, apparently impeaches God, but certainly emanated from impiety, and a host of errors, by self-elected teachers, or blindly permitted by reckless constituents, whose actions and misdeeds directly impeach the minds of all its asserters.

This assertion is most absurd, for the bible's heaven is made to yield its best treasures, and most glorious rights, and strips God of his best attributes, to gloss the less pretensions of mind, whose free agency is necessarily subject to the best of character, under the circumstances of its earthly creation, necessary for the formation.

Where there was no temptation in heaven, there could be no sin and no demerit, as no characteristic action is implied, and no appreciation can be formed.

The time for temptation had passed; the eternity of reward had arrived. The state of embodied mind had ceased, that of soul had been commenced. The mortal had merged in the immortal, the part of human nature had been put off—an immortal spirit had been realized. There could be no temptation, where nothing could be gained, and all were to be lost.

In the full fruition of happiness, all was sagacity and wisdom, and as sin was folly, an impossibility, is fully assured of a fall. God created no temptation, and the whole pretence impeaches and demonstrates itself false.

The character of soul had been formed and matured, elicited from previous trials of its nature in the incipient existence of mind and body, its various soul-organizations, and the success of its resistance to supposed evil in all its minority.

Any other position involves the responsibility of the tempter, not only the successful but triumphant rival of his Creator, and imposes upon the Creator, the necessity of the tempter's punishment, and that for triumphant rivalry! What jesuitry; what object could God have in placing imbecile mortals in the bible's garden of Eden, to play a farce that his fore-knowledge, a part of his Omniscience could have prevented? Of course then, there is no responsibility in such position.

It is then the powers of mind that are potent for good, and magnificent in its greatness, but full of evil if perverted. We must take the facts, as they are clearly presented us in this world, and scorn all bible of tradition legends.

Mind must then have a suitable theatre for self-agency: it must be untrammeled to be responsible.

The nature of universal existence implies a positive good; the reverse, physical or moral, is a negative evil. The author of all, is a conservative Creator.

A correct knowledge of human nature, sees it as a matter-of-fact existence, endowed with passions and emotions, that are lawful, if rightly directed and gratified. Their gratifications on legitimate principles, are those of conservation and protection, but on improper basis, lead to disastrous results, and ruinous destructive consequences.

This is the nature, and must be the law of creation. The best appreciation of these laws, establishes the best code, on the most refined taste and civilization, the highest state of man's earthly action.

But what triumph awaits mind in its wisdom and purity, to rise above error, master difficulties, conquer ignorance, surmount prejudice and bigotry, and attain the final general perfection practicable.

Free agency of mind declares the wisest philosophy of rational religion, an epitome of sound, common, and proper sense, that directs according to the best lights of mind, in all moral and physical bearings of this whole subject, and renders unto God all that are his truly and dutifully, and unto man all that blesses and guides him aright to his Author and Creator, safely and satisfactorily. Free agency of mind, implies reason as accountability.

Whatever system of peculiar faith prevents all this, that does withhold any of God's least possessions, is spurious and counterfeit to all eternity, and should be contemned by mind, as its seal of condemnation from God is plain to all reasonable minds in the world's history, shown in wo and misery.

The poison of nature is to be counteracted, and turned to nature's benefit, and mind's triumph instead of their injury, but mind's poisons made in numerous ways most insidiously, are its greatest evils.

As bad as the tyrants and oppressors of the world are, mind that acquiesces and created them is more heinous still.

The tyrants of the world can be held now, in abeyance to mind that asserts its glorious independence.

The exposure of the world's tyranny is the prerogative of mind under freedom's banner.

The least of all its evils is, to conquer all as far as practicable, by its competent forces of available cultivation, of correct instruction, fortified by correct habits, and enlightened principles.

To sin the least, is the best that mind can do, in its present state of existence.

What system can teach more correct doctrine?

It is demoralizing to pretend that mind does not err, and hence does not sin.

Our enlightened faculties teach us, if not perverted, that mind is fallible, and much of human nature is corrupt, and has to be guarded with all the solicitude of affection, the care of wisdom, and the best protection of reason.

Where then was the necessity of adding positive evils, to increase the difficulty of mind?

The fallen angel is a fable indeed.

Such a being is unnecessary on earth, as an angel or messenger, and a stigma on mind and soul, as incapable of blissful enjoyment if degraded from heaven.

Conservative principles are angels for earth and the universe; happy spirits are fixed in God's holy centre. Any other view is most irrational and contradictory.

This earth presents a scope for mind free agent, in self-avenging principles, that promote mind's felicity, if pure, but counteract it if corrupt, sooner or later, individually or nationally. This is surely not evil but universal good. Rational mind scans rightly. Past ages, dark, ignorant, and ferocious, portray to us another more formidable avenger, and another more horrid abode, resorting to mind's contradictions.

God must have blessed creation, as his own lovely work, coming from the fountain of love and mercy. A local curse must have created universal sympathy. All matters are only relative.

The most favored of all, was the pure, the holy centre, a perfectly pure place for a perfectly pure being.

Into this abode, what impiety it would be to conceive any entrance, without perfect and spotless purity.

Who then was Lucifer? Fable or history, that is consistent with reason, must represent him as one of the brightest of beatific intelligences.

To be characterized as a select being in the holy centre, he must have been essentially pure, to enter an essentially pure sphere.

All that entered therein must be pure and holy.

Then, for impurity to reach a perfectly pure being, in a perfectly pure sphere!

If that were the case, what now would prevent the awful catastrophe, from reaching any or all, at any period of eternity? God's imbecility demonstrated once, is an eternal imbecility, as it is inherent.

Are not each as liable as the highest and most intelligent, who must have appreciated much the best of all the blessed, pure beings, the horrors of perdition, the loss of all blessings, the gain of extreme misery and unceasing remorse?

What a reflection to the character, not of him, who, as in the holy centre, still better must have appreciated the result, but of those who write themselves the stupid authors of fables, with no sense and morality, terrifiers of mind, and libelers of the Creator! With them is the inherent imbecility, not with God.

Can he who had honor, glory, and happiness sure, realized by an exalted light of soul, tried in all the gradations of spheres up to the highest, be taken out of the purest of all, himself most purified when received there?

Was not this exalted character best, after reaching the holiest, the highest abode?

How came he there, if not pure and meritorious?

Any other character was unworthy of entrance. For the holy centre never could, as pure a place as defined, be a recipient for a moment even, of impurity—no never; that would, must be, an aspersion on Deity's purity. Then it is Deity, not Lucifer, that is to blame.

What kind of a compliment does it pay Deity's omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience?

That the libelers of God were recklessly ignorant and miserably blasphemous.

It may be said temptation caused his fall; if that be so, was he worthy of such a trial? But the Creator is not mind's tempter; that is a stupid libel.

But the day of temptation had passed—that belonged to spheres of inferior character or less purity.

But temptation in the holy centre! That is the abode of enjoyment, rest, repose, and glory!

Temptation, then, of what, how, and why, must be asked; seeing that happiness and joy were his, were before him?

What more could he, if pure, promise himself? And if not pure, say, could he or any other being reach the presence of the immaculate Deity, in his immaculate realm?

Mortal! Thy mind has slandered the holy residence, and blasphemed thy God; erecting a monster, a fiction, with the peculiarity and contradiction thine; thus libeling the nature of creation and its Creator. What sphere, then, so unfit for Satan's reception?

Was there any location prepared, any before accursed, in the wide expanse of space of creation, instituted by a Creator of blessed attributes, not previously filled already?

Would God resign his own means of bettering the spheres of creation, by resigning any space to the majesty of an evil genius, his successful rival, to hopelessly degrade mind and himself beyond the redemption of the Almighty?

Shall the creation of unspeakable sublimity, where the order of genius most supreme reigns pre-eminently, be blighted with a monster of no responsibility, taking away all from the victims of his seduction, by reason of his conquering influence, when he ruins God's fairest creation, mind, but enjoys all such as the spoils of victory and reward?

Shall this fictitious being, who never was of any greater value, at his best, than the least human soul, riot in the ruin of souls innumerable, subject to his fiendish seduction and agency? There is no reason at all in the supposition.

It is much more rational to suppose that Deity would have raised beatific souls above the holy centre, if the souls merited that distinction, than that he would let them fall below.

But the noblest views arise in the liberal expansion of free and moral agency of mind, that bigots are afraid to trust, in the unbounded ocean of its greatness. Among them is GRATITUDE.

To commence with the Supreme, is not only the highest privilege of mortality, but a pleasure and happiness that define the eminent character of mind.

It is that serene state of beatific composure of mind, that renders sacred the time, and gives the best sanctity of life.

All rational beings are endowed with this glorious privilege, that invests the contemplation with sublime aspirations at any moment of life.

It is that which renders human capacity available on its own resources, by relying on self-advancement to the utmost capability, and leaving the balance in the hands of an unchangeable being, who asks for the purest adoration, and the best grateful emotions.

Such a state of mind disproves the doctrines of election and predestination, as stupid and unworthy of God, who is made responsible, instead of man.

Man had then been a mere machine, and the mighty mind, that is ever present, acting, working, practical, pilot and guardian—if rightfully cultivated, ever grateful—is a mere machine; has no free moral agency; thus contradicting what every moment disproves! Lost and hopeless must be that man, that does not feel abundant sources of gratitude to Almighty God, for his favors and kindness; and this every mind feels from free agency.

This earth might present a happier state, if this feeling of gratitude were duly cultivated, and could present the nearest approach to universal salvation, in the shortest duration, by universal mind being better.

Gratitute ought to preclude any, that are refined, from allowing others to excel them in courtesy of just feeling, or kindness of manner, in life.

What does more good, than this desire for good?

It renders humanity lovely, wise, and of noblest value. It repays a thousand fold its numerous blessings, in the family of man, through its wide diffusion among the nations of the earth.

Here is portrayed an index of soul, that delights the analyst of character, and assures us that mind is ennobled by the liberal principles of a right education, civilizes nations, and renders lovely the earth. And if mind be thus just to man, much more will it be to God, whose every attribute and character must present the clearest evidence of such a debt, due by mind to mind's Creator.

As great as the munificent artist has shown his skill in the construction, no less is his greatness in the richness of mind's endowments, and destined purposes of action.

Its most exalted is devotion, without alloy, to the mighty Author of its existence; its next is to itself, in all the varieties of its characteristic circumstances, and especially in its duty to that of others.

A true, sincere, and exclusive allegiance to its worthy Creator, endows it with the loftiest and justest conscience, of its consistent duties elsewhere.

Thus is the soul refined, and started on the only true basis of its own inappreciable salvation.

The future furnishes an earnest, full of the most attractive inspirations, to the most determined perseverance.

Its commencement was in permanent principles of conviction; its resolves arose on the purity of its devotion to the best of causes, and the most exalted of Authors.

FREE AGENCY OF MIND AND PREDESTINATION.

Is it predestination that puzzles you? Do you pretend that no matter how you act, God commands you? But you have a free agency of mind under the circumstances of creation that contradicts that. What more can you have? God himself is only God under the consistent circumstances of his attributes. He has made himself a free agent under them, and less nor more cannot exist.

But what is this thing, predestination? Is it, on true analysis, the compulsive force of a supervising Power in all the vital actions of man, or is it not surely the most enlarged, liberal, comprehensive providence of the universe? As sure as there is a Creator, his almighty, just and perfect providence has devised a uniform rule of government, the most appropriate government, that presents the noblest conservation. If there be any excess or diminution, impinging on this conservation, the inherent results necessarily follow. Man has his prescribed functions in life to perform, and if he do not enact them as duty, his failure is attended with appropriate forfeiture.

His being is identified with social and religious relations, and his mighty life-problem is most elevated when it reaches the dignity of rationality. He is bound as a rational being to come up to rational and religious principles, for the best present and future self-preservation.

This thing of predestination is, then, not the petty arbitrary rule of the Creator, but the comprehensive problem of the universe, and man must adapt himself accordingly. Every thing in life proves the necessity and utility of mind's best action. Mind is the artificer of its own position under the circumstances of its creation. You believe in improvement of mind, to enable it to improve the world.

That implies more than a simple, blind acquiescence in predestination, that leaves a creature merely where he began—a mere animal that has no free agency. An animal has certain defined limits of instinct to perform, and in all ages he is an analogous animal. All the tuition of mind has not changed the nature of the beast, the maturity of his instinctive intellect. Predestination leaves man a mere animal, but free agency under the circumstances of creation takes man where predestination leaves him, and carries him to the dignity of mind's functions, duties and merits, and gives the best earnest of immortal functions of creative thought. Your vessel, under common circumstances of navigation, goes to your chosen port, under appropriate circumstances of management, varied and diversified by incidents. It goes as you direct. But you assume that God pre-ordains, and that you are only a passive agent. How is this, when he gives the functions? It is yours to employ them rightly. You speak of predestination any how, as a creation-obligation, for which God alone is responsible and mind only in abeyance. Why, then, do you punish? You are self-condemned as a tyrant, if this bigoted view is to be the order of the times. Why, then, is there mind? Why was not man a mere animal, to reach in all stages of the world his certain defined sphere? Of what use is reason, the thinking part? Predestination, then, is your bigoted, contracted definition of peculiar faith.

We see that the world presents four stages of mind's condition, and the last the ennobling one of civilization, that proves most conclusively mind's mastery, by the most general advantages of its circumstances.

If there be only predestination, why do you differ so essentially with mankind, and censure them for their position, their opinions and actions? On your position, you must exercise forbearance and toleration. Persons of ignorance cannot do as you. Why is this? The difference is in mind, in the state of that mind. Instruct and enlighten the whole, and then you may expect better things.

What has been vainly and ingloriously considered predestination, which is equivalent to appreciating the creator of mind as unjust, is mind's inglorious own. Mind has to act to the best of its ability. The world observes that talents differ and make up an agreeable diversity; some talents are not as great as others, but greater than many. What does that signify? That mind can excel the creator of mind? God is perfect and perfectly just. You cannot construe his deeds until you can analyze them, otherwise you would libel him.

You must plant, improve and embellish, to do justice to your position and duty. You must not stop short of rational principles. God does the balance. Now you see what you aim to explain. The most sacrilegious impiety is perpetrated in making God responsible for man's sins, follies, crimes, murders and wars.

When two armies, about to enter into conflict, engage in prayer to the same eternal God of the universe to favor their side of the question, how can the supplication, of one at least, be otherwise than hypocrisy? After all the logic of sophistry, the whole affair is naught but that of principles which cannot clash. Either one or both are wrong; how then can the offending party, with show of sincerity, affect prayer? Prayer is in the place of self-examination, and does no good under such circumstances. The world must do away with all punishment, all censure, ere it can dispense one iota of libel on God. It must seek to analyze the whole position, and be silent, if not right, about God.

Predestination misleads to the narrowest bigotry, and the most absurd conclusions. Have you a will? If not, why leave any thing by testament, preceding death? You are self-condemned already, if you do not do it as becomes a righteous rational mind, and the dignity of reason. Can you exercise your intelligence? Is not that free agency? Your mind may be perverted by drunkenness, that involves your reason, or by ignorance, that cannot analyze it, by error, that distorts it, or physical inability, that invalidates it. It is your bounden duty to master all this.

If you are unfortunately any of the degraded characters by predestination, you are surely punished by predestination. If you understood principles, and their vindication, you would drop that word predestination, the property of bigotry, foolish fanaticism and despotism.

But you ask, is man created equal? No. He may have a rickety constitution, and die speedily. Whose fault was this? Not the victim's, surely, yet do not libel God, who created no positive evil. With him, "whatever is, is right."

Does predestination teach to sit passively in the quagmire of despondency, and exert not the plainest dictates of reason, the best action of correction? For what purpose was mind, of what use is reason? Their functions are to vanquish all these illusions. Look at the horrid iniquities of all peculiar faiths. How shall we ever extricate the votaries, devotees, victims of their errors of faith, vices? Mind and reason have to show them what religion is. Of what use is that tuition without the action? The bible libels God about predestination.

Do you refuse the influence of mind, science and genius, by the proscribing predestination? You deprecated the inequality of man, and it is their union that enables man to reach the dignity of his creation. Fire arms and gunpowder have more equalized man, as one of the best results of mind in its creative genius. Other weapons of war will insure that equality to that degree that peace instead of war will be the universal object, as now more beneficial. But are such evils the means, in the face of conservative principles, even by the very best of them violated.

What makes man? Mind. How then can predestination subsist? When the good of all is legitimately secured, then predestination is dissolved in free agency of mind under the creative circumstances of Providence. If predestination be true, why preach?

Why do you teach people to think? To do right? Does that not involve the principle of free agency of mind, that renders the world what it is, so far as man is concerned? The whole world is bound to acknowledge it. Predestination indicates senility or puerility, if not imbecility, the doctrine of superstition that proves mind in its leading strings, its dotage of errors.

The people have to act up to the demands of mind, ere the world is revolutionized. Though we are yet in the infancy of knowledge, we know enough to correct the world and extricate it from the toils of superstition and its prolific family of errors, if we do justice to mind. When predestination is mentioned, profound analysis will eject it as unworthy of mind, that has to secure to itself purity of taste and correctness of judgment. Individuals and local differences, bespeak a greater strength of the whole. The southern clime has what the north cannot produce, but all is a harmonious whole rightly estimated.

The predestinarians tie themselves up every way, and make a long circuit about evanescent trifles. They disregard the noblest attribute of mind, free agency, under the circumstances of creation that are the most certain and proper position, like liberty, that is the most dignified and freest under appropriate laws and order, otherwise it is licentiousness that ruins by excess. But great objections are made, that equality does not prevail in the world. How in the present constitution of the universe, could there be uniform equality among the people? Who would serve? The organization of the whole must be changed, to conform to man's opinions. God has consulted his own wisdom, and acted accordingly. Tell us no more of predestination which bespeaks the fetters of mind by immutable proscription, when the world gives such substantial proofs of mind's capacity for action and its progressive execution.

The world has progressed, by the efforts of mind; that demonstrates the whole absurdity of predestination. The faculties of mind prove most conclusively, that predestination, confined to the limits of the bible, is as absurd as that book. Conscience proves man's free agency. The very position of the world, in regard to accountability, decides against predestination.

All are created so as to prove, on maturity, the efforts of free agency of mind. What can you make out of predestination? That is a base absurdity, and exposes the authors as the most ignorant libelers of Deity. All things of creation are right, however divergent man is made by peculiar education. Mind must not read God under peculiar opinions, prejudices of peculiar worship, reflecting the damnable bigotry of the priestocracy, under any of its peculiar ways, but the right way, as God acted. The rational mind, under rational education, comprehending universal relations, only can perceive the right way. More injury has been done the world, on this basis, than enough. Let us give the greatest latitude to mind's actions and improvement, under the farthest legitimate comprehension, the circumstances of its creation.

The very position of mind proves free agency, in the accountability, the means used. Admit that the people are not equal in intellect, &c.; but does that argue that we can justly appreciate all the balance of their case, that may give a correspondent equilibrium of advantages? What mortal can gainsay this? The very circumstances of man's existence on earth pre-supposes him to be a moral free agent, under the circumstances of his creation. Some say, as to predestination, God certainly did know who would be saved or lost, according to the bible. Then the bible doctrine consigns the balance to a localized eternal punishment.

What sort of morals does this bible inculcate? Has it any morals, when the writers knew they violated principles and mind, and affected familiarity with Deity, who can only be approached that way by immortals? Creation implies preservation, correspondent on merits personal. What superior claims then have one to exclusive privileges and prerogatives, when all have rights that cannot be abrogated? No bible can set them aside. All future positions may be modified, but cannot be annihilated. The doctrine of election is miserable. What is predestination, and all such stuff?

Is the world to maintain the authors of such monsters? God created man on this earth for beneficent purposes. Under those circumstances, he could not particularize an isolated little obscure nation, who evidently disproved such guardianship, evinced in the bible, time after time, by their bondage, and especially by the loss of the ten tribes!

If any thing were wanting to the proof, their miserable civil wars, and horrible piracies, to the bloodiest extinction of the tenderest age and sex, of the rightful possessors of the soil, give it to overflowing. To give a colorable picture for the last, the priestocracy manufacture the false pretences of Noah, and the incest of Lot.

The bible, and its want of morals, will break down all its pretenders. There is great objection by the predestinarians of the great differences of individuals in life, as to fortune, gifts of mind, &c.

This is getting into the first causes of things that are out of the reach of finite mind. Man elevates himself by the means, that elicit his best exertions.

Mind, under the circumstances of creation on this earth, must resign itself to all the results of nature, only doing its highest appreciable duty. Be it then supposed misery or real happiness, under such action it will all come out right in the end, that is referable to the immutable laws of God, that regulates mutable animal nature. Perfect happiness is not created for this earth. What avail contentions about the First Cause of all things, as God's foreknowledge? The first causes of things cannot be resolved by mortals, without involving man's finite mind. We may trace all more or less to them, and there leave them, in due confidence, with God. The chemist analyzes water into oxygen and hydrogen. What are the first elements of these? God knows. God is not an autocrat, but a constitutional president of his universe—a perfect standard to the world for its example. The free moral agency proves that. Predestination carried out is a libel on God, founded on the bible, the disgraceful father of God's libels. The murderer can say that God, not he, did the crime, and therefore he is not accountable. If God predestinates for one, he does for all, murders, as all acts. Can there be worse morals? Is God the author of evil? God is a universal providence, and as such, no select, especial people, Jew or gentile, could have been entertained by God. There are a great many things we must leave to God, without committing ourselves. What do you want with such bible, Mr. Predestinarian? We cannot speculate about God's supreme government. We need not fear that the bible writers would dip into the grand hidden mysteries of nature by revelation or inspiration. They are very clear of that, as they have tied themselves altogether in a dilemma. What mortal ever looked into the first causes of things? The bible writers are not able to analyze such; that science has done since and exposed them. Metaphysical, biblical pretences will not do in a system of facts. Providence universal enables moral free agency of mind under the circumstances of creation, to carry out his almighty decrees. This excludes guardian angels, genii, demons, and meets the requisitions in the circle of certain and almighty providences. As God is immutable, the general laws of nature have been, are, and will be immutable. Particular providences are desirable to bible of tradition men, which will yield the proper view of moral free agency of mind under the circumstances of creation. God's conservative principles vindicate him in vindicating themselves.

Bible metaphysics must be dispensed with.

Does not the world look to mind and reason in all improvements? What is moral free agency for? Will predestination justify the priestocracy for all their blunders, the bible, as to all one's deeds? A great progress will have been accomplished in civilization when the powers of mind, rightly directed, shall have their legitimate scope and influence. Then the thousand and one perversions of mind, bound to the car of superstition, will be legitimately directed to the right channel, and we shall have no more of the absurd pretensions of obsolete despotisms. The principles that vindicate themselves represent the especial providence of God; how much more I do not know. They humanize, civilize, and refine the world.

Has God created evil? This seems perfectly incompatible with a perfect Creator. Is not all such that appears so attended with matters that evoke man's genius for protection, to attain a greater and a more exalted good, a stimulus that leads on invention from necessity, and a new triumph from its success.

Mind is to master the elements of creation; and what seem the most appalling difficulties eventuate in the most illustrious benefits. Man's perversion of mind renders abuse an evil to himself; but then that is an abuse of the mental faculties, under the guidance of free moral agency. If all creation move on in one harmonious whole, where is the evil? If man relax his duty, and suffer by imbecilities of his own creation, conservative principles are only vindicated. Mind negatives its own good, and that negative is evil. Did God ever establish a positive evil? What mind can impiously and recklessly pretend to such assertion?

What one thing can be denounced out of this world? There is fire. Can that form one iota? In cold we are warmed, in cooking we are supported, and by appropriate uses the world participates in the benefits of this element. If a man choose to insert his finger into the blaze, conservative principles only vindicate themselves.

What is done by means of supreme providence through mind, legitimately though? With the bible gentry mind is nothing, a cypher; but miracles, prophecy and revelation, all impossibilities, non-entities, demonstrated, are everything,—the very reverse of truth, and disgrace of mind.

The idea of God giving laws to predestinated persons, who affect the faith in the scriptures, is most preposterous for them! Why should God punish them, whom he had already predetermined to be lost? Can mind, after thousands of years of the deepest reading of God's scriptures, his works by philosophical science, now assume to be critic, when yet it is not a competent analyst?

Any slight view of Deity's character might betray an attempt at impeachment, which of course, so far from being just, that God cannot in any wise whatever be assailed by his creation, but causes the converse, that forever impeaches the assertor, and disgraces him as a libeler. Our analysis of creation is very finite, and consequently very defective, but the correction ever rests with us to better amendment, and that corrective is progressive improvement. The pretensions and assumptions of man too often betray the attempt to libel Deity, which attempt forever recoils on himself.

All the pretensions of predestination are odious, as they subvert the noblest principles of mind, and libel God.

What a miserable vassal doctrine that keeps up false notions in the world, through peculiar bibles, about the essential difference in mankind, the basest libel of the God of the universe. No one can conceive of the miserable sophistries of monopoly and usurpation. The world has been full of such.

Rational truth is not to be heard in the category of peculiar faith and predestination. They were made for another circle. All sophists are Jesuits, and all peculiar bible advocates are necessarily so. You talk of predestination, when the world is for the best exertions of mind and body.

You speak of God's creations of evil, as if you were familiar with all the comprehensive facts of creation. Now the self-vindication of conservative principles takes precedence forever; and though in their rectification paramount laws take precedence, how is that an evil that holds minor obligations in abeyance to all supreme?

Know the order. Necessity, is this the great law of self-preservation, that reigns paramount in nature. Do not, then, idolize your own errors worse than the pagan idolists, whom you have complained of. There is no positive, absolute evil. The effects of peculiar education prove mind's moral free agency, that must necessarily be in relation to its circumstances of creation to be invariably understood. But from this position smatterers and quibblers wish to escape, to be free from all restraints; a thing impossible in the inherent laws of matter, intrinsic or relative to its circle. Man must do all for himself by the best light of rational mind, and then all else will follow. Religion teaches self-reliance to the highest point of independence. Who is to blame for tyrants' acts and crimes? The people are responsible in a great measure. Mind is subservient, and the world must place all things beyond that contingency. If we knew positively that the soul was immortal, moral free agency and reason had not been disinterested, hence bible sophistry and priestocracy effrontery.

Evils prove the perversion of mind endowed with free agency, relative to the circumstances of creation.

God never created evils, or an evil genius as an agent. The free agency of mind is most clear, and it has to elaborate its own chief good on its merits, to correct the evils of its peculiar perversions.

What is the substitute of mind, as all the peculiar bibles are incompetent, as untrue, to meet the mind question? Your liturgy reminds God of his duty, and invokes miracles he does not do! God's grace is universal as mind and creation, and identified with, and to be elicited, by the highest and most worthy rationality. You libel God to invoke the aid of peculiar faith ministry; an indirect action, that cannot be done directly.

The noblest blessing of mind is its free agency. That indicates no sudden change of heart, but a rational change of mind for man, individually and mass. Talk no more of evils and predestination, but conquer all practicable difficulties by mind, most rational.

The state of the world is for two things at least; to create rational mind, and means for independence of God's noblest work, mind—the embodiment of soul—that it may create its own future elastic exaltation.

Use providence of mind in the wilderness, ocean; avoidance of perverted mind's evils, as war.

Avoid antagonism, conflict with the world. How? By avoiding all contingencies, uniformly recurring to principles, counteracting by the best intellectual ability all that mind, under the circumstances, should and can do. Rational education is the best pilot to free agency of mind.

RATIONAL EDUCATION, THE PROPER CULTURE OF RATIONAL MIND.

Education from tradition, that is not amenable to rational deductions, becomes peculiar, teaches mind innumerable errors, biased opinions, perverted conclusions, ruinous habits, sectarian interests, and bigoted prejudices, without number and redress, and none but enlightened reason can recall mankind to correction, and that on clear knowledge of their particular errors.

There is a rational government in education, reaction of mind's light resting on the pure gifts of mind, conservative of good, otherwise of latent evil, as separate and distinct as the national blessings of American independence, and piracy on the high seas.

Women as well as men, should have colleges and highest seminaries, to enlarge the comprehensive capacity of mind, but all must ever be only on rational principles.

What mean those lofty piles of architecture, those churches, monuments of superstition? Are these the means of peculiar education? Are they to hand down to mind the mementos of false faith and doctrines, too contemptible for it to think of, much less embrace?

Why not turn into the legitimate channels of right use, their costs, for mental improvement? Make them colleges for science and mind's fortification in true thought, the greatest adoration that ever was paid to Deity.

Let all the world be truly benefited by the excessive outlays, and let excesses go to their legitimate use in science, her rewards and best attainments. Let there be no absurd and wicked teachings of wicked cunning men, to distract, divide, and embitter the world in false and superstitious notions, and all absurd copyings of degraded fables, received with implicit faith by infatuated multitudes, sharing the folly and crime of mind perverted in all parts of the world, usurping and monopolizing by the self-interest of impostors and blasphemers, what is really the duty and sincere actions of mind.

Let not missionaries carry back to Asia, absurd and corrupt copyings of their own base and degraded superstitions, but let America, that gave the brightest light of liberty to the world, in the mighty principles of free government, give to those lost sons of superstition and tyranny, the bible of rational mind for rational and true religion. She is not only the lovely bride of annexation on her own continent for governmental institutions, but she should be ready to respond to all other main divisions in the mighty bonds of religious brotherhood, the only proper union of the rational world.

This position will meet the requirements of mankind, of the world, that is a miserable abject slave and menial servant to ignorance and its consequences, but when master tyrannical, purse-proud and overbearing, yet a correct agent only when taught its duty by mind, that enlightened, can counteract it errors and frailties. Of what value is the education of bigotry and peculiar faith? Educate men of mind in all the power of science by the money appropriated for such gorgeous buildings, and as living temples, let them go into the dark points of the earth, and teach the principles of science pure and unadulterated to unsophisticated minds, to create the right germs of thought and give right scope to action.

All nations becoming civilized in the right way, will be glad to receive all such, to scatter the mists of minds and their errors, superstition and ignominy.

If the facts were now told by the missionaries from Asia, they might say that the priests there are laughing at the idea of their people being taught only copies of their own superstitions, allied to absolutism, to render church and state omnipotent over the people, the true sovereigns, mere abject subjects. Discoveries aid discoveries, as points for future advances. Science begets science, philosophy evolves philosophy. Due respect to the lights of mind will put down superstition, negative the quagmires of the dark ages, proscribe all absurd bigotry, and declare religion as proper duty of man to man and God. To secure all this, education is indispensable, and that must not be peculiar.

SOCIETY AND ITS RIGHTS.

Society depends on natural laws and principles, that premise the most legitimate taste, and comprehensive results.

She teaches the counteracting influence of benignant education, and directs talents to their legitimate theatre, the whole earth.

She regards the misdirection of talents as a public evil, and sustains the best practical effects of rationality.

She reminds of the loss of invaluable time for years, by putting apprentices under poor and incompetent workmen and poor trades, at which hardly bread can be made.

She directs and rewards the industrial pursuits of the nations of the world.

The man of energy, repentant of misdirected ambition, that seeks a triumph over the world's rights, under her fostering care may aspire to the noblest vindications of science and philosophy.

The assassinations brought about by revenge, resulting from the vices of the powerful, who injure with seeming impunity, the other by the weakness of the sufferer, may be directed into channels where no such disastrous cause should be given, as legal justice will avenge the injuries of the humblest citizens.

The best cultivated mind of education in science and philosophy, understanding the proper rights of society best promoted by religion, can understand all the varied forms of superstition, the works of priestocracies, whose collusion has been imposed on this world, the age of mind.

The world will never be right, till a conservative revolution in society, establishes the equity of principles.

ANALYSIS OF PRINCIPLES.

A correct education gives the best introduction to this position. Without it, prejudice forms one of the worst barriers to cheat the mind of its rights, and God of his attributes. The sooner we reach the analysis of principles, the better will be the performance of our duty, the more certain our safety in all the present and future prosperity.

Principles must be understood, not mystified at all, to secure the best legitimate good to society and all, who, truly religious, have nothing to fear, and less to object, but all to hope when undeniable principles are advanced. All wise men should know before they start, that all is safe, to insure their safety.

Religion exists in its elements, not in the advances of opinions, but in the Author of its principles, who is recognised in the organization of creation.

Religion only exists with its principles, that must emanate from the Supreme, innate for all objects of preservation, ever since mind was formed—then no after action is wise at all, hence messiahship, that is subsequent to creation of the universe and mind, cannot begin to meet the question, admitting the necessity for it, which there is not in the universal presidency of the Almighty, therefore cannot be recognised by wise or sane minds.

All such are a horrible and impious blasphemy and imposition, can be nothing less than a gross libel in the region of reason.

The organization of Creation is an eternal witness, that the Almighty rules supreme in his unity, and annihilates every bible of tradition as basely false.

Natural and simple, then, are the provisions, secure and lasting are the foundations, that look only to God.

Men of principles and true science must see that no individual, no community, can exist, without fundamental good as premised.

For what were the universe and its conservative principles instituted, but for mind, the mighty free agent of the Creator? Shall libelers of God enslave it for their degraded purposes? Past history of Jews and Gentiles, show this too plainly.

Rational religion is certain to rational minds for its principles, as mathematical science, that no botches can affect.

This subject is unmistakable to all of every civilized nation, and dwells despite of all other peculiar faiths, ready to be called up by reason for ever.

Who will pervert these principles for a worldly gain?

All must see the effect of personal responsibility in the presumption of tampering with the rights and destinies of mind, that may constitute the brightest emanation for immortality, or the severest curse in result.

Who will forfeit the first, or incur the penalty of the last? Who is not already condemned in the attempt?

The intellectual and moral state of the present age, demands a proper exposition and vindication of every principle affecting the liberty of the individual, the prosperity of the state, and the future happiness of all.

Monotheism can never be passive in such matters, inculcating on all, as she does, a just adoration, by eternal principles of their Almighty Author, the one great and Living God; she requires their essential and indispensable adoption.

The obvious means for conservative light of reason, are those furnished at the mint, that wise, good, and true citizens, recognise mind-cultivation, rational and universal education, right education of mind, as pure, and innocent as God made it in attainable capacity, education in His other gifts, the principles of science and philosophy, to render unto mind her purest, brightest attributes, the worthiest faculties.

Such education is for wisdom, and not mere learning.

Wisdom to learn, to know, to act, to apply the richest treasures of mind to the right place, at the right time, and all appropriate means of observation and science.

Then, the days of tradition, uncertain, vague, and fanatical, subject to a thousand aspects moulded in the hands of demagogues, flatterers for favors, treacherous to the dear people, whose souls they affect to love, and blasphemous to the eternal, with her varied impositions, oral or written, from the authors to the publishers, will be rightly numbered.

Then, the tyrants of society, cannot seek to bind and coerce its members by all the unhallowed acts of fiendish ambition, when bigotry will be silenced, and may not wantonly add again her now expiring siren delusions.

Without a right education, we see in every age, the incapacity of man for uniform, and adequate protection, for society in general.

Assuredly the elements of this evil are not in creation, where libelous ignorance in her impudent assurance, places so much of self-exoneration, as that implies mind's faulty analysis, and impeaches the attributes of Deity, but in the faulty action of mind and its dereliction, to meet the legitimate demands made upon it, to correct the evils of the world.

Most of the case, is in this position—now instead of complaints, murmurs, repinings, and libels, arouse to correct action, mind of mankind.

Thy earthly province is a high and plastic destiny.

To whom shall we refer? Assuredly to expanded and expansive minds, those, all of them, whose interest it is to enlarge the capacity of a liberal and expanded freedom.

Can sound mind ever refer to any species of absolutism, that betrays its character in increasing the difficulties, instead of the blessings of society? On what basis of ethics is the logic founded? We can never refer to those wedded to preconceived opinions, and invested in their professions to abjure all progress of mind.

Little should we avail, if we estimate by intimate knowledge of human nature and character, if we sought this idle and worthless futility.

This analysis enables us then to receive with caution, any of the extraordinary gifts of absolutism.

From the first idea of innocence to the extremest depths of iniquity and crime, man's education involves analogous results.

This mighty principle was instilled for the wisest purposes. Its good tendency, as conservative, is by God's benefit; its bad impulse is by man's perversion, and is his penalty.

See the difficulty of change from its fixed character of first impressions; how immense is that of revolution for reformation in most worthy objects, even through this avenue rightly directed, and how deplorable the difficulty of what is wrong from bias perversion! Many has been the effort to overcome this difficulty, but light of each mind itself, the rightful guardian, presents the only solution. Start right to end safely.

Man is a being created for the most beneficent purposes, as God made him subject to the modification of circumstances and education.

The world's light cannot be too bright to benefit man.

The primary benefit is to ensue on true refined education and its elements.

Such a state of things will teach that man's professions are to be with his God, his actions with man, and only to be estimated by his proper conduct through life; hence, man becomes a rational religionist.

With the most expansive freedom, freemen ought to have the best education of science, else they may, if licentious, abuse it the worse, and degeneration be thus effected.

The substantial true education of mind at the right time, is to overcome the amount of sophistry, the order of the day with lawyers, preachers, doctors, and a great part of the world.

That education goes to the depths of philosophy as high as mind can reach.

It commends the giving all minds proper training to the legitimate extent, a life-fund to grapple with all life's difficulties.

Such means will expel feudal times, and false social views, and secure the best attainable refined social and moral intellectual state, requisite for man's good.

It is the leadership of mind that must be in the mastery of principles.

Coercive leaders, military and civil, are only to be respected in their places, to attain pure and unadulterated views of duty and proper security, for their just performance.

All intelligent inquiring minds will admit that the world needs education, varied as its subjects, to extricate mankind from the horrible vassalage of peculiar faith error, that infects with moral contagion, all within the sphere of the terrible malign influence.

Of the billions of past rational existences, how many would have received the truth of mind, if they had had the means of appreciating it?

Then all this matter is one of suitable education.

How desirable and absolutely necessary is it for parents, friends and guardians, to guarantee a proper education for the child, as wise citizens render the state prosperous, and themselves worthy of it.

Education alone enables us to handle principles properly, to attain to that sublime equality, fraternity and liberty, that bless the world.

What is education? Simply the evolution of mind, on science, and philosophy; all else is its counterfeit.

Education that comprehends the master funds of mind, correctly carried out, protects us against, and defends us from the world's wiles, all peculiar faiths that positively emanate from peculiar education.

The education of the world does not impart at first to children's youthful minds the right appreciation, consequently right habits are not fixed from depraved tastes and vitiated results.

Nations, as the world, suffer, as both are concerned.

Education must expose all the machinery that embraced ghosts, witches, and hob-goblins, as the exploded pious or impious frauds of superstitious notions of barbarian ages, existing only in the brains of dreamers or designers.

It is important to use rational education, that introduces science and philosophy, with practical good sense, else the possession misleads, as a thing hurtful among a host of blessings.

She tells us the folly and idleness of animal excitement prevailing in churches, the hardened folly of bigotry, the wanton stupidity of faith sophistry, all of which have some peculiar custom and government.

Wise legislators will find the palaces of education cheaper than cabins for jails.

Education of right principles is not a forced power, but is ever characterized with the loveliest qualities.

She promotes no ambition misdirected, but causes pride to be rightly directed, as a high-minded sentiment divested of variety.

She rightly cultivates the moral tone and mind of society, and produces the best fund for life-enjoyment.

She will teach peculiar faith to be so heinous as to inspire true men with the resolve, that it shall be the least if not last of mind's trammels, if practicable.

She directs to the improvement of the natural acquisition of religion, that her constituents can best appreciate.

With her, religion will not be forced as in a hot-house.

The analysis of mind cultivated by liberal education will rightly tell us, that the doctrine of non-resistance cannot apply to any part of mankind by education. Non-resistance can only invite aggression, insult, or injury; then the quickest way is to give the delinquent aggressors their penalty; as the hotter the war, the sooner peace with principles.

But by resistance is meant defence, not the wrong of aggression, that does not involve the lofty character of self-preservation, ever founded on principles.

There are many things deeply injurious to feelings, and they may crush the best characters, unless proper resentment be made; therefore appropriate penalty may be best for both parties.

It may make the evil the least, and correct most evils at the right point. A wise precaution is the best in all things of life.

It is not non-resistance, but justice for evil and oppression. Mind seeks and obtains its best protection by principles, that are the only thing that show the mathematical precision of science, the correct action of morals.

Doubtlessly, the time is approaching when cognizance of principles will be so exact that the highest state of correction of the world will at once arise, from their inherent potency and reflection of light; hence an enlightened public opinion is now the highest sovereign arbiter of all earthly standards and tribunals. But it can never be so elevated as long as obsolete bibles of tradition are the tyrannizers of society, and force faith, whether destitute of principle and reason or not.

Now if there were any cause of difference of feeling, &c., between persons, two or more, they should face each other calmly and state their grievances; and if insult be the motive, then a more consistent and proper resentment can be shown, and only that justified by the highest soul-principles; or a better correction can be most promptly and properly had on the same basis, to lay aside erroneous impressions and unsound prejudices, and promote a better state of society.

Act, then, in this paramount matter, manly and candidly, openly and above board at once, and decide permanently, and in the best honor and peace.

The best action of society is that of knowledge, that results from science, which the key of rational education, the proper discipline of mind, reveals and inspires.

Then all rational minds must be satisfied that the world can only be in her happiness, greatness and prosperity by the flourishing state of rational education, through philosophical science.

The people, the rational minds of the world, must institute a new era for their best position.

By the blessings of science-education subsequent ages will put into the shade much of past improvements and discoveries.

Optics have advanced astronomy. When we reach something that will advance optics, and that displayed by subsequent improvements, then we may begin to appreciate who God is, his mighty funds, and the agency of mind that he created.

Science and philosophy, the more accurately known, cause us to approach more accurately to God, in the advance and progress of mind.

Without the characteristic traits of universe-education, the only safe one, the vortex of speculation is one that destroys myriads that do not depend on their own manly action, best, matured, and honest judgment, but unfortunately depend on the verdant, unnatural, and often interested advice of incompetent men, who will most stupidly shrink from all gentlemanly responsibility, and sadly leave the advised to deplore the brazen ignorance and baseness of the advisers.

Judgment is the quintessence, the concentration of the senses after all said and done, and that can be only wisely matured on the basis of conservative principles.

How much of advice is tendered, and how little of it is disinterested or good! Then think and act judiciously for all and thyself.

There is hardly one original genius—one genius thinker or analyzer in millions; then mankind should distrust all equivocal pretensions.

Without education we are subject to the contingency of chance, not the uniform protection of science and philosophy, in our daily transactions, and liable to be swindled by every unprincipled man that comes about us.

How, otherwise, is the ignorance of the world to be overcome?

You have an organized brain, a rational means to learn, and it must be so applied in all subjects, religion especially.

By this fund we obtain a definite system, a meaning and point in every thing we aim at, to counteract all perverted advice.

Carry on your schools to propagate good sense, and all that it commands, as the moment they go down liberty dies.

All minds are confirmed by habits of education, and rarely change; then have that most rational.

Liberty itself is to be directed by the lights of rational education, that it run not into communism nor licentiousness, that all belong to absolutism or sophistry.

All ought to protect the altar of their country, and elicit the worth of science, for the blessing of the human race, that should not feel the despotism of monarchy, nor of the majority.

A rational education enables us best to invoke justice, wisdom, honor, and virtue, to counteract the disgusting and low intrigues of cunning and vice, that may supplant the good by wretched policy and criminal design.

The world, in its honest ignorance and exemption from suspicion of all the horrors of tyranny, will suffer self-delusion and public imposition.

Parents are accountable to their children for the correct instruction imparted, as the conduct of the child reflects on the parents.

Children should, then, be firmly accountable to such parents.

Society and states should hold all parents reasonably accountable for correct instruction, and themselves responsible for all the facilities necessary, as they do for all the penalties inflicted.

It is better to build up systems and means of liberal, rational education, than those of punishment.

What a pity it is that parents do not resist, candidly and firmly, the downward tendency and progress, that may ruin their children.

They indulge their children unwisely, and see them first perish from abuse of morals.

They undertake to govern their children, and fall below their esteem.

Children have all the faculties of copying the example of their parents.

Those parents are bound to give them a correct copy of principles, but, alas, that copy is a miserable failure.

Do not cow or pet children; they, as all, must beware of the first step, and should be invariably governed rationally.

Education, that teaches cultivation of independent thought, presents what religion requires. What do predestination, baptism, Romanism, protestantism, Greekism, or any other church division or peculiar faith, present to mind, but the errors of peculiar education?

Youth, sincerely installed in the light of science of mind's principles, learns that liberty of conscience that shows respect to mind, and proves true sincerity in religion. Such minds must best honor truth and honesty. All people have it, where mind exists, Jew or gentile, Christian or pagan, if they would cultitivate its right precepts.

Ignorance of mind, and its false government of passions, particularly the most common, as avarice and ambition, make bigots and fanatics.

Education of the world, with the whole of the reasoning faculties, elicits the mind-fund for thought, enjoyment, independence, action, and progress, and goes for sound, pure, and loftiest religion.

No impressions can be made, then, by all the designs of superstition, however politic and visionary.

Proscription by names, under the mask of pure religion, will not avail, to commit outrages on mind thus fortified. Education must teach so as to satisfy the inquiring mind, explaining and solving all essential things.

Mind is truly to be consulted in the solution of all the questions of this life, for all time; not in one but in all centuries. States hold all their citizens accountable to them, then they are responsible for correct morals and their rational education, that mind throughout the world may be adequately supplied by all the means and facilities of its happiness. Rational education teaches mind to think for itself, and that correctly, whereas peculiar education causes it to obey the peculiar opinions of others. The first is of God, the last of man.

Let the millions annually expended, for the last, be devoted to the first, then mind would be enlightened, and the world happier, because better. Peculiar education is promotive of peculiar prejudices. Educational purposes may embrace monumental, to celebrate the victories of the illustrious dead, in this utilitarian age.

But what will compare with one brilliant mind, superbly and rationally educated? Monuments, erected to worth and merit, may promote that very education. We must make due allowances for those schooled in their peculiar education, and wedded to all its institutions, that look at the customs of their fathers.

Education should be so rational as to quarry out a proper amount of action for life. The world is so cut up by sectarianism, secret societies, &c., and the difficulties of mere public opinion are so intricate, that rational education must preside, to obviate all such.

All must have no education of peculiar, but rational views. Rational instruction and education are the conservatives of the globe, while ignorance is the father of errors. Poor persons are too much excluded from mind improvement, by the dictation of the priestocracy—they are in its leading strings, as its minions.

What are the curses of false education and faith? The cultivation of mind by rational education has brought the age far beyond what any bibles of Moses or his priest-fathers could do. Only think of the inhibition, virtually, by all interdiction, of any change of such scriptures, on a proper appreciation of astronomical science so recklessly declared in those works.

The science of education is entitled a regular commission, embracing all practical subjects, as agriculture, customs, examples, laws, and opinions, that must be referred to the Almighty standard, by rational education.

The moderns have the best educational means, general protection of laws, all the means of mind concentrated to one great object. Educate, to eschew peculiar faith and narrow views. He who depends on mere professional school-knowledge will be humbugged, deceived badly—miserably. Such is not for advancing, but for failure. But the odious distinction of poor and rich can be well obviated, as far as practical, in the order of universal brotherhood; we can see the good effect of a liberal rational education. The superfluities of the rich, the ornaments of houses of extravagant order, had better be devoted for the benefit of the poor's education.

All that is essentially necessary for mind is universal, and commenced when mind was created. Rational education must do its duty by it. The support of public schools cannot be too extensively entertained.

The race of mankind is compelled, in self-defence, to seek the best legitimate rational education. If bibles of tradition stand in the way, expel them. Rational education corrects the dogmas of the schools, causing them to be permanently right, and never to be reversed! Who, in his innocence, does not believe that the world is nearer right and truth-telling, justice doing without peculiar education? Rational education is to enable us to see, and correct all fallacies, practicable.

It will put away all the trammels of the schools, and will finally produce the desirable and necessary social regeneration. The obligation conferred, renders mind capable of leaving society no worse than found. The great rational means of improvement are all educational; but letters are not the absolute means, however we deplore their absence in any one case, while common sense is to be elicited by things and subjects. Ignorance is preferable to error. It is hard to find out at this time any part so unenlightened, that proper sense may not be elicited. Peculiar education differs over the world, while rational is universally uniform in principles.

The first imparts faith in devils, angels, witches, ghosts, miracles, prophecies, and mysteries peculiarly revealed. What is more absurd, or untruthful?

Once the clergy had nearly the sole means of education; moulding public sentiment; forcing it by inquisition; perverting it by sophistry; silencing it by poisons and dungeons, by the blackest imposition, the most detestable superstition. Who can wonder at the world-wide perversions? There was but one edition of clerical imposition, in Rome, Greece, Egypt, India and Asia, the whole world. When and where will all this stop? When rational education of the world gets the mastery, and mind asserts its full rights!

Rational education can correct all the malign effects of peculiar education, if the world will do right.

Phrenology physical presents relative exception to responsibility, unless the organs be rightly cultivated; hence, a liberal and just education is expedient. The state owes this. Some people do not appreciate the good effects, the necessary obligations of a liberal education, that enables us to depend on our own judgment, and the best facts of the case. Those do not understand the subject they affect to decide on.

The world cannot possess too much of independence; and as to success in various professions and employments, the novice has to ask some preliminary questions, as if the village or social circle is free or is rented out, belongs to a few dictators? Every essential that promotes rational education, must be sacredly protected. What is done with all the school funds? Are they properly used, well employed by the head men, for the benefit of the poor? Are they added to, instead of diminished? The world needs a proper system of rational education. All cultivated circles ought to have libraries of most select and valuable books, debating societies, if practicable; all the approved substantial means.

A respect to the best feeling on this subject bespeaks the effort for justice. This subject should be fully comprehended, by the inherent right of self-protection. The object should be to obtain a true republican education, that will prepare youth to do justice to mind in all the various relations of country, science, and religion.

REASON IS THE PROPER STANDARD OF TRUTH AND RELIGION.

Deity underwrites his own character by creation, organization and conservation of the universe: if man contradicts this position, he perverts his own mind, libels God, and impeaches himself, as degraded, wilfully ignorant and blind.

Such views, involving treachery and high treason of the Divine Being, and his imbecility for the past and future protection of all creation, recoils in fearful retribution on the authors of such obliquity of mind, more disgraceful than heathen mythology, all of which has been swept away from enlightened minds.

In the name of God's attributes, purity that admits nothing impure in his character, of omniscience that recognises sin, the negative of good, and expels it as evil, and of omnipotence that faithfully interdicts all such, mind, enlightened, pure, and free from vassalage of malign influences, looking properly at the essential attributes, must protest forever, with suitable reverence of Deity, the eternal Creator.

There can be no peculiar nor original creation of an evil genius, when the sinful genius of mind perverted already, resulting necessarily on its free agency in circumstances of a world of earthly character, exists enough.

Such original, peculiar, particular creation, would be a contradiction and absurd analysis of Deity's essential attributes.

Deity has created the greatest good, whose negative is evil, as destruction is the negative of conservation, and his perfect character extracts the greatest good out of the supposed greatest evils, the most worthy example of mind to imitate.

The more perfect the mind, the more valid is its good.. Such mind enlightens the world, and blesses it by the best fruits.

Any particular malign creation of an evil genius would imply the same perversion of mind of the Creator, and necessarily impeaches his character.

Ignorant and self-willed, avaricious and ambitious mind, wilfully and knowingly blind, self-important, degraded in affectation to render mind vassal, libeling the Creator at every step, a botch in conception, has to retract its horrible conception, and must retreat to its demoralized and corrupt insignificancy.

Mind's errors do not arise from pure thoughts, and liberal world-wide views of creation's nature and obligations.

God's inspirations rest on noble thoughts, and his best blessings fructify such candid exposition of truth and reason.

No: the errors that assail the world in bitterness, degradation and wo, arise by corruption of mind, self-delusion, wilful blindness and imbecility.

The day that proclaims faith peculiar of any character especially to advance the pretended divine rights of kings and churchmen, is to be admitted without reason, witnesses in its broad light an admission of reckless tyranny and guilty sophistry, the like of which cannot be conceived.

Enlightened reason informs and teaches us the value of conservative principles, for which past legends substituted the pretences of angels, a mere fiction in the brain of dreamers.

Angels were as necessary to uphold the solar systems of the universe, as to convey messages for Deity to its rational beings in the enjoyment and exercise of mind, the only medium of communication.

The universe was created on a system of conservative principles, and must be governed by them in the physical, moral and religious elements. Who but reason prostrated the fell purposes of idolatry and superstition, with their attendant sophistry, forever misleading the people and seducing their noblest exertions?

She can rear the best fabric that mind can institute.

Who but she befriends man in his best capacity, when he is duly aroused to give best heed to her counsel, and improve by cultivation to the best talents?

Can impudent peculiar faith stand in the presence of reason when she rebels against her tribunal?

Every trustworthy, truthful man is aided by his reason, whose justice and protection he feels conscientiously bound to invoke forever to sustain himself, posterity and world. Who asks for or can obtain better security?

This foundation is sure to eternity, resting on eternal principles as old as time, durable as creation, conservative as God's attributes.

Reason can never adopt traditions of any character or profession as truthful and worthy of honest faith, no matter of what part of the world, marred by feudalism and vassalage, imposed on ignorant credulity, scarred and disfigured by legends, fables, bigotry and fanaticism, wars for centuries to master the world by its absolutism, blurred by iniquitous inquisitions of fiendish character, proscriptions of the sovereign rights of the people revolting to man's dignity and purity, all to deceive and procure the absolute sway of government of man on earth, to procure wealth, aggrandisement, vainglory and power at man's expense, blood, deepest suffering and mind's ignominy. Already has mental reformation rescued mind from much of the thraldom of superstition. Then came correct constitutional government, that blazed high with a brilliant and increasing light, irradiating religious freedom by severance of church and state, and lastly comes benignant reason to crown the triumph of mind.

We all seek universal protection from imposition and its treachery; what standard can be universal for protection but that of reason?

The highest practicable authority of man, past or present, is only tradition, oral or written, and can be only rightly estimated by the only tribunal possible in the nature of creation to mind, and that tribunal is, or ought to be, must be, reason.

What else is it? All of mortals, all that they say and do, no matter how wise supposed, must be tested at this tribunal. It is not what men say or can say, but what mind, enlightened mind, whose best result is reason, says.

Man records all his tradition, his bibles or scriptures, but mind recognises them all, otherwise man would be worse off than brutes that have instinct, which he has not, but in whose place an Almighty has vouchsafed the glorious attributes of reason.

As it is, mind has the noblest faculty and function of appreciating its God, and that it performs through reason, not faith, unless in abeyance to reason.

Undoubted proof establishes facts to our satisfaction.

Pre-eminent caution and care are expedient, when the humbugging world has abounded so much in fabulous, imperfect and deceptive story, especially that miscalled sacred, that might be named desecrated.

Much of such pretended history, if not to be discarded, is doubtful, of no value, only as satisfactorily established.

Ordinary facts, in the regular course of nature, require this course. The world humbugs itself about faith—worse than others humbug it. It adopts bibles of tradition, when they are certainly proved the veriest fables. No wonder priestocracy clearly war on reason, that satisfies a wondering people, that the extraordinary phenomena exist only in their brain, like the phantasmagoria of psychology, as when analyzed are only ordinary phenomena, seen in the distorted rays of credulity, misnamed faith.

This is the decision of incontrovertible principle.

When we come up to the capacity of enlightened minds we reach the sublime dignity of reason, that peculiar faith-sophists the world over, during all its ages, have hated with a deadly hate, as adverse to all their nefarious humbugs.

So far from knowing the facts of reason, they have not begun to appreciate the essential elements of mind.

The majority of all rational men believe in no tradition independent of reason, as they most conscientiously consider all such as most corrupt decisions and impositions, especially all that fear the light, considering hierarchy in its numerous forms of power, yet they feel a necessity of a better state of things, to obtain which they are disposed to act with all reasonable men.

What is to be done? How can they be reconciled?

Tortures and ostracism, inquisitions and proscriptions, are not competent for enforcement.

You may preach all the doctrines that tradition can give, all the dogmas that men can invent, you cannot reach their case by all sophistry that proclaims "every knee shall bow." All peculiar faith doctrines cannot reach them.

These people, the majority of this union and the world, must not be left out, when justified by reason, rational mind.

God fortunately has not left them out, though peculiar faith doctrine people have separated themselves from them, and proclaimed with an unholy proscription, their damnation for unbelief, not of the truth, but of their peculiar faith.

The first are devoted to the God of the universe, and cannot take the peculiar gods of the latter.

Libel of a system that meets their case, the case of all, every case, is not the emanation of mind seeking light.

The immortality-aspiring mind universally feels its own innate character, if unadulterated to be rational, and has a bullion that it cannot knowingly surrender for dross—but seeks the pure mint-coin and rejects the counterfeit, too plain for any by reason to mistake.

This faith tested true by reason, that dignifies because it humanizes the world, needs no means as some peculiar faiths had for thousands of years, of which very children should be ashamed for the debasement of mind, and the enslavement of the world.

Freemen are now looking aright manfully and fearlessly to the one sublime and mighty temple inherent in mind, that points all true adorers to the Almighty through the true way of reason.

Nations of the earth, hasten to enjoy this holy and worthy offering, one that your posterity will thank you for most gratefully.

Reason may be smothered by all the crimes of the anti-God, that fanaticism can invent, and all the errors that idolatry can adopt, still, all these, time her mighty handmaid, will supersede.

Down then, with all the absurdities of bible tradition devoid of reason and truth, as unsafe and ruinous to the world. Let reason assume her tribunal in rational mind, wisely governing the sons of men in duty to man and God. God holds all accountable to reason and her attributes, not peculiar faith and her dogmas.

Argue as others may against this, plead all they choose about peculiar faith, they are self-condemned by their impeachable sophistry, themselves wound up in abundant contradictions, and their best hopes in fragments scattered to naught and dust. All the strongholds of peculiar faith are yielded by time as false and untenable, exposed under the conviction of reason.

In science of government, national or self, individuals can exercise thought, mind, reason, as they ought in all science of life, all vital matters, but in religion that requires the most of thought, as the true science of life and life's thoughts of mind, the pretence is set up that its function is too sacred for any but sacred persons, so corruptly called, by sycophants, traducers of their own sacred rights; God above all, can only take cognisance!

Wise, patriotic, and philanthropic statesmen, should see to it, that reason have her sway for the good of mankind, and not have an enlightened public opinion to be elaborated by corrupt division of the spoils, all to be extracted from the dear people.

All such men are compelled to cast away, of course, all that does not accord with enlightened, rational, and true principles.

Why do you send your gospel to the Pagans, who have been nurtured in similar and analogous condition of faith? But theirs is not a rational faith! Now are you caught. Your faith in any messiahship, is as unreasonable and blasphemous.

How, then, are you infallible, if they are in error? When you opened the door to your peculiar faith, you gave a wholesale passport to all peculiar faiths.

You have not the first principles essential to proselyte, worthy of mind.

Do not stupidly persevere after being caught in full, on your conceited and adopted position against reason.

Self-sufficient mortal, learn true wisdom from wisdom's only source, reason, that alone gives you safety in true principles that constitute the bible of mind, the only safety.

Do not adopt reason in full, in all but one point, faith, and leave out that the most important.

Be a freeman, and have all the benefits of a freeman's mind.

When reason is a guide, let her be a moral, intellectual, and religious one—to be the safest. She cannot be rightfully divested of any essentials of these.

At the present age of the world, the best position from the advanced state of knowledge must be rational. If ever the ignorance of the age permitted the dictatorship of masters, that assuredly is not the case now, when mind can think by science that expands on reason.

Mind cannot be getting worse with the better lights progressing, as it must, if open to light, get more enlightened. This is a true axiom, and what is true of individual, must be so of aggregate, as the age means that.

Then do not trammel rational mind in free discussions about religion, the most rational of all subjects.

Men of matured age tell me, that they have been actually afraid of the free discussion of this subject of religion, so plausible are the arguments against the bible of tradition, as if that was the only tenure of morals and religion!

Do they think that the world will come to an end as to morals and religion, when such bibles end, as they will? The vices of the peculiar bibles will destroy all of them. But is not all this social tyranny, the vassalage of mind, while some fear from previous influence of others' opinions, that their minds may be set wrong, and have an improper bias, when their minds may be at fault, and not the bible! How do they get all those ideas? From any sound rational disinterested mind?

But who is the author of religion, God or the bible?

If God be the author of religion, as Creator, then any bible that denies him exclusive omnipotent unity therein, is adverse to the purity of both.

The bible of Judaism gives mind up to priestocracy, and is not the representative of God, because no principle of God clashes with another principle, but this bible clashes with many principles that mind recognises. All bibles, built thereon, are equally at fault.

The God of this universe is the author of religion, a universal constituent of rational mind, as he is the author of innate faculties of the mind, the rightful beneficiary, through conservative principles, without which religion could not exist, as it could have no Being at all.

Therefore, these men ought to read and study a bible of mind, to free their souls from blasphemous error.

Are men afraid to look at the bible of mind? They, then, are afraid to look at truth, for one is essentially the same as the other.

When their declaration is analyzed, they have been told that the risk of such investigation is irremediable, and their souls are lost, because the parley is temptation irresistible.

Was there ever infatuation so absurd, sophistry so evil? Rational minds must hail the time for free rational discussion of religion, as more important than of government; as superstition, the certain substitute, controls not only man's government, but mind, by absolutism, in this world, and renders it unhappy, by the most awful forebodings, in the next. It makes mind vassal on earth, and soul a slave in the future; awes both, and fixes them in a channel, assuming to be universal dictator, now and forever.

This very day millions are afraid to reason on religion, the very thing that their minds need most of all.

They have not shown themselves competent, with sufficient virtue and principles enough, to carry out the behests of God Almighty, as displayed in mind and conscience.

They stupidly embrace an obsolete bible, that stings them with its foul embrace, and causes their murder throughout the world, which it had outraged as long as it could hold it in absolute abeyance.

This might answer for slaves of the dark ages of the world, but not for freemen of this century.

Our excellent institutions require better things of religion, that promises to be our blessings, not our curse.

Either reject the decision as wrong, or admit the tribunal.

Less cannot be expected of freemen. Slaves are forced out of reason to carry out, by want of principle, endless incongruities that arise in all systems of peculiar faith.

In all their sermons and writings what do preachers invoke all the time, by every word spoken, but reason or sophistry? If they receive peculiar faith they are obliged to use sophistry in her train.

Rational religion only gives full audience to reason.

Sophistry is most disgraceful; then reason must be appealed to.

Faith is only to be trusted through reason, else the mind of the individual adopting may be fanatically savage, or to be pitied for its dependence, or want of the powers of discernment.

When mind rejects faith of reason, the God of reason rejects mind's wayward thoughts.

We need proof that reason must be satisfied with.

In relation to any tradition without analysis into the supposed facts of the case, or the character of the testimony, or of the analogy to which we are compelled necessarily to resort by the very nature of the case, what is such belief or faith worth?

It is not entitled to the name of faith, as it is mere credulity; and is that worth anything?

If our faith be adopted independent of reason we have a foundation that has no reason.

We are the beneficiaries, and if irrational, are the losers; therefore we have to inquire into the motives and influences of others, probably subservient to measures that they cannot scan, and pretences that they cannot truthfully uphold.

All the time that the advocates of any peculiar doctrine preach, though reason is invoked in the exercise of mind, their position absurdly excludes both from their faith.

They can never expect to have the proper respect of either.

Where is the end to all their trifling absurdity?

Mankind universally admit reason's proper guidance in all things submitted to mind, except in the part that suits some few! Then the exception excludes the rational part.

Enlightened justice, tempered with benevolence, allows all due respect to others' faith, with the highest respect for their immortal souls; at the same time they must submit the question to enlightened reason, or they may fail, miserably fail, in the reality for which they have ardently and sincerely striven.

Religious sentiments are inherent, but are diversified by circumstances of education, schemes of hierarchy, mythology, that unbiased reason alone can rectify.

All assumptions must be expelled when based on no reason, yet affecting the mysteries of nature.

All wise laws should be paramount and obeyed, therefore those of creation are the documents of a Supreme Immortal God, who must be adored exclusively as supreme.

The laws of God are written in an enlightened conscience, that none but uncultivated minds can reject, thereby declaring themselves of brutal character, and a miserable mass for corruption and perversion.

The pure and great minds of the world must counteract all these bad results, that lead to the worst of crimes, of perjury, &c.

It is not faith but reason that looks at the nature of things.

No hope or faith can stand a moment but on reasonable premises.

Reason and conscience enlightened are the best codes for life-rights, and if priests and preachers reject them for peculiar faith credulity, they are the enemies of mankind.

Moral ethics are intellectual and rational, and demand reason.

Much of the world has been so situated that it is vassal to the other part, depending on their leading, too often their misleading.

Then our interpretation of truth must rest on the facts of the case, never on sophistry or its appearance, that must be an abomination in the sight of the God of the universe.

If you throw away reason in faith you are condemned, because you throw away principles.

If you adopt peculiar faith you are condemned already by reason.

Thus reason decides, that if faith be not true, that she is a curse procured from the toils of superstition of some kind, nurtured in the bosom of absolutism, base and deceptive, to circumvent the people for sinister purposes of power, ambition, and crime.

What power on earth can decide but reason as to genuine faith, leaving to God to test all men's minds therein.

What is the great standard of morals for the whole world? Religion, that rests on truth and honesty.

One part of the world excludes the faith-ethics of all the others; what, then, is the great regulator but reason for ever, and that in all parts?

Exclude her, and we are at the mercy of tyrants and imbeciles, unprincipled demagogues of all kinds.

We need the great balance-wheel of mind, regulated by reason in all things, but especially in vital and rational religion.

As all time-pieces are referred to the revolution of the earth in its imaginary axis for a standard, all analogy decides that rational mind should have reason as the umpire universally for faith in morals.

This is the only means to do justice to religion on this earth. All just policy demands it.

Who has the true faith? They who have rational mind and philosophical reason on their side, of the highest order and most magnificent character of its exercise.

But this produces skepticism, atheism!

The very reverse is proved and demonstrated, as it disproves all such.

The order and harmony of the universe are the most irrefutable evidence of its organization and regulation, directed by one great architect, who orders and maintains in beautiful and perfect system exhaustless millions of worlds and systems of worlds, without the least confusion or disorder.

Two witnesses are enough to testify for justice if they be trustworthy, but here are innumerable witnesses of one God, whereas all other pretensions have mere forms of inorganic, decaying matter.

Well may the question be asked, who were the testimony, but those all interested in all things, companions of deceivers, traitors, and perjurers.

Every sermon that is preached, if rightly analyzed, should make the sound mind assured of its own faith in one living God.

A faithist never reasons; what sort of animal is he?

He affects to reason till you get him to faith, then he stumbles or bolts.

What is the world but a mixture of herds, flocks, swarms of the mass vulgar multitude, led by the bold, reckless, and intriguing?

So far is the bible of tradition from being the word and revelation of the God of the universe, that the comprehension of the reason cannot be there obtained.

That would prove man's perfection in mind, the very reverse of which is fact, as all wise men know.

Theology can only be considered a system of principles by reason, not of faith only, as reason sanctions.

We must look always at reason before faith.

When you speak of your faith, that you do not approach by reason, and assail the doctrines of other peculiar faiths, reason is the only weapon, and that you have just deprived yourself the use of; your position fixes you side by side with Mormons, Mahometans and Pagans, all of whom, have only faith-doctrines.

You have but one way to rid yourself of your own quagmire, and that is by reason.

Reason improves our nature, and best elicits the happiness of mankind, as she relies on the certain principles that must be exercised most certainly.

Reason bespeaks the only weapon of toleration and freedom.

All systems of peculiar faith, tried under the standard of reason, that all minds obey, must come to an end

Any system repugnant to reason must be repugnant to truth; and all such become pretences, false and corrupt, begetting lusts of dominion, ambition, &c., and clash with each other, contrary to God's principles.

Once the ancients instituted oracles and auguries, in which the ignorant confided, as their feelings were ingrafted into superstition and its rites. This was one of the peculiar faiths.

From that time flourished the inquisition, the proscription of depraved public opinion. The people did not perceive that all the systems of erring man, must be under the domain of reason, that establishes the true religion.

Is spiritualization a power to destroy reason?

Who have this pretence on this earth but impostors?

Death, inherent to all animal creation, shuts out the dead from the living, and kills all bibles of tradition. Surely our reason is better than the improbable testimony of interested persons, distant centuries past in the dark ages of the world, under the various fascinations and temptations of promises and self-delusions.

All intelligent freemen must place reason above faith to make truth. Reason analyzes nature by the enlightened senses, to reach the proper actions of life, to secure propriety by experience and knowledge. But this is a world-wide and world-age subject, and mind must traverse the universe, ere it can appreciate the God of Nature.

All rational beings are concerned in the good actions of rational mind, to preserve universal order in society.

Theological subjects are judged of by the world, through feelings, not reason. How deficient are the first!

We are told of faith by the ignorant world, and on analysis, find that feelings dictate it! What have feelings to do with reason?

Reason, not faith, then can alone appreciate justice, and reaches in process of time, by operation of mind on mind, the true position. Who wants a system of faith that he cannot prove to be generally approved, or right intrinsically? Thou shouldst not do, what thou cannot justify. What is your faith worth, if built on a vague, instead of an accurate investigation?

Of what use is science to faith, that depends on things unseen? Of the same use as the mariner's compass. The mariner is in the wide trackless ocean, and without that, is destitute of the true means of safety. If expert, he may regard some of the bodies of the universe to know how to steer. He seeks any way, a regulator standard.

Reason has universal empire over faith, peculiar or general: this is an axiom. What comes to our notice or cognizance, is through reason. Whatever looks to reason, ever approaches the nearest to the safest position for mind and man.

ANALYSIS OF RATIONAL RELIGION.—MONOTHEISM, OR THE RELIGION OF PRINCIPLES.

DEITY'S best light of mind, the elements of rational religion or Monotheism, that is, rational faith and confidence in the First Great Cause, soul and ruler supreme of the universe, and consistent actions and works in conformity thereto, are universal to rational minds in all ages and countries.

This principle cannot be effaced with all practicable evil designs and mind's perversions, by all the machinery of inquisition and proscription, as it is the inculcation of an innate and indestructible faculty, one identified with our being, the living monitor of living rational minds.

Its right directions have been perverted to man's worst purposes and passions, and most iniquitous uses.

Superstition, with her thousand false pretences and sophisticated darkness of mind, may retard, idolatry may mar, false faith torture and pretend to counterfeit it, still the work of the Almighty progresses to the triumph of his agents, mind, time and matter, a beautiful union of the powers of a true trinity, such that faith and reason recognise as self-evident. Rational religion wins the best and only affections of enlightened man's best aspirations, bows to the tribunal of the God of reason, in the sublimity of silence and conviction, encircles in the most exalted manner, mind's best interests and highest, purest honors, enhances its true character, its best confidence, and consequently must embrace its candid faith.

Rational religion ennobles man's nature at the right time, by a correct cultivation, comprehends most certainly all mankind in one mighty universal brotherhood, united on proper principles, in conflict and antagonism with no creed that mind and reason recognise; at war with no sect, for none of hers can exist, protective of all races, however diversified, bound in general interest of love proportionate to the wants of mind, universal in its application and salvation of all worthy rational beings, requiring them as free rational agents, to elicit their own safety; marked with no peculiarity as an imposture of man and a libel on Deity, and competent to secure under its benign and sufficient influence, universal good feeling, the loftiest benevolence and permanent peace.

Monotheism comprehends works consistent with such noble and exalted faith, and all consistent with reason, exalts itself most liberally and justly the more the test of reason applies to it, and is only in existence by reason's legitimate authority. She delights universally sincere minds, that wish to find the rational true way without doubt. She pilots mind through the mazes, labyrinths and mysteries of peculiar faith, through the trying scenes of life with the eye of true faith on the refulgent light of the universe author, directing the best deeds of conscience, an independent, not a vassal monitor, to do the bidding of a freeman, not of a tyrant and the part of a coward, and waits with the exaltation of true hope on the dying mortal, and assures such of the most honorable close of life. She does the amplest justice to this world, and gives thereby the best earnest for the universe. But rational religion affords no pleasure to any that seek to profit by perverted worldly speculation, under her banner assuming the province of mind, as they are utterly condemned for acts inconsistent with her pure teachings, when they bring the trade of conscience before God's tribunal.

The diffusion of rational religion omnipresent in all rational minds, whose elements are possessed by all as deed of creation-gift, has been operating in the world all the time, through the inspiration of God on mind in general; but impostors of peculiar faiths have assumed all the praise from the one eternal Supreme and only sovereign, whose omniscience and purity do not license any to speculate as better than the world. God himself is judge of all minds, and has only yielded any capital of his divine attributes to any creature, as part of the universal share.

The diffusion of rational religion over the wide world, suits the pure and essential wants of mind, and no means under any pretences, should arrest them to secular power and aggrandizement in God's republic.

Ignorant fanatics have run wild, blinded by peculiar faith, reckless of universal good, for their selfish purposes. All this must be counteracted by universal philanthropy and patriotism, as all rational beings are deeply interested on the score of social duties, benefits and morals that embrace them.

Rational religion is embraced in man's whole duty to God, its best adoption and practice towards man, and including all imperative bounden obligations to both; nor can these matters be mistook by those adopting "honesty as the best policy."

All this duty elicits the best and full code of ethics written, embracing the elements from the foundation, essential in all societies, not after, but forethought and action.

All these are to be recognised by enlightened reason and truth, and all should be embraced in faithful action, the correct decision on which rests with a tribunal universally, no respector of persons, only as they are respectors of Deity's conservative principles.

Every mind, then, having its rationality and innate faculties, a part of its constituency, must have its religion, which should be rational religion only, to be acceptable before the rational God of rational beings, to honor him alone, ruler omnipotent.

All rational religion includes all spiritual religion practicable and genuine, that is legitimate. But spiritual peculiar faith cannot embrace rational religion, which condemns all such at once as wrong in conception, irreverent and impious in the sight of purity.

In all peculiar, that is, spurious faith, sophistry and bigotry must necessarily all the time supersede truth and liberal justice, with all possessed of fundamental principles.

It is impossible for peculiar faith to render this universe moral, pure, or happy.

There is wanting the great central sun, reason, that balances all creation, that is to expel all the elements of superstition, and correct the conscience so much misdirected and misled.

Rational religion has to give due credit to all the great cardinal virtues of man's nature endowed by the author of all that is estimable, which is preferable to mere peculiar faith that vaunts beyond correct action, that implies correct principles. All these when rightly directed to enact necessarily religious action, must be caused by the necessary possession of mind's innate faculties.

If rational religion do not have her true government of mind, then come superstition, idolatry and man-worship, from which emanates a multitude of spurious systems, the more degenerate as mind is enslaved by ignorance, and debased by superstition.

All such systems are eventually overturned by reason illustrated by philosophical science, God's best vicegerents, else they overturn the mind debased and degraded, below reason.

The conflicts of opinions among the various sects of peculiar faith, ever antagonistical, prevent a consistent invocation at the same time, by direct antagonism to the throne of grace, and evince a reflection on the mind that wars on reason, that reflects on the age of reform, and presents countless obstacles to man's true happiness.

Be our faith what reason adjudges, our actions are the rule to be judged by.

Monotheism, or pure rational religion, will carry mind into the full and diversified theatre of its action, words, and thoughts, its social and intellectual existence—to enlarge its virtues and direct its moral and religious culture—to improve its reason, on its present relations—and its loftiest duties to its Creator.

The sublime character of Monotheism, or rational religion, cannot permit it to be of any peculiar phalanx, sect, denomination, or creed, or claim community of interest less than what is general and universal; a world-wide position, high as the holy centre of the universe, and as deep as mind's needs, to recognise standard wisdom and illustrious reason.

In the blessing of humanity to the minutest fibre of sensibility, she is ever alive, and must feel most deeply as she is duly interested, with a mother's care and a daughter's obligation, invoking the purest sympathy of soul. Sensibly alive to the wants of the whole human sphere, surely she is identified with all that pertains to the Creator's benediction.

She seeks ever to be enlightened by the effulgent rays of intellect, itself enlightened and liberalized at the fountains of philosophical science, securing satisfaction at the shrine of genius and of all mental light, whose mighty universal blessings of inspiration and revelation she solemnly and in good faith invokes.

Her faith is that of reason, arrayed in all the glories of mind and in the beauties of truth, fit offering for Deity, and worthy of freedom of mind; a pure resident of earth, best prepared for immortality, man's holy guardian, God's universally acknowledged minister.

However the flights of fancy may please, and the visions of imagination may delight the superficial, yet it is only the sublime truths of reason that enlighten, instruct, and amend her most substantial institutions.

Her interest-share in the fund of eternity is equal and deep to her constituency, and she never sacrifices with wanton sacrilege at the shrine of vanity, ambition, power, vain-glory of the world, the jewel-gifts of mind, the freedom of conscience. She is ever aroused to extricate mind from the bigotry of all ages, the mazes of feudal vassalage, and the intricacies of insidious sophistry, bedecking superstition in her thousand varieties of false colors.

On this sublime and majestic greatness of mind's happiness, she knows no worldly interest of sordid lucre, obeys no ambition but that of pure faith, though thousands of train-band clans may dictate, and thousands of bibles of tradition of miracles, prophecies, and mysteries, may affect to teach her, to forego the nuptials of her holy wedlock.

She hails with exultation of innocence the rational decrees of divine inspiration, appropriately recognised through God's works, and the mighty behests of wisdom, legitimately deduced in divine legislation by mind and reason.

She feels at all times the profound impressions of the character of the Creative Architect, reflected in the radiant magnificence of the universe, the sublimity of the exact machinery displayed in the splendid elements of the solar systems, and the crowning magnificence of the whole.

She is fain to credit on such testimony, too clear to be mistaken, too mighty to be eclipsed, too majestic not to be appreciated, the universality of God's power and munificence, his exalted wisdom, illustrious, matchless genius, and surpassing beneficence.

The great First Cause is self-proclaimed by the magnificent revelations of his sublime creation, organization, and conservation, the holy trinity, that mind must fathom in its glorious inspirations.

The worth and intrinsic character of rational religion asks for no contracted solutions, only liberal elucidation. With a reverence of Deity, most profound in conception and duty, she looks upon the Supreme Spirit as no localized and peculiar exclusive, that delights in the bloody strife; producing no incongruity of two belligerents addressing the holy throne of grace, mercy, love, justice, peace, and omniscience, at one and the same time, reciprocally hostile.

But she refers to correct actions, as the available prayers of the whole world, at one and the same time, that premise conservative principles never antagonistic, that accompanied the creation of the universe, as the best, because the only inherent means of preservation.

What those are, let wise philosophy and intelligent goodness point out.

Rational religion does not leave us to mere contingency, but to uniform and certain protection of God, the author over all existence, who best saw and gave what was needed; and she peacefully and in sublime silence does this, after all the systems of peculiar faith have been promulgated, that still leave mankind suffering from cardinal causes of injury.

She stands pre-eminently modest in her majesty, over all systems of faith, triumphantly looking to the pure sources of mind, adorable by reason, on which she waits to insure safety with God.

Well might she exclaim, O man, thou art an incongruity, conforming thy views too often to thy devoted interests!

Tragical, ever, must be thy systems, where principles consistent with such virtues as mentioned, do not abound.

Beset thou the fetters of ignorance, superstition ever assuming the mantle of religion, and passions, vile passions that enslave; instead of promoting the destructive fascinations, exalt all the legitimate powers that bless and uphold thee.

Rational religion will cause thee to exert thy potency, annihilate the dire tendency of passions that destroy thee, and the best interest of the world, by due and legitimate restraint.

She will teach thee to learn to govern them and thyself with all practical wisdom, that declares beforehand her laudable position.

Rational religion introduces mind to a consistent and immutable God, not an incongruous deity, a partial inquisitor, or a peculiar avenger to any particular nation on their enemies, who are the rest of the world, the whole human race, begetting the faith of a butchering fanaticism, but a suitable director of mind's energies in the best sphere of understanding, reason, and peace, justice, knowledge, and wisdom, to the grand organic principles of our existence and happiness.

Religion, to be becoming to the loftiest civilization, pure and satisfactory, a competent and universal teacher to all, must permanently bless them, as far as the capacity of our nature and mind will allow, with exceeding wisdom, deep and lucid knowledge, practical and available, with justice in her acts, mercy in her love, and humility in her deportment before the God of existence.

Religion is universal in her attributes, teaching the principles of the universe and the creation of God.

She does not minister to measures of men, and substitute any being's opinions, absurdly expressed in bibles of tradition, exploded, when written most absurdly for God's principles, as all spurious and counterfeit faiths invariably do, but she renders unto God his exclusive rights, and obeys implicitly him as the only sovereign.

Rational religion is strictly monotheism, its right term, and rests on the right truths of mind, presenting the religion of principles in regard to God and man, and can present no other, in her wisest guardianship of her charge, man—composed of mind and body—through all the vicissitudes of life; the best evidence that principles command and direct her difficulties.

The tribunal is ever constant, as principle is ever needed to the faculty of a religious conscience.

The highest emanation of mind is rational religion, seen in man's varied best actions, and is restricted to no forms, but diffuses itself over all the brighter points of character, correcting and amending it, with faithful and wise watchfulness.

Religion has no system but what is rational, as all things of appreciation can only be recognised on this earth, but through rational mind that must be faithful in duty.

The more rational the practice of religion is, the more correct it certainly must be, else faith would run wild into superstition.

Banished for ever must be that senseless and stupid doctrine, that reference for authority must be made to any book of tradition, and no where else, as the primary originator of thoughts, independent of mind the only beneficiary.

The mind that asserts such rubbish, is senseless, stupid, and corrupt in analysis, its mighty shield, and is unworthy of its own glorious attributes, is guilty of treachery to its inherent rights, just reversing all reason and justice, twin sisters in religion.

The rational religionist can triumphantly refer the professors of deluded faith all over the globe, to the general conflict of all such doctrines, and in answer, all such, without exception, will have to resort to devices and sophistries, ever to be discarded, and absolutely refused, as incompetent to explain this inextricable solution.

All such professors have ignominously to assail the first principles of the great first cause, to uphold the pretences of faith, short of reason, forgetful of fundamental principles, that absolutely preserve the universe in equilibrium, mind in balance, truth in justice, and all just relations in harmony and order, exposing necessarily the reverse degrading and demoralizing.

But rational religion invokes the best and wisest reason of enlightened minds, with implied honesty, truth and judgment, to reach the pure solution, the simple facts for man's best good, ever discarding all sophistry, and excluding its likeness even.

All mankind cannot fail to see then on the appeal of calm reason, that the best and only consistent faith, rests on a Universal Creator, who harmonizes all in order and union—that the Creator depends on no mortal representative, or created being, a desecration of the noblest virtue of Deity, that must must arouse an impiety and ruinous evils in its train, and bring shame to modesty.

The sublime qualities of true religion, require us to be certain then, and reject all trifles, and mind must refer for ever with earnest affection to monotheism, as the saving faith.

Rational religion existed from the creation throughout time, declares God's fore knowledge in omniscience, and his perfection in his omnipotence and omnipresence, and expresses through monotheism, the exposition of whose rational principles have been already moderately under consideration, as establishing the only sound faith, the only one possible, practicable, practical, working as the purest, most elevated, and suited to immortal souls.

If no more, its practical and valuable benefits, excluding the darkest evils of society, and the foulest blots on its foibles and crimes, establish its universal claim to reverent respect, the highest obligation for its recognition and the essential security for its adoption. She can look upon all others as usurpers, and monopolists, counterfeit and spurious.

Under her auspices, reverence for Deity finds a proper resting place, as she can never tolerate the grossest impiety that assails his attributes, and characterizes God too gross and sensual for refined humanity, much less for an immaculate, almighty, all-wise, and all-in-all.

Under her holy influence, mind exalts its majesty, reason its dignity, soul its worth, and mankind vindicate their character and obtain their position.

Under her guidance, woman attains her loveliness, preserves her chastity, and honors her station.

Rational religion can know no individual being greater than mind, unless it be its author; knows no koran, vedas, books of Menu, nor bibles of miracles, prophecies or mysteries; of course is under superior obligations to God, to reject all messiahs, Christs, and all the machinery of superstition, as anti-God.

Proper, rational, and free religion, causes mankind to yield reverence, just and due, to God alone.

It is the homage of mind, the adoration of soul, the tribute of the universe to its Supreme Ruler.

All other than such religion is idolatry, impiety, superstition, imposition, untrue faith and pretence, man-worship.

Try all this proposition by mind, in its best condition from reason, and the response is affirmative all the time.

What is rational religion but all practical correct deportment to God and man, the proper objects?

If that religion gives not the true essentials in name and attributes, most respectful, the full question is at once decided against its purity and supremacy.

The Supreme alone, commands supreme control of mind in time, and soul in eternity, for his supreme excellence in creation, organization and conservation.

Whoso detracts from God's exclusive attributes, the same detracts from himself, and is self-impeached before the highest of all tribunals.

Reason, enlightened reason, for ever employed by mind, most rational, to secure the proper decisions for mind, declares the code of rational religion, that is for ever the true one, and can be spiritualized to the greatest practicable extent by all the genuine and legitimate bursts of enthusiasm, that the fullest confidence in true titles, from the only liege lord, can inspire towards the eternal centre of this moral universe, upheld by truth and philosophy, encircling the altar of the soul in the immediate and constant presence of its immortal author.

An ennobling justice yields most candidly, that this light enters the soul of all in degree, to their final benefit proportionately, if properly fostered.

The principles of religion interest all, as true and undoubted.

The first do interest every mind to their full possession, as its innate constituency can never be satisfied with less, and must exclude the balance.

It cannot be otherwise, from the true history of mind's organization.

All the acts then of a mind, enlightened on these principles of its duty, must be consistent with this position, for none without due investigation, can settle this or any other important question otherwise.

Practical monotheism is essential to rational vitality.

All rational beings are practical monotheists, if they ever think rightly, while, but few that advocate other doctrines, are truly and consistently sincere, beyond the purviews of circumscribed limits, that are always too restrictive to "do the greatest good to the greatest number."

It is impossible for this doctrine to clash with God's, as it is one and the same.

God cannot be against himself, and no sound mind that reviews the organization of the universe in its admirable relations, can advocate atheism, that implies no great first cause, a matter that is evidently self-contradictory and suicidal; much less, can any one consistently take up polytheism, or plurality of gods, the advocacy of a partial first cause. A first great cause, of whom still exists, and renders all the other god-heads subordinate and secondary to even his conservative principles, and the doctrine odious, contemptible and futile, no matter what may be the combination, what the pretensions, whether there be trinities, hundreds, thousands, or millions in one, the absurdity is all the greater, the mythology nothing less unsatisfactory and childish. Ages that could invent the superstition of polytheism, were also as culpable in the stupidity of atheism; both are the descendants of barbarous ignorance, maintained by vulgar bigotry.

Deism cannot be cold-minded merely to speculate and criticise, and not correct, and supersede by a better faith and practice, as such bald doctrine advances but little in leaving the minds of the world uncared for and unprotected. The human mind, without due exertion, makes but little advance on its destined course.

All minds are interested in the highest cultivation of their rational and just faith, and a secure and satisfactory protection, that will accompany all from birth to death, giving all the best instruction for life, all the best consolation at death, all the most elevated hope for the future.

The system of religion that the world wants must be all that mind and reason are justly entitled to; is that on which all classes and conditions of life can lean in all its parts, with no peculiarity and partiality in time or place as to faith, that only wakes up thousands of years after creation has been blessed by its all-wise and almighty Creator, who has been, and will be by necessity and right, the protector of all the universe, in all time and eternity. All peculiar faiths, then, are idle and absurd dreams, the most visionary.

All such stupid doctrines of God's want of fore-knowledge ever show man's miserable pretensions, impositions and defects. They will be duly silenced.

Let man's libel of God shame man into silence.

No matter what the names of religious systems are, unless their innate principles are universally in mind at creation, commencing with and centring in the Creator, the protection is mockery, the means illusory, and declare the vain aspirations of mortality. Monotheism, rational religion, that satisfies all minds of the existence and universal worth of God Almighty, of the existence of his potency by principles, and of the necessity of their right inculcation in mind, to raise man to his God, and equalize him with himself, his legitimate position no more nor less, to cause him to do and know the extent of his rightful duty, all having a foundation not to be shaken, is the only mighty power that can unite mind in the whole world to one great unity of purpose and amity of feeling—the universal sympathy of soul—in the universal dispensation of mind's Creator.

Ever faithful is this doctrine to her high commands, to the position of being always right, and amenable to the only rightful tribunal known face to face with mind, in the audience of reason.

All other doctrines than that of monotheism that teaches the existence and attributes of God Almighty, a God possessed of all his exclusive attributes, eternally clash with each other, and the whole present in their fall to earth the fragments of a broken brotherhood.

One system of this kind is arrayed against that of others, all having unreal pretensions, except in the minds of those thinking themselves interested, and all having mortals for heads, or in lieu of principles.

Much of the time of its existence the world has been trifled with by self-delusion or corruption, ignorance and crime, sordid and selfish lucre, or unmanly fear, while polytheism, the monster of fiction in man's mystified forms, arises, and spreads her unhallowed hands over the fairest possessions of the globe—exhausting every device of fraud, every fiction of sophistry, tyrannizing over mind, and claiming for the benefits of her clergy and priesthood a large portion of man's property, rights and dominion, implicit and blind faith, a permanent fund for mind's oppression, interweaving herself in all the fastnesses of power of government, all the rabidly excited passions, especially of ambition and avarice, and all the mighty influences of mind perverted from its own mastery to inglorious and ignoble servitude, the degrading servitude of pretenders corrupted and debased, the wilful contriver of its own chains, and seducer of the happiness of others, recklessly ignorant of the mighty advantages that it betrays.

Defeated and prostrated in her vain attempts at full imposition over mind, into which floods of light are constantly pouring by the progressive improvement of the world, the forms of theocracy are changed, and a moderate but unique plurality of gods is left, giving mind of the world still in the peculiar power of the priesthood, rendering mind more or less vassal to an odious servitude, and separating it from its own just claims, its direct claims on God, the exclusive owner.

Corruption floods the world with her horrid train under all the disguises, but the eyes of mind are not opened, till deeds the worst are perpetrated, as wars for centuries have followed their conflicting faiths, with all the furious passions of maddened ambition and insatiate avarice, exciting the sword of the Crusader and scimetar of him of the Crescent, to master continents and thereby secure the conquering faith, ending in deadly hatred after the lapse of many hundreds of years. So far from conquering, some have divided and subdivided into ominous fragments; the Greek church separates from the Roman, affecting catholic power of the world, still yielding those remains of power to the protestant, a successful rival. The dissenter separates from the state-church man, all against each other. The loss of millions of lives tells a fearful tale for the doctrine of peculiar faith. Peculiar faith begets clans over the face of the earth, makes the church members side with their clique in profession, and opens the widest door to corrupt fanaticism, alienating the best feelings of the human bosom, a part of the human family from the balance.

Churchocracy constitutes a corrupt combination, that, if universal as to its sects, would erect a standard of peculiar faith, and proscribe much of the world not of them.

What a fine thing that churchocracy is not universal as to the various sects, as a serious retaliation might ensue on the part of some of the world.

Each sect now erects its own inquisition, assumes to be infallible and orthodox, condemns the balance to perdition—proscribes where it cannot prescribe. All are infallible, no matter how pagan and superstitious any system, with a sacred mystery for the talisman, and with no tribunal of reason and no correction of justice to make any right, whilst the proper faith could have saved mind from such fiendish deeds.

You cannot touch these bigots, for that moment they throw before their professions an enormous shield, on which is inscribed peculiar faith, their castle.

Gracious God! are these to be the lights of the world, who have struck out the most brilliant of all lights from mind, that of reason?

The world needs not opinion unenlightened to create a reign of universal terror and despotism, but that foundation-principle that creates and organizes conservation to society, and all honor to God, the supreme.

But then the priesthoods of the various systems could never be interested in yielding to the people, to mind, their rights, nor become of the people.

It is the nature of assumed power to increase the assumption, never to acquiesce in the rights of others, till the sword cuts the gordian knot.

When rational religion is displaced, superstition and tyranny act. Religion, the elements of which, are implanted by God in rational mind, must be made most rational. Monotheism then, from wise observation and satisfaction in a universe of God's power and rights, beautifully commands us to give unto God, all that are his! This is the wisest command imperative to mind, and is most just.

Strict obedience is the best source of happiness on earth and in life, and gives the best earnest for the future.

Here then the mother can well compose her feelings, inward fears and horrors at the dread of a wild waste, when she asks for herself, her husband, and her beloved children, all their fullest protection, she finds that protection of her whole household from the source of all mercy and perfection in the true course of nature taught.

But where had been all, had not that very protection been accorded the universe by its perfect Creator, before the conception of their bodies?

O, man, think of thy weakness! do not increase it by thy presumption. Aid a just cause in expelling all the base libels of thy all-wise Almighty God.

The mother, the tenderest of all rational beings, has her best and purest power aided by God alone, to whom she can address her devotions, and direct those of her household, all united in adoration to him, with the most comprehensive duty to mind. But she will not expect, if wise, to change an immaculate God.

She must change herself to pure feelings and thoughts, and purer actions, her most impressive prayers that change and elevate human nature to God that rules it. Her reason and feelings are then addressed to the only Supreme, and more than that, are satisfied. All rational beings are thus satisfied, as more could not be done.

Monotheism, then, never aspires to the vaunting inconsistency that ends in atheism, that leaves the world to itself, and mind to its delusion, destitute alike of those ennobling principles that govern all creation, if left to the right perception of things; much less does she descend to polytheism or plurality of gods, whether of millions or of three in number, under any name, pretence or disguise of numbers above unity, with priestcraftship confused, conflictive and antagonistical, seeking the life's blood of the deluded people who are treated as the veriest dupes unworthy the gifts of God, or any system that contradicts itself before it can explain with consistency and truth, one attribute of the Almighty, thereby depriving God of his divinity, to clothe impostors with it, that they may triumph over the multitude as in all past time!

The triumph of doctrine in unison to Monotheism, will not be for a mortal or earthly consideration, but for God Almighty and the worth of immortal souls, worth all worlds and their gorgeous treasures, secured by no power of martial armor, no insidious theologian pretences to popularize absurdities, and uphold crime and iniquity, but the inappreciable noblest panoply of eternal principles.

Rational religion cannot clash with the people's rights, nor mind's purity, reason or light; and so far from conflict with sound government of the people for whom all good and wise governments are primarily instituted to secure the invaluable good of the largest number, that it upholds all that is just and true.

Then religion will not, cannot, be for the temporal good of the few, but the eternal benefit of all that have mind, and avail themselves of reason.

Religion, holy and pure, modest and retiring in her dignity, asks innumerable times to be heard by her messenger, reason, that is, to be appreciated merely.

She was fulfilling in the dark ages of mind, her duty for the soul-ennobling science of promoting the good of all, by universal freedom in God's devotion, by the best light of truth before mind and reason.

Intellectual freemen are then bound to dash down as mental poison, the idolatry of man-worship in any of the sophisticated forms of polytheism, that embraces mind of all by her thousand wiles and evils, and binds so cunningly, that the coils are unseen and unfelt, till the delusion is effectual, and the injury unavoidable, inevitable and fatal.

Monotheism as the interpretation of enlightened reason, teaches the world must pay due and appropriate respect to the sincere motives of all those believing their peculiar faith to be the true religion.

Rational religion regards the sincerity of piety of all who seek to find their soul's salvation, but cannot ask to supersede any faith without full and convincing reason, requiring as she does all the time for mortals, the right faith, and its best, because its only safe pilotage. She concedes all the wisest systems of laws, that fill up man's duty to man, and his exact duty to his God, all codes that mind requires in equity and justice to himself and God, and all that wise statesmen and worthy humanists will positively institute, all that mankind require in the universal relations of the whole world, faithfully executed.

What all such are, let time, the best prophet, teach; and man's conscience enlightened most ably in the treasures of mature and ripe experience, decide.

A man of true principles, no matter his faith, will not act without due respect to them, possessed as he may be with any brief authority, because in his mind has been instilled the power of true light. Principles presuppose rational faith.

His deportment in a few brief minute particulars, defines his character, that "honesty is the best policy," carrying out his belief in action and duty, to an elevated state of refinement that characterizes the true gentleman and best religionist.

His language is a representative of his thoughts, his action of both, and all accord with the best performance of duty to man and God.

True faith looks not at forms and professions, but at the soul's actions in substance and spirit, not for one, but all time, to no final, but ever present day of judgment, making no respect to persons, only as self-respect and principles eternally win.

Confidence is given not for past conduct exclusively, which is simple and demoralizing, but embraces the whole subject and scope of man's life, written at his death and without concealment, favor or reward.

God's innate principles of religion are implanted in all rational minds at initiative existence, and are capable of being elicited at consciousness, and more or less practiced as directed by light of mind, influenced by tuition, and various circumstances constituting a code for action.

Of this fund, all systems of peculiar faith extract a part and parcel, as more or less graduated in its excellence, not originating any of it, but explaining their peculiar views more or less successfully as approaching or assimilating rational religion, trading on its, God's capital. Then all systems of faith, no matter how superstitious, how foul and depraved, are cloaked under the disguises of the true belief that incontestibly belongs to the one being, who as God of the universe, must have unity. The safety of all creation, is indebted to the conservative innate principles of God alone.

This position of innate conservative principles remains with the world of mind, and can only be masked by man's artifices, by deceived or corrupt minds.

Let no sophistry answer for them, as this is a holy subject, and requires the holy answers of a world's actions and deeds untrammeled and unbiased. Professions cannot supersede the actions of life.

As no faith can solve this whole question but that of reason, truth requires her support in due humility and candor.

All systems of faith otherwise built up are partial, defective, vitiated, and most hurtful to mind, that it sophisticates.

All such cannot stand the test of reason's solution, and will be effaced by the great luminary of mind.

The wise should aim, in the great vital drama, at the immortal luminary.

The most conscientious faith, and sincerest appeal to reason and reason's God, are made through mind, his means of avenue, and only inspiration, that proves the true rational faith. Monotheism requires no official organ but God's noblest gift, purity of mind, to see, feel, and adopt the legitimate universal treasure.

Profession of all is with God; the reward is in immortality; the speculation and trade on both are not of this world.

This earth presents nothing to give in lucre for mind's worth, but presents a field ample for all labor, not for self alone but for all a glorious theatre of manly action.

It is a sacred republic, endorsed by conscience, where no church dignitaries are needed to perpetuate what the Eternal has written on mind, that succeeds wave after wave in the ocean of life.

Monotheism is gentleness itself, having no blood and guilt-stained conscience, not blurred by misdeeds, distorted by vague pretences, nor cloaking anything under other names, and availing itself of other people. She is what she seems, and has no reason to be anything else.

She fawns on no absolutism that she excludes, deceives no man, and avoids all that looks like deceit, untruth, and dishonesty.

She claims what is right, perpetrates no continued wrong.

She matures her judgment by facts, and adheres to moral firmness with modest confidence.

She institutes protection by enlightened public opinion, that no man can escape. Hers is the bible of rational mind.

Absolutism on the throne, with the mitre, by brute force, insidious cunning, with sophistry and degraded licentiousness, may affect to disregard it, but the retribution will follow.

As high as absolutism may pretend to be above it, wrong assuredly as it is, it can be effectually checked by mind.

Mind is the master of absolutism, when it is the subject of principles, a fealty to the Almighty.

The summary punishment by conservative revolution from the people, who are forced to take this part of the common law into their own hands, often proves a retribution.

The bands of counterfeiters, forgers, pirates, and robbers who may escape prison or judiciary punishment, by collusions of confederates prepared for rescue, even to perjury, or by the weakness and corruption of officials, do arouse up this summary punishment of the people, especially in new countries and states. But the majesty of principles should command the efficient majesty of law.

Individuals, as adulterers, violators of social principles in various ways, often feel this in a speedy manner.

Nor does the curious law of retribution stop short of vindicating the principles of their Immortal Creator worthy of him, enough to cause every libeler of Deity to sink into immediate insignificance. Conservative principles require a uniform recognition by the wisest laws, and their execution in the world.

There can be no religion save rational, and no faith but what is its universal agent.

The God of monotheism is the God of the universe, whose endowments to mind of reason and principle universally give wisdom.

Citizens of both sexes, is it not your highest advantage to have full monotheism of mind over the polytheism of dreamers, visionary devotees of absolutism?

Has not polytheism ruled the world to its ruin, with her superstition and her fanaticism, bloody and tyrannical, long enough?

The world must analyze the proper elements of language, and must be held responsible to this point, as capable of complete decision, as in innumerable others.

No other construction can be admitted by reason or right.

It is utterly absurd to deny this. Then all such peculiar faiths are wound up, as entirely unworthy of resurrection.

Ask ingenuous youth, too pure to have their motives assailed, what do they think of religion?

They may not be aware that the question is paramount, and involves a paramount essential of their vitality, and of a Deity that implies allegiance to the right source.

If wise, they will forever seek that which is pure.

It is an allegiance to God, Supreme Creator, who endowed them with the elements essential at creation.

It cannot be to gods of creation, for all others have to acknowledge one Creator, thanks to monotheism, that rules out all other faiths, no matter how loud or boisterous, for they all are counterfeit as their base superstition.

How, then, is God to be found? As he is omnipresent, all are inquirers, through their own minds the analysts.

Where is this pure religion that gives certain faith and action to insure certain protection? How will they find the right way? Mind answers all these, all necessary questions.

Mind knows that it has to improve its own elements to the best calibre, capacity, and comprehension, to finish the whole solution, the problem of life.

What need has mind of priests? What is a priest? An impostor, if not an imbecile; both ought to be silenced of course. Will man take such men's word for it? That is unwise.

It is not the wisdom pertaining to mind, but the world, as the world has many faiths, diversified by contingency. But the inquirer is after truth, not contingency, consequently he cannot trust to any priest, who relies on human contingencies all the world's age, who is bound, as priest, to lie all the time for his faith, that lies all the time for him.

Men's words may lead to a plurality of gods, more or less to several millions. Is that safe or wise?

The wise man will forever, in all things, especially sacred things, take only reason; if he do not, he will forever desecrate sacred functions of mind, and then he is liable to become an advocate for atheism, polytheism, or plurality of gods, including man-worship and a host of idolatry, with attendant evils, diffused through the world.

Reason only admits monotheism, the God of which is worthy his universe; try him by all the rules, laws, and principles of mind, the only means and power with us, by us, and for us.

Give the world God Supreme, who teaches the best happiness, and the best means secure it, with the avoidance of most supposed evils.

Then we must point it to the code of mind, to God in his purity and exclusive majest who cannot be represented by messiahs, priests, prophets, nor their clan, who are t low to represent mind, much less the God Creator of the universe.

Man has to perform the complete fulness of his duty to his fellow man, in though word, and deed, that it may be best with him in his dying hour, that he may sustain conscience-pangs, no consuming remorse for wrongs and injuries done in private, with recklessness, next to irreparable then.

He has no code to depend upon, that licences any to spend a life of beastly larcen vice, and criminal licentiousness, and at the last moment to embrace a full treasure de pite of his reckless crimes, by the compliant pretences of money and power-sycophant

To embrace all the dispensations of virtue, he must carry out the supreme regard the majesty of virtue.

If he have luxuriated in all the beastliness of degraded nature, deceived by the fal doctrines of false bibles, to commute at death, he must abide his own decisions, and su fer for the penalty to principles, that certainly vindicate themselves in their whol legitimate circle. Let no false faith incite to such life. While there is time to do goo let none be in despair. What is worth the travail at the last moment? The constitu tion of man may not consign him to hopeless misery, while his best actions will b suitably rewarded, his worst must be suitably punished.

A true religion is only supported by true constitutional rule, that gives restoratio and security to principles, reason, and their proper attributes, that bravely place abso lutism, personal and social, in abeyance.

What other than true rational faith can avail? Good and faithful citizens of the worl cannot now recede, for they can never get any other; all else is fiction. But while all creed of peculiar faith are decaying under the crush and crash of their own destructive element rational religion invokes the full practice of duty and humanity, and while she abjures a wicked superstition, however refined by all the tricks of sophistry, adherence to worship o dead mortals, she requires a rightful action for conservative principles, their immediat and only representative, mind and their Creator, that all living men have to respect Our belief must be perfectly sincere, resting on sincere incontrovertible foundations, o else there will be an eternal conflict discoverable to the world, as is plainly discovera ble to be the case in every creed, sect, and denomination of peculiar faith, when refer red to deeds.

The belief will never be one moment's value, if our deeds to the whole circle of ou duties do not consistently conform thereto, practicable for human nature under prope honorable constructions. What value is our faith to us, if not available on a rationa basis, the only right one?

Of what value is any, short of the unity of God?

It destroys the more it is announced as peculiar.

Its existence then piles up the elements of the believer's destruction.

But pretences are set up, that the people cannot carry out the very things their dut enjoins. What absurdity!

God gave mind its superior endowments to carry out this very purpose, all life's purposes.

Man thus libels the people for his low purposes, and above all, the Creator. This i the case with the world's curse, of monopoly and usurpation.

It is always the case, when power of the few is interfered with. The difficulty i worldly polity is not so much the elevation of the people to proper representation, as t counteract the evil designs of men, whose talents are great, but whose minds have been perverted, and their collusion thousands of years in various editions of the same miser able code. Mind has to keep the world from taking advantage of it.

In mock dignity it may be asked, what are to be the flame and torch, to sustain the light of the religious world in a rational manner? The dignity of rational mind enables rational religion to sustain herself on her dignity, independent of the speculation and trade in God's world.

She sustains herself in all the pure minds of good and true citizens, at home and abroad, in and out of the pulpit, or any altar.

The inherent virtues of the Eternal Ruler of the universe, have furnished the right means.

The universe has ever had those means from its foundation, independent of vain man and all his adverse schemes, else chaos and confusion, instead of order, had been its portion, despite of all peculiar faiths. Conservation is as sublime as Creation, when the last premises supreme unity, and the first, that it has no division.

Peculiar, as false faith, absolutely differs with rational religion, that cannot differ with herself, as the true representative of unity itself.

Nothing less than the Supreme could have indited this, his own sublime character, so indelibly.

It is impossible for the glory of his eternal consistency to be eclipsed with rational minds.

Let not freemen shrink back from the workers of iniquity, who unite all their efforts for error guided by self-interest; let them know their rights and vindicate them by reason.

The object attained is a glorious victory indeed, never seen yet on earth, for a reconcilement of men's differences on the best, the only ground not visionary, because it is one of principle, and one universal faith and that alone in Deity, Creator of all, and whom the civilized world should justly appreciate in all his glorious attributes.

The object is union of mankind universally, in one grand brotherhood, on the altar of true faith to a God owning all, that religion, which is true allegiance to him alone, calls for, pure and undefiled as his property, thus proving that the perfection of the soul is accomplished by its own perfect solution.

All virtual indebtedness must be intrinsically on merit, and must be due in all respects that reason and justice invoke, and will be paid on their certificates by grateful and honest debtors, with the prompt feelings that reverence can inspire.

Some suppose that the speedy change of character, is vital in religion.

Surely, this can take place better in true than in absurd faith, as then the reason is convinced in faith rational and confirmed, beyond cavil to satisfaction; when both are satisfied they are immovable.

With this foundation, sure and certain, hope and joy rising to all that is legitimate of enthusiasm and spiritualization, as near sanctification as God permits human nature on this earth, with a pure faith, pure in God, may inspire the professor to his mind's greatest content.

But with what satisfaction and honest zeal can we subscribe to faith, not justified by sincerity or reality, or to sectarian or peculiar faith, that is not liberal enough for the spirit of the age, or of our own excellent institutions—a species of superstition that is circumscribed in time and place, occupying in reality, little or nothing in the great drama of life?

In utmost sincerity, we cannot do otherwise than reject all peculiar faith, as long as five senses are retained, and language is limited to their verdict.

Then let all good men aid in enlightening the world, but let none assume anything beyond this, as there the ministry of rational mind ceases, and imposition begins, and then, too, it is impious imposition of the worst character, with which all co-workers are identified.

Those observing the difference between superstition and rational religion, and the serious effects of the first, must not stand by now careless of results.

Rational religion commands only obvious and necessary duties, while the first demands unnatural ones.

Religion is, in nature, the highest supreme duty—is the soul of mind's duty.

The Creator must be reverenced through the fixed conservative principles for his whole creation, and their constant action and influence pervading all intellectual animated existence.

There can be no religion without mind, as there can be no accountability, and no responsibility without its reason, that has to elicit the only true object, the Creator. When will man adopt right views in respect to them, since he is involved in their adoption as a right appreciation for his own proper action, words, and thoughts? Without this position clearly evinced and proved before the universe, all the constituents of life's agency would be utterly contingent for ever.

Now is the hour for the world to rescue itself from its culpability, for citizens to rouse up and proclaim their rights and their best of blessings.

If wisdom give a right direction, the balance will be right.

All that monotheism, rational religion, can ask, is to have this momentous subject put before the world, free from any of the malign influences of absolutism of kings or priests, and nothing more nor less.

If rational religion had its true position on earth, the superfluities would meet the necessary demands, and the beggars of the world might be duly supported in comfort, and their minds too, cultivated, vice more effectually excluded by the true light of knowledge and science, if social and religious matters were put right.

Discussions about peculiar faiths would cease on their certain extinction, the pure beams of a pure faith would irradiate a noon-tide day, and disunions of countries making nations otherwise brothers, cut-throats, would cease, and the blessings of universal union would disseminate universal strength.

But the bigot and fanatic, giving the same kind of execrable inquisition that the worst vassal times of dark ages ever saw, equal to the stake-burnings, command all simpletons fearful to call their minds reason's, their souls God's, bid them not discuss rationally the subject of religion, or read what enlightens them. Then the world belongs to these wiseacres, and it might as well be theirs in the next, unless their responsibility will give them enough to do in accountability.

Then mind is of no account and contrary to reason but for the folly and crimes it is made to commit, a position that libels God as making! O mass of absurdities and contradictions.

All things in the universe are for free rational discussion, that mind might rightfully embrace them.

The sooner truth is embraced the better. The sooner falsehood is exposed and rejected, the better for all mankind.

None but absolutism denies this by her base actions, for her argument is in fragments, and is nowhere whole.

Absolutism of any species, for they all are in collusion, kingly or priestly, may cant about faith, which is only credulity, if taken out of the reason of mind, but absolutism is a hypocrite, and when she rejects any work for free rational discussion by her fears or will, she shows her utter disgrace.

Away then with absolutism in all its forms, from the despot, with all his sycophants who trammel mind, down to all priestocracy with its myrmidons who sophisticate it, and cannot do it justice in investigation.

The weak systems of exploded ignorance and prejudice must yield to the superior lights of the day, by which the world was to be enlightened and will improve.

Take away all false lights and their teachers, and let the best inculcations of true lights illuminate the dawn of life, then its meridian will be fruitful, and its evening a blessing in the land of adoption.

Let a liberal and diffused patriotism prevail, to cover the whole lands and oceans of the globe.

Let a worthy spirit of humanity be permanent.

Sacrifice all minor things forever, before fundamental freedom and its securities are sacrificed to degrade mind and rational religion.

If there be any failure, assuredly it is not in God's principles that cannot clash, but in the wiles of absolutism that pretend to the divine rights of church and governmental despotism.

Rational religion does not permit, with impunity, the ends of justice to be ignominiously defeated by sophistry or perjury. She has the potency to correct miserable and abominable states of society, where false pretences and hypocrisy exist and social tyranny predominates.

She permits no loose views, but holds up all the world at once to the supreme obligation of rule on principles. She draws no imaginary line defined by men, but holds universally mind subject to universal principles, that all rational being must know and be responsible for.

In her presidency she overlooks no persons high in power or rule, but in all the grades of society, and in all its circles, private or public, whether in the supreme temple of God, the universal brotherhood of principles, or in the little churches of man, all that cannot begin to be trusted, unworthy of trust or going wrong all the time, not doing justice to truth, chastity or moral virtues, whether emperors or kings, popes, bishops or laymen, governors or governed, are to be reminded that they are unworthy members of society, and cannot be worthy of future felicity. She inculcates the only mastery of mind, the supremacy of God, the mighty Unity, all obligations, social and religious.

Hers is the intellectual tuition that those miserably raised in the world in the school of its vices, its follies or its crimes, whose history is evil, the penalty for violation of the good, must mend in her presence and under guidance the error of their ways as the best practical faith.

Religion is ever rational and consistent, and always appeals through mind to mind by reason up to reason's God, without worldly speculation in church, state or any regime.

She delights in the blessings that reason ever gives.

She knows no divisions of men, and does not know herself, unless mind can be satisfied by the recognition.

She makes no division in The Holy Centre, for she ever looks to unity in God and men, and can recognise no other state.

Her earth is superior in universal brotherhood to the heaven of peculiar faith, whose sectarianism has, by fiction, caused its God to exclude rebellious angels. Peculiar faith loses caste on earth, and forgets the truth in her heaven.

Religion teaches truly that when the unity of the God of the universe is transcended, principle is violated.

Hence it is that peculiar faith in heaven or on earth begets peculiar trouble to its peculiar people.

Did monotheism admit of any peculiarities, then her extinction would be certain, as her intention would be mortal, and she would be unworthy of herself as the representative of an Immutable Omniscient Being, pledging conservative and eternal principles.

The religion that God of the universe established is the only appropriate one to be used; all others are peculiar faiths, hurtful, and in the way of the true. Mortals must recognise all such.

The perfect Creator, wise at creation, gave her a creation-birthright, inherent faculties, without which no rational being could exist.

The universe will meet God's requisitions. Can all this be properly accomplished, without the immortality of the soul?

Vain and ambitious mortals should not seek to prevent it their brief moment and their expiring hour, for retribution will expose their corruption and unveil their disgrace.

All should be wise to honesty, and honest unto just reverence of the Supreme.

This code is written in mind, and mind's understanding can honestly comprehend duty, needing no pretender to help it do for itself what mind can alone do.

No real due value of rationality can be mistaken for mere enthusiasm and its visionary spiritualization, affecting the fruition of better spheres, that must be superseded for time-serving worship of the moment.

Exalted thoughts and aspirations for the immortal creation and eternity's benefits, can only be manifested by proper adoration; nothing else is genuine.

Any faith short of monotheism is necessarily sectarian, and is fundamentally wrong. If it be divided into minute divisions of hundreds, so much the worse.

The more division the more proof of errors and erroneous elements, and evincing the finite being of man's work of most moderate efforts, if he forsake principles for peculiarities, mind and reason for priestocracy and their particular faith. Religion does not need priest but rational mind for practical illustration.

The only way of correction is in one God, supreme, immortal, omnipotent, and unmistakable in his attributes, that characterize him as ministers in the universe and its universal relations. The sublimity of his character is portrayed in the sublimity of the character of rational religion, in the utter impossibility of reducing the unity of either, for when the vain attempt is made by impotent mind, the position is untenable, suicidal and fatal.

How much, then, is rational mind indebted to monotheism, and the means to obtain it, sustaining its dignity and securing its happiness.

Without this friend of mind accorded by God, there is a purgatory of conscience built up on earth by false systems, calculated to immolate victims worse than in their blood, when ceaselessly tormented by imaginary evils, the chimeras of impostors.

What a real blessing to get rid of all these curses.

The constant accountability and responsibility that wise and good men invariably acknowledge to God, imply a proper service, and the protective defence against the torturing state of such conscience.

When we get rid of superstition, and sophistry its inseparable companion, then we may obtain monotheism, the sublime religion of God.

It is she that will urge the wisest comprehension of each individual penalty consequent on the violation of God's laws, not to destroy but save universally, and institute the most elevating system of rewards that will necessarily produce an illustrious code of ethics to protect mind in general.

She invokes all laws consistent to the permanency of good legislation, to rise to the dignified and beneficial character of the world's benefactress.

What better views can enlightened mind have?

Whither else can it go but to the wise practical functions of reason?

With all the wildest enthusiasm of our nature, the feelings and emotions of soul, still religion is a certain, definite, paramount duty towards God.

Man may feel aroused to the highest expression of emotions, under consideration of his having religion, a possession in common with rational minds, but all improvement thereon must be submitted to the calm and serious tribunal of philosophy and practical life, the test of mind-embodiment for soul-organization.

People have to act under the wise impulse of mind's action, as if they considered the world governed directly best by its ruler.

Sincerity of action, instead of mere pretence of profession, fear, and world-interest policy, operates with religion, that recognises no prejudices, omission of duty, nor commission of vices. Safety attends her injunction of duty, in doing right in all things, to God and man. She perceives clearly that there is no much superstition inevitably mixed up with all sectarian faith, arising from corrupt sources, beyond proper remedy, if persisted in.

The difficulty is not so much the reproach of the ancients, for all their superstitious codes of false faith, as the unaccountable stupidity of the moderns, in not rejecting all such, and securing a better, so clearly demonstrated by all the wisest views of the universe.

The only correction is in eradicating fundamental errors, of all kinds, that lurk in superficial and perverted mind, and fostered by blighted self-interest, to keep all in abeyance, not to any code of faith, precept, or bible, but as reason and mind decide. Get rid of all such kind of faith, by rational discussion and adoption of truth, and then action will be consistent, in that sincerity of belief that is true, and knowledge of truth.

All rational beings owe it to themselves to revere truly the living God, in purest rational adoration, who can save them not only from erroneous superstitions of all kinds, but from their fatal effects, that a world's history renders horrid to contemplate.

The living are best protected when they look in acquiescence to God's full omnipotence, and adopt the best security of principles' protection, in their world-wide relations, that necessarily compel their observation and action. The great error of the world is in partial and peculiar views of its whole duty, that bespeak imperfect education. Peculiar systems of all kinds, bad as they were at any past age, for mind, are now criminally obnoxious. They beget false positions and insecurity.

All rational minds, that expect to realize rational protection from a rational God, and the God of the universe can be no other, must ever proceed on rational basis.

Monotheism only recognises a rational, immortal God, which two attributes are indissoluble.

Mind that affects an immortal without a rational God, is lost in a trackless ocean of stupidity.

Monotheism is the only rational religion; there can be no other but that of one God.

But what does monotheism, rational religion, profess?

She utters the facts of God throughout nature, of which God is the soul and organizer.

If she fail to do this as far as appreciated by mind, she is not genuine, but then it is the fault of mind, and not of herself, that is perfect as the consummation of God's principles and attributes.

She teaches mind to respect, with the most sublime humility, the admirable attributes of divinity, as resplendent with exclusive greatness in his own elements.

Independent in her own resources of all peculiar faiths that counterfeit her, she portrays in herself the entire independence of the God of nature, and exposes the idle pageantry of these sycophants of superstition.

Her depth is in the minutest point embraced by philosophy, that is rejected by sectarian faith.

Where peculiar faith closes her existence, by universal defects, monotheism begins hers, in the most brilliant splendor of universal sufficiency.

What monotheism does not know, mind not having the data to recognise, she modestly yields to the divine Creator, without professional speculation for peculiar power, or affecting mystery, where proper, honest, sound sense is silent; being content in her universal possession.

She goes from God to the least object of appreciation, and yields him all honor in his own presidency.

She knows no other God while reason exists, and she considers him essentially perfect and pure in every respect.

She analyzes the drama of humanity, and estimates the merit of all that in life win its true glory, no matter who that soul is; and she considers God estimating the will, good or bad, for the deed, as well as the circumstances that reflect on all such.

She opposes false and tyrannical issues, all collusions of combinations to defeat justice, all unholy alliances to defeat constitutional government, as iniquitous mockery.

She operates for all the light and freedom of light, by free rational discussion in debate, the press, authorship.

She does not permit them to be subsidized for corruption, of any absolutism of one or many, where the interests of the press hold it back from anticipated losses, being controlled by professional cliques.

She scouts all press-censorship that is not in perfect accordance with truth and honor.

Opposition to rational religion, at this enlightened day, cannot arise from the subject of science generally, but from its representatives, when in conflict of self-interest, that unfortunately blinds the judgment, and prejudices the decision. If peculiar faith have peculiar obliquity of vision, how can it be less oblique if directed by peculiar interest?

One faith in God, with mind, unites all; because God is unity, the soul of unity, not of trinity, expels hate and persecution necessarily, and arouses the loftiest aspirations and enthusiasm of rationality.

No enthusiasm is so elevated, so soul-refined, as that confiding in Deity, a perfect Being, Almighty.'

The foundation of such faith and its purest action is principle, all the time, from its commencement and influence on created mind, to the existence of its immortal triumph.

It is principle, in the creation, object, and duration; and this is the loftiest height and profoundest depths of philosophy.

Hence arises all sincerity of religious profession, which is substantial possession, that begets the fullest faith in eternal truth, and respect for truth all the time.

We have proclaimed this principle undeniable by reason, the highest functionary of mind, that religion, the highest duty known to mind, should be performed right, as possessed universally for the highest of all objects, by mind. Yet the majority of the world leaves it undone, as if the elements of religion were not possessed by all rational minds.

Rational religion, inherent creation-birthright of all rational minds, cannot be thus trifled with.

We will not permit any to cavil or quibble by trifles, where only plain facts are arrived at all the time, else the whole design, great as it is, may be, shall be abandoned; therefore we adopt the position that a large majority of the world is unrepresented altogether; because true religious faith, destitute of factious creeds and sects, is not before them. But their situation is not destitute of God's inherent protection, however destitute of all the noise that the vain world idly makes of faith.

Religion is told in actions, not by professions and confessions of peculiar faith.

The silent magnificence of the Deity is unappreciated by man, whose frothy declamation about faith is to be set down to the caprices and pretences of presumptuous priestocracy.

Will, then, the bigotry and infatuation of any speculating in creeds, prevent the world rightly investigating the proper subject of monotheism?

All need a code of enlightened principles to guide them, to secure their rejection of peculiar faith, and not leave them destitute of reasonable, necessary, and legitimate faith and its proper attributes, which all will finally appreciate as correct, and that all enlightened ages must settle down on, as monotheism.

This is the faith that reason and analysis support, and that analogy, in all manner of the mind's scrutiny, must inevitably adore.

As all the world seeks, through the inquiring mind, of all rational beings, for the necessary faith, then an enlightened one must prevail, as soon as the world is enlightened, or else its place must unfortunately be supplied with only the weak state of the age, surrounded as it has been by existing circumstances, whether of superstition or of religion.

But we are now in a better and more liberal age, let our faith rise in proportion to our advantages and light.

Any doctrines antagonistic to rational religion, are antagonistic to Monotheism, that recognises no absurd or vicious legends, that priests have dreamed of or profited by.

All their doctrines are antagonistic to mind and reason's mind, and skulk the question of paramount importance. They trifle with the highest interest of the soul.

Mind without rational religion, cannot attain to the goal of its wishes, the perfection of its nature, the analysis of its duty, the appreciation of its position.

Some may affect that the cause will suffer, by want of preaching. What good to the world, will preaching in a vain cause, do?

They might as well contend for any exploded custom, if this should be discarded. But in serious answer, all real piety can be fully sustained in all essentials to man's position.

The theme of Monotheism or rational religion that commences with conscience, is ever present with mind and constant to death, presents the sublimest of all conceptions, and the most endless of all subjects.

All the universe testifies to her legitimacy, comprehending all that truth and science can evolve, or that the immortal soul needs. She satisfies the demands of the universe, when peculiar faith cannot qualify one want of one world. Mere words of the pulpit are things of moonshine.

The essence had been diffused in every rational mind, as sunbeams, being the true contemplation of Deity, and the active self-agency of mind.

What a subject, and requiring only truth, simple and unadorned, banishing forever as unnecessary and degrading, that sophistry that is used necessarily in all other creeds of faith, because that faith, whatever else it is, rests on sophistry all the time, and that can rest on nothing else but superstition.

What else can all sectarian faith beget, but a stupid or dishonest result?

Where reason cannot dwell, as peculiarity occupies her place, where peace is always variant with herself, where all are infallible, but none orthodox, by their own position and accusations, mutual?

Better had pure minds never heard the preaching of peculiar faith, better have your ears designedly shut, than to receive the doctrine that you shall not use the reason that God gave you.

If you will not heed to reason, better will it be in the day that decides on the merits of this vital subject, that you never had it, for then reason's God, by your own unanswerable action, cannot then own you as a reasonable subject. Your soul will have to be purified, by all the necessary preparations of reason.

Can you be satisfied with less than a reasonable God to decide on your own defects and demerits?

If you have merits, with whom can they be better appreciated than by the most rational God?

Monotheism calls for rational faith, in the only true living God. This religion has no limits that reason and truth elicit for mind, neither in omission nor commission.

She aspires to represent God universally, offering the world the best that can be found, as God made, recognising no other.

All others are peculiar, finite in time and space.

Do not deceive yourself, much less others; you will not, can never conquer life's difficulties under any other banner than that of God.

Monotheism resorts to no Asia with her numerous systems of peculiar faith, and her millions of divinities. She abjures the depravities of perverted minds.

The best citizens of all good minds on each continent, have religion in degree, but their highest duty is not paid directly to God as it should be alone, but unfortunately to God's usurpers, not representatives, who can claim only to be his ministers and creatures.

But the egotistical enthusiast, ranting and raving in impulse, filled with animal passions for grace, rational, devout, and spiritual, sanctification etherealized too pure for earth, aroused in zeal too impatient to admit the common avenue to glory by death, needs all these fascinations, denied him, he may pretend to think, by the pure light of Monotheism.

But pure rational religion meets all this false position, and grants the petitioner all that his draft of personal titles calls for, honors all genuine drafts in full measures, to the greatest joy and satisfaction of recipients at the trying hour when all such are needed.

All claimants get all that they are fully entitled to. They get all besides, that they never thought of.

They reach the sublime triumph of reason and philosophy, to guide their honest and impetuous zeal.

They are ever commended to mind to counsel them in all thoughts, to counteract all difficulties by its best and honest inspirations, and to reject all else as the teachings of the sophist, the visionary or the monomaniac.

Rational religion furnishes the strength of a wise cabinet and bosom friends, councillors, reason and truth.

As to the flaming love of the fiery zealots, all will burn the brighter, the stronger the foundations; the more lasting the fountains, the more permanent the source.

None can transcend the true understanding of the pure analysis of God's attributes.

They are mysteries only to those that make them so.

Wisdom is the plain truth of the honest understanding, that comes through mind all the time. It is mind's practical operation.

Thou must not then pervert the perfection of those attributes, knowing as thou shouldst that omniscience, which is knowledge of all things, belongs only to an Almighty. Thou must know that Almighty asserts all practical operations or capacity for omnipotence.

Thou must know that omnipresence embraces these two attributes with a perfect union, and excludes by its unity all other combinations, which would destroy the character and principle. All trinities, antagonistic as they must be to these, are false and futile.

And further, thou shouldst know that Providence crowns the perfection of the whole at first, over all the future special acts of mind, and is self-demonstrated Almighty, that bespeaks all perfection.

If thou appreciate all these simple things, impart truly the blessings of thy belief to thy fellow-man.

Thou then wilt not impeach thyself nor dishonor God under false pretences, to reach the worldly treasures of the five grand divisions of the globe, with their appurtenant islands. Thou mayst overrun the world with insidious faith, but then thou hast thyself to save, a work that needs thy constant attention for time, that thou may not be lost in the world's gain for much of eternity.

The Creator is most highly pleased in the truth and sincerity of his creatures, their honesty as one of the great platforms of true principles, and he adopts all such most readily for ever, but frustrated and brought to naught are all those destitute of principles that vindicate themselves above all other primary foundations.

The general providence of God, the vindication of these principles, aids the good will and faith of man, aids him in all good tendencies, so far as not to defeat God's own good purposes of mind's free agency, which bespeaks a freeman's responsibility.

Man has to take hold of things in the right way, at the right time, and with the right spirit.

Unlike all peculiar faith, rational faith has no exception whatever, on true analysis of the whole subject, as its antagonism is the pretence of false faith forever. If there be exception, there is nothing real, as God has created, and all his are certain.

Whether others affect spiritualization and grace to enthusiasm and sanctification, or any other dogma of faith resting on the personal feelings and bigoted education of the individual, doing our whole duty to God, the great soul of the universe, embraces full faith, creed and man's necessary practice.

God exacts no worship, but the pure adoration of mind, having an enlightened conscience.

When man does his duty, his whole duty, and nothing but his duty, then he embraces the mighty subject of his earthly mission, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Created by God, all his duty is absorbed by duty to the Creator, whose unity takes supreme precedence of all trinity.

Monotheism has prevailed universally from creation of mind. All other faiths are peculiar to a season and place, to a peculiar incarnation or idolatry, man, animal or image, then die out in a series of time, all being antagonistic to monotheism, as they are antagonistic to supreme principles.

Monotheism must last for eternity, as it rests on eternal principles, all co-existent and co-equal.

Monotheism rests on truth, and is ever consistent, otherwise the solution has not been rightly appreciated by mind, and its correction is ever readily received with gratefulness.

Faiths not dependent on eternal principles are peculiar, and had their origin in man's peculiar notions and superstitions, are antagonistic to exposure, and uselessly vindictive for the attempt which they repel.

Monotheism invites enlightened rational discussion on her principles or her faith, as she is the true friend to mind in securing all the benefits universal.

Faiths not dependent on right and justice are suspicious of any intellectual questions, involving the fundamental principles, and pretend most falsely that it is dangerous to investigate too deeply the primary points essential.

Monotheism asks for calm and philosophical investigation to satisfy the conscience of rectitude previously to adoption, to maintain firmly and most consistently the right position under the most intense feelings of our nature.

Improper faiths ask for impulse, and retire behind assumed mysteries, non-existent miracles, false pretences to prophecies, all untenable doctrines.

Religion is not only spiritual, but rational; she cannot exist otherwise.

How comes religion at all? By the creation of innate faculties, by which her principles act on mind.

If reason predominate, the result is rational religion, but its substitutes, sophistry and peculiar faith, mislead to superstition, and from the unity of God.

The spiritual and rational are all emanations and inspirations.

The brute, as soon as man, could become religious on other conditions. This principle of religion properly accords with the physical and mental organization.

Take religion that is rational from the world, and the world is not only divested of her loveliness, but is brutalized. Her banishment presents only the ragged and jagged fragments of worthless peculiar faiths, that misrepresent God.

Superstition repels civilization; science accompanies to the best of philosophy, that causes mind to steer best to its highest duties.

Free citizens will now take nothing for granted that is not rational, and that pure analysis cannot solve, yielding nothing to blind, selfish infatuation.

Rational religion does not martyrize on the faith of blind devotion and superstitious Juggernautism, but adheres to the light of reason and the impulse of sincerity, its essential creation, bending neither to fancy nor custom irrational.

Had this noble spirit prevailed in times past, had but her voice been heard by the Crusaders, a savage and relentless war of two hundred years, and much blood of millions slaughtered as victims on the altars of peculiar faith, had been spared.

But now too, as much as ever, is the time that her voice should be heard, and the qualities of the eminent artist available, that all should be beloved of God and man.

The institution of the right principles will effect this, what no messiah could reach before, for all such scattered the fiery elements of distrust the world over.

The true faith can be selected by the enlightened Judge, who needs not appearances, but wisely referring to the inherent and exquisite qualities that endow the rightful possessor to be loved of God and man, to the future decision of time, as the proper test for the best religion.

Peculiar faith has appealed to papal dispensations and the sword of military chieftains, from which it had no higher tribunal.

The Mahomedan won Jerusalem and yet retains it, his country still. The war of conquest was sought by peculiar faith.

Once custom decided the justice of the world by the sword. What could monotheists say to this, but in rebuke?

God was then, as now, the ruler of the universe, this earth included.

The sword has been used by nearly all of peculiar faith, yet that faith has not been decided by the martial tribunal. All the messiahs that make the peculiar faith, and all its false positions, are perfectly worthless, as they are obnoxious to the world's peace and welfare.

Such faith has appealed to swords, and not to reason.

God of the universe deals not with the sword, as base priestocracy have misrepresented him, but with reason. With reason he electrifies, and manages the universe.

Mortals are truly taught by rational religion not to put themselves between Deity and his creation, with any arrogance or imposition.

Was not the ordeal of savage crusades enough to teach the world that all that were of earth are earthly, that all that were born, lived, and died were mortals, and none but self-deluded people can affect more?

But when had bigotry any ears? when had peculiar faith any reason? What have they ever learned? what have they ever forgot?

Those of any age that go beyond the doctrine of rational religion are no better than savage crusaders on man's sacred rights.

The unholiest fanaticism and the worst piracy for the world's conquest were hid under the specious garb of false pretences of peculiar faith.

The hand of the Almighty cannot be mistaken by reason. Simplicity and beauty are its seal, and eternity its attribute.

In his palm, conscience presides with a moral triumph.

Without illustrious actions before him, prayers are but a mockery.

The martial prowess of the church! That defines her position, with corruption and iniquity her birth-rights.

When the voice of rational religion is heard in the world, martial prowess, that oppresses with cruelty, whose vindictiveness cannot be used with impunity, and calls for avenging, will be excluded, as then peace will define her position; therefore the world will come to a definite view of things.

Rational religion seeks fundamental principles already in existence from creation, for the elements of general good, eductive of harmony in the wildest moral chaos.

Our only true system of rational government has laid the foundation for future expansive good of mankind; and religion that is rational has sealed it.

Why, then, is the world shamefully made to rest on individual and peculiar authority of men and books, when the dignity and universality of principles in religion and government tower above all these?

All faiths except rational religion must be self-convicted in many respects, before the for[illegible]al of philosophy, that all false and peculiar faiths most terribly hate and fear, for Tho[illegible] of exposure.

If rational religion be not correct, those who introduce her exposition must learn themselves.

She is ever right, because God is right.

If a sincere aspirant seek her best institutions, he goes far to cause a speedy termination of all that is spurious and hostile to human good.

Philosophy must decide what is rational religion, by her comprehensive investigations and universal acts.

Then rational religion has it forever.

Her deeds expand as her faith, both universal, and universally securing the affections of the world, exempt from conflicts and sectarian views, that when presented are discarded as not of her faith.

The very moment rational religion approaches, all the godly virtues attend her, possessed in perfection, otherwise she is not predominant.

It is a counterfeit, sectarian or bigot, that assumes it.

She considers the demoralization of the world, and gives light of mind, at home and abroad, to correct it.

She seeks to be judged by the true issue, and if general peace be not of her banner, then she is libeled.

She introduces true analysis into all subjects, seen as far as the minds of her friends can go, and she seeks true analogy of things, unseen by the light of reason, that is the best light of mind.

She is not peevish, much less vindictive in the rational discussion of all rational subjects for mind to investigate.

With her there prevails no such idea that sin can reach the holy centre, for the creation of the devil involves contradictions to all her creeds, that are used up if mind and reason, the only means to reach them, be properly exercised.

Rational religion rests on the highest morals and intellect, that takes cognizance of all the best appreciation of duty, and the most suitable action.

The duty must be inquired into as it is fixed by God's attributes, and the circumstances of the universe decide its character.

Due inquiry and investigation, must be made at all times, as otherwise mankind cannot decide between superstition and religion. That is provable daily, even in the deaths of all creeds and peculiar faiths.

We see clearly that there can be no conflict of opinion, while faith is fortified by reason, and cultivated intellectual liberty in the belief of God's supreme elevation above all these contingences of imbecility.

We see clearly that the people need a uniform system of social and religious faith, resting on nothing supernatural as against truth.

Religion is most rational, and seizes on the rational part of mind and frees it for Deity.

The policy of nature and of human character, rests on a guarantee for correct codes, to be best filled up by wise and discreet philosophy.

That guarantee, the best of all, liberty for free man, is to have a free and intelligent mind.

All that observe must realize, that religious essence imparts a faith to every human being, as relatively enlightened and elevated in the scale of philosophical principles.

All have to realize this subject in a proper spirit.

All must respect enlightened views about religion, while they deplore erroneous lights, and must acknowledge that the present views may answer for past ages, but will not, do not, and cannot, for the people of liberty, possessed of minds free for liberty.

The people's every feeling will be duly aroused the very moment rational religion is sustained, and will expel monopolists and pretenders.

Reason claims rational religion, founded as disclosed on analysis of mind on its innate capacity, without which God is unknown by mind; but by peculiar tradition, peculiar faiths are promulgated as of Christ, the messiahships, &c.

The first is natural, certain, uniform and truthful; the second is mechanical, fortuitous and factitious, and depends on sophistry always.

The pure attributes of God, creator of all, insure his power exclusively, and the obedience of all, however perverted the mind in recognising it, must be in abeyance to that power or none.

Peculiar faith claims that obedience and its prophecy pretends to proclaim it, but reason shows that a large majority of the world has ever disproved it.

So much for prophecy of any bible.

Rational religion is needed in every mind, and God's omniscience, omnipotence and omnipresence, had provided for all this at mind's creation, a matter not perceived by the stupid pretenders of priestocracy, whilst no other can occupy the same mind at the same time, without trespassing on religion, which act is an abominable injury in the sight of God and man.

How little intrinsic worth in the world can we hold to as substantial, among all its evanescent things, when we are deprived of rational religion.

She is ever true to mind, when it is true to itself.

All enlightened at the fountains of wisdom, cannot be put back in their duty by the affected or pretended mysteries of priestocracy, as they will discard plausible but erroneous theories.

Did rational religion rely on anything else but the purest wisdom, she would fly from the proper discussion of truth, and her own existence.

It is she that asks, is truth ever injured by intelligent and rational discussion?

Mind, as a creature of education, has to refer to this tribunal as a necessary constituent of that education for freemen.

Rational religion implies mind, in its best sense, reason all the time of life's consciousness, and thereby, effectually shuts out all priestocracy's peculiar faith.

Our mental position implies but certain duty, merely the purest intention of doing and acting right.

Monotheism looks to God, to whom the universe looks. She has but one great God, all powerful, almighty.

Rational religion sits calm for rational discussion, that she always invites, wishing to profit herself by rejection of errors, and give important substantial facts to the world. This is the action of her enlightened advocates.

It is her spirit that inquires, where does the tyranny of absolutism ever stop?

It is she that considers the deplorable state of the world as tributary for too much time, to some form or other of superstition, and invokes the notice of that world to this sad state.

She gives the only consolation in God alone.

She ever requires honesty and truth in her essence, else it all goes for nothing, however the professors of any peculiar faith may mouth a messiah.

It is she that recognises multitudes of other peculiar faiths, elevated to a high-toned character, despite of all those faiths, living according to an eclectic action, showing mind in its beauty and strength, however their bibles of tradition may invalidate those very principles. By her light, they may be the lights of the world.

She recognises the prosperity of free institutions, resulting from mind and its purity.

She deplores the miserable state of all peculiar faith, as that of the worst errors of the world. When we speak of the Mormon faith, that is due to peculiar faith, that begot Mahometanism, and had for its ancestors, the dogmas that gave rise to the vedas of Asia, we only embrace the beginning of what encircles much of the world.

So much for peculiar faith, the child of superstition.

Rational religion teaches man all this, and the correction.

She informs us that miracles, prophecies, mysteries and enigmas, prove that man, not God, had anything to do with their bibles. All those snares are too small for the God of the universe: they are only the means for the gods of peculiar faith.

One of her main objects of inquiry is, whether the mind is not the only priest and preacher of religion, by the divine rights of the people?

If so, as really is the case, priests and preachers are impostors and charlatans.

Rational religion requires for herself the same tribunal of justice, that she allows others, and demands correction, not skulks from it, on principles established on their enlightened and liberal position.

She recognises a pure conscience, and upright conduct, emanating from proper principles.

It is necessary that they have a proper foundation for light, in a liberal and just education.

Rational religion looks to no mortal, has no creed that mind does not recognise, and reason approve, and adheres to nothing but rightful duty and substantial principles, that bless mind and honor God alone.

She takes precautions against the evils that affect morals, intellect, and government.

She is modestly silent, when peculiar faith gives her antagonistical constructions to most of Deity's dispensations, oftener libeling them, explaining or solving his mighty deeds of good.

She holds herself in abeyance to correction of all errors of faith, and can never take umbrage thereat, as her good, not her speculation is to be attained, therefore, she rejoices. What is apparent adversity, she wishes to consider universal benefit.

Under her auspices all minds should so act, as to cause all adversity to redound to relative prosperity if practicable. With her the admonition is not to be disregarded that time gives, and she truly conceives that more is oftener saved by prompt rendition of justice, than by any equivocal action that finally involves all in ruin.

The best of civilization is the best of rational religion, that constitutes the best adoption and execution of the noblest code of duties of mind to God, and this is best done on best analysis and by consistent action of mind. Religion is of paramount importance but then it must never degenerate into peculiar faith, that spots, taints, and corrupts it before the whole universe.

Mind is for science, science for morals, morals for religion,—the highest act and thought of mind that is thereby effectually introduced to its God.

Religion we see must rest on universal principles that constantly apply to their originator, who sees all the universe.

Man is already bound from creation to God alone, by that supreme birthright, religion, and when he moves out of that sphere of his only safety, he takes a false position by false faith, in a counterfeit that comes of peculiar faith.

All God's principles vindicate him, in vindicating themselves and religion, sooner or later.

All men must know this, to be sure of the only means, ever given the universe, much less one of its spheres. Now the conclusion is inevitable, that what is done by conservation for this world, must be done for the universe. As God's principles are universal for conservation, this world cannot be excepted; consequently the doctrine of Messiahship, as most worthless and noxious, falls to the ground.

Religion must be rational, and displayed by mind that should exhibit its best activity, not in sounding pretensions, but in ennobling actions.

The world may add all enthusiasm, and all the exciting feelings of spiritualism, that are inherent and to the purpose. But what can all avail if any of the passions transcend reason? Use all that is legitimate, to the highest intensity of feeling if necessary.

Religion must be rational however spiritualized to the deepest enthusiasm, and purified in all attainable sanctity; and such cannot mislead us by bigotry or any improper weakness, as the governing power of mind will prevent in the audition of philosophical reason.

The influence of monotheism or rational religion, pervades more of human character than those of peculiar faith will admit. But is peculiar faith ever just? What has made men honest, virtuous, patriotic? Innate principles have done these, especially when aided by domestic education, that elicits the best conservative principles the better the higher they are carried.

Peculiar faith is any thing else than right, if it acts knowingly. Idle opinions may be entertained about one's conscientious views, as if a loose and idle speculation without base or capital; but none of these are available, as all must depend on certain principles.

A comprehensive knowledge of the world, will show us the proof. The whole life is pre-eminently in this momentous question, for we only know life after its passage at the dying hour.

Rational religion gives the firmest faith to live and die by. There are no blind footsteps that mislead us. She is independent of the least improper motives.

All that we can rely on is on God and his attributes, to whom mind's whole duty throughout life must be directed by its own best functions.

She calls for no excitement of animal passions, no sway of terror or fear, no vindictiveness.

The principles of salvation are universal and uniform from creation down, and incite the paramount duty to man and God. To have them variant in time or space, demonstrates false positions of imperfect perverted minds only.

But the faith of monotheism avows itself responsible, at the same tribunal of reason that condemns all others.

She teaches to like all in one brotherhood and God, and acts most consistently with circumstances and her ability.

She contemns all impostors, and countenances no blasphemers.

She bids the world ask all, if they be rational beings, what kind of religion must a rational God have instituted, for man did not institute it?

Man is rational, or expected so to be in all other things, must inevitably be so in religion.

All wise rational men should educate mind against peculiar faith, especially all that conflicts with reason, or in direct antagonism with rational religion.

Who could oppose monotheism? as well expect opposition to God, who instituted its pure principles.

She institutes no absurd views to kill with the fear of superstition in her fictions of hell, or to defer duty with superficial expectations of a promiscuous assembly of universal mixtures.

She commands actions as merit, and requires merit before rewards, soliciting social duties for man, who must pay the adoration of religion to God, but abjures all man, hero, and idol-worship.

She considers infidelity the state of opposition to the Almighty in favor of atheism or polytheism, both of which she negatives, in whatever form of numbers the last insidiously appears. With her supreme excellency of character, all other faiths are undeniably pagan.

She considers the plurality of gods as abhorrent to fidelity to the Supreme, and a violation of good faith to reason.

She considers atheism a desecration no less absurd, and only another apology for the idolatry of nature-worship.

In her reports about peculiar faith no matter where located, she accords all delicacy respecting feelings of unintentional wrong, and would take the will of intentional good for the omission of the deed: but she considers the paramount nature of the case demands official statements to approach the facts of truth.

The true representative of God, monotheism, is not appreciated because God is not.

When peculiar faith boasts of missions, rational religion can well ask what do missions avail, before science and mind understand each other?

Why not address now the world in its tongues as claimed before, and promised in the last chapter of Mark, when the same or greater necessity exists among its many hundreds of millions? Why delay now in China, with its three hundred millions, to make efficient progress before many millions die ere its very language can be mastered to address the balance? Why not perform the necessary miracles to make the paramount impression among its many people courting the most auspicious faith all over the world? Shall we not conclude that the master and his followers have assumed the falsest pretences, about unknown tongues and mind-affected miracles. Then this position condemns before rational religion, all the fabrications of christianity as the veriest mockery of honesty and truth. What an abomination when we hear men speak, do we not consider what they say?

Does the subject make any difference as to this requisition? Do preachers speak to savages and those of different language, without acting on the science of language? If the speaker be not understood, he induces no faith. We all appreciate understanding through the mind. How then can any kind of faith induce any exception. The advocate of the contrary, is unfaithful and dishonest.

What was faith of the dark and bloody ages of antiquity, but consistent with their science that had but little elevation?

When science expands to rational philosophy, civilization adorns rational religion.

The true missions are those of cultured mind in all legitimate functions, commerce, trade, and as much science as philosophy can inculcate. Religion will follow as a legitimate consequence.

God has planted the principles, and man must cultivate mind to recognise them by reason.

All rational minds need freedom and light of conscience to exclude the tyranny of peculiar faith.

All minds should have pure, holy, vital religion, and should be duly protected in such religious freedom; but let all be between them and their God without speculation.

Wise statesmen should take away all cause and pretence for temptation by private or public advantage. Of course, then, there can be no state-faith—which is state-despotism.

Pure religion is to protect mankind against encroachment of bad passions, acting in themselves or from others. In the existence of rational religion, when the varied storms of life assail the mind, its principles adapted for their propulsion, insure the triumphant victory. She can well say to the obsolete systems, let go old errors, and to their followers, do not let them ruin you. She makes due allowance for blindness of mind of the ancients, who were only partially impressed with the sacred obligations and the duties enjoined respecting religion, involved in essential errors from want of science as they were, and were misled by governmental demagogues. She now declares the light of the present day, blessed by the effulgence of philosophical science.

We all need her pure principles to save the world in its various errors, to circulate for the world's currency potent and self-evident indexes of enlightened philosophy, to eradicate peculiar faiths and all their substitutes of vicegerentships that arouse worse vices than they can extinguish.

This is proved even to nearly this present moment by the hostile imperial armies s fecting conservatism of mind, to put down the liberties of initiative republics of the world, and to reinstate its corrupt priestocracies and political despotisms.

Why do not rational religionists say, religion of the heart, and not of the mind?

Because faith of the heart is one of mechanical impulse, if any thing, peculiar enthusiasm, peculiar faith and doctrines; but that of mind, the only religion, carries reason and reason's God along with it.

The government and religion that give the greatest amount of good to the greatest number, are most rational.

The character of rational religion has an aristocracy over all other aristocracies of faith, when viewed by enlightened intellect.

She invokes the firmness expedient in all good things, in order to attain and maintain the fixed application of the greatest good.

Her position constitutes the only universal brotherhood now that all nations can recognise always in time and with affection of mind, that universally saves in time and space.

Her principles begin at the source, and endure with an endless creation.

Sectarians of all creeds and systems can lose their errors and names when they rally under her best light, where dwell peace and liberty. She knows no sectarianism in her spotless purity.

Nothing short of this position will satisfy an immortal mind, aspiring to God, participating in freedom here, and expecting fruition for manly and honest action hereafter.

Man has to avail himself of all wisdom to appreciate what is due the God of purity, before whose presence, which is The Holy Centre, all sin must fly the farthest.

When impulse, not mind, is foremost, especially with mothers, whose causality is small and mentality not deep, but whose maternal feelings are strong in the presence of children whom they have already committed by peculiar catechisms and sunday schools, this noblest gift to mind, arousing no ardent and noisy enthusiasm when she is entitled to silent courtesy, commends feelings that are deceptive, to be held in abeyance to reason, that is ever nearest right.

Though she estimates God's light as worthy of equal respect, but as the present sabbath suits our functions, the laws of nature and creation to promote mental and bodily elasticity, to protect from sensuality, to promote contemplation, observation, and commune with proper spirit, devoting one day in seven particularly to the consecration of divine thoughts on the Creator, to advance the cause of humanity and country, of civilization, popular associations, it is essential that wise laws should consecrate it to all such blessings without violation, except to indispensable business.

We are willing that this may be one of the great tests of social freedom and religious refinement.

Our night is a proper sabbath for the twenty-four hours for rest, one-fourth of that time consecrated by nature to the most delightful refreshment of sleep. The sabbath, as a day of rest for bond and free, man and beast, consecrated to the holiest purposes of humanity and the greatest blessings of mind, to secure the happiest results of civilization, and the greatest exemptions from barbarism that curses mind with its deadliest blast, should be rendered holy by wise legislation on the wisest principles.

Some people in the civilized part of the world, that ought to know and do better, work every day in the week, and do not regard the sabbath for any principles. There are no reasons that the superstitious require, but the soundest philosophy, that upholds the most stringent legislation under the wisest dictation of humanity.

God created all days alike, provable by works of creation, that moves on to all eternity.

The seven or more different sabbaths, and referring to the same thing essentially, declare that had God decreed an especial sabbath, the proof would be irrefutable by nature's works, that cannot be wisely suspended. All this nonsense about God's day is the fraud of the priestocracy.

There is no arrest of the revolution of this globe for that time, but all time is alike to God.

Philosophy, reason, and humanity bespeak rest of mind and body in regular business. All such may be properly suspended for recreation.

That may be a day for the whole world to observe at the same time, as far as practicable, but the main functions of time must go on without any sabbath.

It is remarkable that from the revolution of the globe in twenty four hours, that the same sabbath would differ much of that time in the sphere.

But monotheism bespeaks no sabbath, and great particular days for good deeds, as she exacts the best actions all the time.

Civilization and religion will not permit less than monotheism.

There are seven Sunday sabbaths in seven days by as many peculiar faiths, five of which at least, if not six, cannot be right or necessary on the principles of philosophy. Which did God make or mark? Only on philosophical and political or civic principles can such be established, for the rest of muscular created, not creative, power. With God such is absurd, as neither does the Creator nor his conservative principles rest.

Of course all bibles of such tradition bear prima facie evidence, the highest proof of their own falsity.

Now of all the errors of the world, the statement of the head of the family, generally held sacred, (if sacred by science, but not otherwise, through truth,) is longest maintained in the family archives. Superstition and ignorance uphold them. Men seek to be led, but in the name of God let them be led right, as the evil deeds of ignorance and vice prevent good actions.

We need the eternal, permanent, and immutable institution of principles, that will prevent any injury to the world, from the turbulent pretences of those incapable of abiding their imperative duty without penalties.

The voluntary choice and adoption of principles confer dignity, while compulsion presents ignominy.

The sabbath can be instituted for rest by mind, for the best blessings of mind and its physical circumstances, that must elicit its own best condition on this earth, as the highest tribute to, and the best evidence of free agency, the gift and endowment of the Creator, who should receive the adoration of the soul, tried in the theatre of adversity. We should, at least, devote every sabbath, one seventh of our time, to the proper contemplation of the God of nature, and the refined duties of social and religious discussions. Let us try to have the world avoid its, as all days', desecration, to the unholy purposes of peculiar faith in any respect whatever.

Some do a very small business when they complain of sabbath breaking, but not conscience breaking, in the usurpation of a messiah over God.

A day of rest is natural, desirable, a part of civilization. But it must be confessed, that one of the most powerful and singular exhibitions of superstition is the observance of sabbaths for the reasons assigned. Was this too one of the filchings of priestocracy from religious philosophy. Give all operatives rather two sabbaths than none, as that position will enhance and prolong their religious, physical, and moral worth and character, and sustain humanity. We are to duly estimate the best effects of mind's wisdom on human nature, and act to the best under all circumstances. We must give legitimate issues to all that is expedient.

What sabbath can God have compatibly with the analogy of man? Time does not qualify Deity, who ruleth eternity by his presiding supremacy.

"And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it."

Christians, do you sanctify that day? Do you believe the Jew bible? Is Christ's day preferable to God's? Do any of you adhere to the original, except the seventh day Baptists? Do you not, by rejecting the santified day, reject the bible, on which you assume your testament is founded? Did not the bible writers find the sabbath day established before them, by the natural divisions of the moon's quarters? The division of time into weeks of seven days dates as far back as Hesiod. If the Jew sabbath was established as holy and sacred, how could christians violate it at all? The violation of the Jew sabbath was punished with death by their laws. The christians have changed Judaism with as much reason as they changed the sabbath. It is clearly all pretension and sectarianism.

Monotheism speaks for herself, doubtlessly when she rightly would go legislating to maintain the great principles of humanity, if it were not interference with citizens' or the world's rights. If practicable with the world's rights, adequate protection ought to be extended to all needing it, beasts as man. But no greater wrong should be perpetrated by legislation under the guise of aiding peculiar faith notions. The great principles of religion, God-instituted, when once rightly appreciated, will be so conducive to the world's benefit as it will be to its entire civilization, that spontaneous adoption will follow necessarily. There will be no need of the Levites' sword, nor papal inquisitions, nor despotic excommunications. None but rational religion will ever institute society aright. All else is false pretences.

It devolves on the whole world to carry out these doctrines as speedily as practicable, as soon as justice will permit. Proper attention to the subject of the sabbath should be paid, to do justice to man's nature, under the most elevated view of religion. Enough action can be legitimately taken to make any people happy and flourishing. The people of the world can rejoice on that day.

The social ability of man is to be promoted by all legitimate, to make him a useful, honorable, and cheerful member of legitimate benefits.

To put social happiness beyond a contingency, humanity, a noble humanity to all creation, requires the best enjoyment, every sabbath, to man and beast, if practicable. The safest error will be to give more holidays than proper civil institutions call for. All animal fibre must be duly relaxed, and at no time over-exercised in common labor.

The master is responsible for all undue invasion of natural laws. The over-use of iron by friction is as bad, if not worse, than rust or oxydation by inaction, and teaches mind a lesson.

Will the peculiar faith man spend every sabbath day of his life to teach the false pretences of his faith, aye, even to his own children, fellow citizens? How degrading! Is it possible that parents will teach through the bible, the witch story of Saul? What low speculation! Is it possible that a cultivated mind can be found in the Union to believe all such miserable stuff? It is disgraceful. But the world will not use its right mind, but entrusts all to the priestocracy, who are interested in the most ignoble false pretences. Have you wisely employed time and talents, your mind justly to proper adoration of the proper object? otherwise you have blasphemed by idol worship. Your own peculiar bibles, corrupt as they are, condemn you. Desecrate no time to peculiar faith institutions.

As long as the God of monotheists exists, which will be forever, the universe will subsist on the conservative principles wherewith it was created, but the peculiar Jewish God could not create his heavens to last, if we believe the lying priestocracy, who affected to be very familiar with him. They knew as much of that as the colors of the sun and moon, affected by the atmosphere, falsely attributing them to those bodies.

Mind then could never entrust itself to their ignorant guidance in time, nor principles of eternity.

But how can we get at the conviction, that is worth nothing without practice?

Monotheism will fill a point unattainable to christianity, or any other earthly schism, sect, or dogma, and attain a dignity and worthiness lofty enough.

This will be conceded by intellectual refinement, that the purest minds can only exhibit.

It seeks man's universal adoration to his Creator Supreme, and needs no vicegerent but that of mind.

When the world is thus united it is impossible to better it. Philanthropy must acquiesce in its pure character.

The influence of religion honors the sceptre of executives, the wisdom of legislators, the purity of judges, and the justice of the people. Its true restraints are felt in every land.

But for this, the rights of a world-wide commerce would be preyed upon, and contracted to the piracy of the social circle.

Smuggling, that debases national morals, is checked by its conservative virtue; and the merchant or citizen assuming to fail, assigning property to fictitious or preferred creditors, having means to live on plentifully, and even in luxury, is accountable to this mighty power.

If there be no clue on the debtor, who is all fairness in getting credit, advancing false pretences, then he has no shame and no sense of guilt; and where there are no such principles recognised, you have no course of redress on his feelings or sense of conscience, and but little elsewhere if public sentiment be not sound.

When we see smuggling avowed by any legislators, then that country is corruptly governed indeed.

This endowment of mind, then, is the mighty conservative of man's noblest qualities.

But the state of mind is not up to her glorious requisitions. The legitimate expedients of mind must be realized in full capacity for general good.

When we see bigamy with the laws, what would it be without them. Give us wise laws, and their wisest enforcement, but above all, give us that which holds all in abeyance. If peculiar faith allows polygamy, what but religion can correct Judaism, Mahomedanism, or Mormonism.

Mind has become degraded by tyranny of government and peculiar faith, despotic customs both of obsolete ideas, till its nature is brutalized, and best condition is unknown to most of the world.

The greatest injustice next to these potent injuries, has been done it by scandal and libel.

The present condition of general society has been thereby disorganized and vitiated, in much of the world.

We need a sublime and conservative code of morals and religion, as a solace for all rational minds; the friend and adviser of the humble, a corrector of the haughty, and guide to all the world, to promote universal wisdom and liberty. Where is such? Is this because mind shrinks from its own?

Tell us, nations oppressed by debts, the interest of which you cannot fairly, yearly meet, and the capital of which you cannot extinguish. Did ye spend all that honor required and policy dictated, pouring forth every generous tribute of mind that is yet held subordinate?

Tell us, history, for what so many millions have been slaughtered, so many billions expended, for vain man, ignoble and ignorant after all his assumptions and vainglorious ambition? Was it for those baubles that cannot be held, peculiar church and state faith despotisms? It was because philosophy, the height of proper sense, was not heard in the revelry of false faith and government, that have oppressed and crushed mind's holiest rights.

What cared the ancients, but for conquests or peculiar benefits? Was it not the triumph of their peculiar faith?

All sects and divisions will eternally contend with each grand system, as well as with each other, clash and conflict; but all that believe in Deity alone, and his attributes, will be ever unable to contend at all about rational tenets, but must live in general peace and good will to all rational men.

Rational religionists have no popes to give away the inheritance of the nations of the globe, because these nations are not sectarians.

Their creed is not to war for religion, but to reason for its improvement.

They bow to no degrading man and idol worship, but adore God with the profoundest reverence.

They have the illustrious authority of philosophy, in her retinue.

Good ideas can be suggested by true religion only. What can prayers do?

Do they move God, that is unchangeable and above all shadow of change? A God of principle, that is to govern the universe?

God cannot change his principles, without change of the universe! What then is to be changed, but man? Before we say aught we must seek to make ourselves worthy of the audience of extraordinary purity and justice.

We must look to our own best deeds and actions, as the very best prayers to be addressed as respectors of principles before the tribunal of the great author of them.

Mercy may be yielded by the soul of nature, to the right petitioners, who cannot have vicegerents or substitutes.

But we must recollect that we have to appear in the audience-chamber of principles, that rightfully introduce us to the divine majesty of the Supreme.

We have to cherish and cultivate most faithfully their acquaintance, to reach all desirable and rational expectations.

Mere enthusiasm, spiritualization, messiahship nor saintship, will profit us nothing; it is principles alone that will safely conduct us.

All that rational religion teaches, is the improvement of individual self; it requires each to get better on times reading by seeking the attainable good.

It suits and is adapted to the true physiology and phrenology of the mental organization, and scouts the corruption that is introduced by priestcraft, in lieu of the original position and nature.

All the world should philosophize upon its necessary position, as equal in knowledge to the best, who are the veriest impostors to do more.

The principles that direct the belief in God, direct to proper sincerity that unites all minds, and must convert them if independent of malign influences.

What shall we do to make man right?

Peculiar faiths that involve false positions and hypocrisy, if not ignorance, will never rectify him surely. Then man must be altogether, on correct whole principles that vindicate themselves. Such will carry him through to the holy Deity, centre of residence, or the attainable point of future happiness.

Then down with all others that ruin the whole world. They are tolerated, till mind can rescue itself.

Man was created on physiological and phrenological principles, by which he is governed universally. This caused the world's worthies to die like men. No one can do more; if he assume it, he is an impostor.

There is but one God, and he rules by inherent attributes, his creation in supreme unity.

Unity reigns triumphantly in the excellence of its supremacy, while trinity or polytheism is a botch of mind that jars in discord, and reigns in imbecility. All its creeds are devices of art, and all are purely matters of perverted sophistry.

Its numbers may be indefinite, all assuming to be infallible, yet the mind corrected by proper principles, and left free, to exercise the best just judgment, discards them all as trash.

They all begin wrong, and confound the noblest tuition.

Children under their guidance must be badly raised, as they are suffered and shown the way to become vicious in deceit, untruth and dishonesty.

Who can wonder at the defects of society?

Habit in them as in all, is hard to eradicate. They are sophists from their cradle, and bigots in old age.

Happy is the youth that can escape such toils.

See, then, statesmen of the world, that there is then a correct exercise of mind and body.

But science and philosophy will not answer to decide for religion! What else have we to correct "the average of mere public opinion, a mere collection of prejudices, foibles and errors?" This pretence is advanced by the thoughtless vassals of priestocracy, who place the last ignorant and interested instead!

These are they who absurdly advance the opininion that nothing is impossible with God.

With the God of the universe, all things are not possible, as vicious imbecility of permitting his creation to be governed by man's messiah.

God can do nothing under the present declared position, without science and philosophy, his attributes in or out of religion.

Hence they are absolutely necessary and essential to expel false faith, and that causes impostors to commit themselves most absurdly. Then it is utterly impossible for all such libels to be acceptable to God. It is utterly impossible that God can like them.

What government and religion are best, but those that ever give to the sovereign people the greatest good, not only to the greatest, but the whole number?

We must all live a pure and upright life, that is blessed by correct principles that govern the social circles.

True religion enables man to tower over despondency, as she only gives the triumph of correct principles.

Unity in religion will embrace unity in government, two of mind's greatest blessings.

When science reaches the greater unity of language, as far as possible, then several of the most brilliant annunciations will begin to be realized on the unity of God's principles.

Religion itself depends on science and philosophy, the highest and deepest, to evolve it rightly, showing the best diligence of rational minds.

Religion, then, must be of itself the surest philosophical science.

Conscience, that directs it, is enlightened at this fountain. Religion has grown best, with right education, that elicited correct principles, which were all the gift of God.

Religion is a latent quality, best shown by rational mind, not by irrational minds. It must be most elevated by cultivated science.

It is not the gift of industrial organization, conferred by churches, as it is universal in its foundation where rational mind can be developed.

When most rational, it displays the security of just reward, for the mental labor.

It is a constitutional, or conservative revolutionist, not the passive reformer.

Show us the bible of mind, that of God's inspiration, and you will inspire us with the holiest reverence for it as God's.

The bible of mind can be the only bible, and can counteract the usurpation of bibles of tradition, that have created a host of petty despotism, by the little cliques in their bible way, blue laws and all.

Thus we see that this slavery of mind horribly vitiates it.

Religion will protect all, but it must be rational and vital religion, such as God alone justifies.

It sounds like purity to have its principles from an immaculate Being, creator and protector of his universe, having the affection and the power.

If we make the application of the right test, that circumstances allow, religion is admitted to be love to God and man, with comprehensive active benevolence.

Resistance to resistance may be necessary, from the depraved state of man's nature, but when expedient, what forbids the comprehension of the only policy to civilize and embrace the whole world in the ample folds of its protection. If we adopt the right and righteous principles to govern the world, we adopt God's righteous government, instituted therefor.

Let all, then, know neither Jew nor gentile, Christian, pagan, Juggernaut, mormon, nor any but the true belief in one eternal God, who needs no vicegerents, and excludes all in his present government.

God does not let his works be mistaken by man's right mind, that comes in with prior claims to establish the right polity, his duty to God and society.

In religious duties we can supersede with no blank and omission, but must act up to the full commission and duty. The whole is to be filled up aright.

We require and give proof for all things, the most valuable above all.

Where error prevails, let all go, as worthless.

If mighty mortals fall, let truth stand; then philosophy and science will prove the facts of the world to the entire satisfaction of the beneficiaries.

Let all principles stand, and no more than their truthful code; then no matter about time and custom, as error is so much the worse, the older.

Truth is all, no matter how young.

All men are to be estimated by their deeds and constant actions, as the best letters of commendation are the proof of one's own deportment all the time.

But we must refine, on our present improvement of age. All the systems of the world, past, present, and to come, can only go for what they are worth, before the tribunal of God, whose unity decides the whole question of religion.

Let us seek, by the powers and principles of mind, for the noblest and best appreciation that can be elicited. Let principles be espoused and all vain error rejected, no matter how identified with power and influence.

None but eternal principles can answer.

Sectarian views, in anything, will not answer at all, as they do not touch, much less comprehend the subject. Our views of civilization are always in respect to proper testimony of the mind. The freer the mind, the purer its civilization.

The right basis and test must be ever present, as rational religion cannot pass the impassable gulf of sectarianism, but endowed in the rich exclusive gifts of God, exclusive only to wilful impostors, she can soar to the circumference of the world on expanded wings of comprehensive benevolence, and embrace the whole universe by her beneficence. All codes of true faith are behind her times and the necessity of human nature, in too many particulars. The subject of religion is truly behind the age. It is her voice that inculcates her principles, those of the God of the universe, not of any messiah, who never originated one iota of principles, that were correct, if misleading from the adoration of the Supreme alone. She teaches man to eschew all undue passion and improper emotions, that affect the serenity of temper, or that disturb the equilibrium of mind, and thus removes him best from fear and anger, as best from superstition, to the trust in supremacy.

In listening to the tuition of science and philosophy, he best respects her voice that nobly sustains his strongest confidence and hope in the one efficient Power.

Who but that divine Power created him?

To whom does the creature belong but the Creator?

It is not the name of the thing, but the thing itself, that the eternal wise intelligence of the Almighty respects.

What is religion, but the duty of the creature to his Creator?

From whom do the gifts of the creature emanate, but from the Creator?

Whence beauty of person, talents, gifts of mind?

Are they not God's? You have never analyzed this subject rightly, else you could not miss the right conclusion.

Self-denial comes in for a large portion of due attention from the truly religious, the worthy patriots and humanists of the world, who practice it, under the benign influence of rational philosophy, to be exalted by rational religion, that gives it the best and complete direction.

All good and wise philosophers will affirm, that an enlightened way of regulating mind on universal principles must be adopted, for successful regulation of all; but before that time arrives, minds see differently, and require all the wisdom of wise legislation and education to help settle the difficulties of the world.

Rational religion is the only one, simple and complete of itself, from God and for God, ever existent in every rational mind, whose capital has been stupidly usurped by priestocracy, as if its own.

This, as a proper science, needs no enlightened code of ethics, for all mankind to act justly, on the just relation of things.

All have religion that have rational minds, that are under the Supreme obligation of making it rational, and improving it according to their gift of reason.

A cultivated science of rational religion gives the world the very best attainable, relative to the state of mind cultivated.

Religion is the science of sciences, and must be proportionate to civilization, mental culture, and talents.

Truth and honesty are the corner-stones of religion. Those who violate these can hardly possess the balance, as these are the platforms.

If these principles are admirable, how adorable must be their Author?

What a difference in things prevails in all peculiar faiths, that present the reverse of adoration! True religion is exalted by its noble Author.

Peculiar faith degrades its adopters, who imitate only the counterfeiter and usurper! What mind can hesitate, in the choice of the two?

Much censure then can be avoided for candor and friendly feelings. The true appreciation of things can be nearer approached, and will be much better practiced.

Money, by her criterion, will be only valuable for the proper independence, not excese and plethora of wealth that enslaves the possessor, engrosses his best time and qualities, and prostrates his best virtues, unless he have proper guards, enervates his prosperity, and may deprive him of seeking a sound education, and means of suitable promotion of mind's noblest gifts.

There are few exceptions.

Above all, money or wealth should never be any where, much less in a republic, a means of absolutism, defying enlightened public opinion, outraging and escaping conviction.

Money is valuable for the proper independence, secured in commanding circumstances, and equalizing all in glorious virtuous republicanism.

Such a state should be realized in chastening opinions by practice, in the vicissitudes of life.

True wisdom is that which can direct to the best advantage the proper usages of society, and the best progress of improvement, best promoted by freedom of mind, that has thus its best scope.

All good intellectual circles ought to advance and estimate all this.

What produces a right sincerity in religion?

A right exemption from temptation to do wrong by speculation; none, but the unostentatious practice of the sterner virtues and principles, because they produce the only best and true ethics, founded on the great laws of nature, and nature's God and soul.

Should not rational mind attend to all this?

But religion is a science, abstract and difficult.

It merely requires proper sense and honesty to work it out rightly.

Some have not been taught principles except through penalties, while all should get them by precept and example, and imbibe them rightly, otherwise their imperfect and contingent indoctrination may involve the delinquents in all the difficulties, and penalties of vices and crimes,

How much of God's funds are passing in this world, unobserved and unappreciated by mankind, if heard of?

The vast funds of mind have to lie dormant under the regime of bibles of tradition!

What an outrage on the principles of mind!

The trust-fund, a creation-birth right, can never be fully appreciated, nor used in mind's present vassal state and mode of acting, when deprived of its innate energy, to exercise its innate principles for the best function of its gifts.

Mind must be taught to feel that the God of the universe is exclusively the God of conservative principles, and that it must depend on uniform and consistent principles of rectitude for its best guard, protection, and defence in life.

Cultivated and rational mind has yet to learn that mere coalition of church members, is not the quintessence of these principles.

Creeds will not begin to answer, unless they subserve the whole purpose of constitutional principles of religion.

Manners that bespeak the outward demeanor, as flowing from polished courtesy, good proper sense and feelings, are essential to man and society, but a loftier purpose arises in duty to God.

Reason, with her best aids, analysis and analogy, leads us to the extreme limit of God's existence, where data fail, and honesty stops, then mind cannot act further, after all the false pretences of peculiar faith and her legends.

But if some affect that morality and mind are not to be respected, as the essentials of religion, they can tell us the reason to separate this family.

Will any honest, truthful mind, pretend to see such a distinction, without the reason for the difference?

In God's philosophy, both belong to the same family.

But then, if rational religion prevail, where is spirituality? What is that but God's inspiration in all truthful and honest minds?

What more spirituality can exist, than that rational means should prepare the immortal spirit, by the best purposes for immortal fruition?

Rational religion must speak of things as rational.

Rational minds must learn to drop all images of fanaticism of past ages, that had so many obsolete ideas.

A very small portion of most church members, may be as good as human nature can be under their circumstances, but the balance certainly not as good, but worse than religion asks for.

What will spiritualization do for either of them, half as well as rational religion, that is the exact science of their being, and only adapted to their sincere and rational improvement that necessarily embraces all that is spiritual at the same time?

Rational religion only asks for mind's rational improvement.

Mannerism differs entirely as much from manners in being an adherence to customs and fashions of customs, as distinguished from innate courtesy and benevolence of mind, the liberal soul of man, as peculiar faith does from true faith, which is rational religion.

Peculiar faith can only be an imitator at best, and a disguise at the worst, of religon.

The action of true rational religion has been on earth with mind's existence, however silent and unobserved by the superficial and the fanatical, still she has done help in all circles to promote the teaching of virtue, morality, and good state of morals, that are claimed to prevail by excellence of peculiar faith! Who can overlook the virtue of mind?

The light of mind is the pure gospel after God.

Religion calls for the protection of conscience above all things of interest, as the good effects of a sound mind, not misled by vice and its temptations.

Conscience is then best fortified against the haunts, as the hands of others seeking advantages.

The most energetic proof before the world, is that we should so act privately as publicly, as to make all relatives, friends and citizens, satisfied with our actions.

Rational religion requires the highest humanity from rational beings. None lose by civility and courtesy to all, much less by kindness to servants. The very beasts are more profitable by great humanity.

No committee, or authority official, can legalize doctrines not established in the Divine Code of God, much less annul any principles. All the councils of earth could not make a peculiar bible of any force and virtue.

Many may and do deceive themselves in regard to all the acts of their peculiar codes and faiths, but all such have no peculiar principles appropriated, as God's system has all the principles known.

Judgment concentrates several virtues of the individual, and repels the effects of fear and other depressing emotions, that operate injuriously on most of mankind in sickness, of various difficulties innumerable, counteracting the destruction of virtue.

It enables its possessor to keep an equilibrium well balanced, and on guard all the time, above fear and reproach, least excited by passions, that ought to be controlled.

All possible superiority of virtue renders the possesor equal to the world, capable of facing bravely all its opposition.

With the man of judgment, the functions of times can be most present, as he can always promptly consider those things that require proper timely action, that once lost, cannot be recalled.

This faculty bestows the best recognition of life-time affairs, and none less of rational religion.

We need religion without superstition, never enjoyed hitherto generally, on account of peculiar faith, as well as government without tyranny.

A conscientious individual desires nothing equivocal or contingent, when he has to draw on a fund of uniform principles. He seeks wisdom and all practical common sense, and ever shuns cunning as contemptible. He seeks a liberal rational discussion to improve the qualities of mind, not merely to come off victorious in sophistry.

He cultivates good qualities, to avoid the bad. With such position countries become less corrupt the older they become, as possessed of rightful means they necessarily improve.

He seeks to analyze the difference, between religion and peculiar faith.

The first he finds to ennoble, the last to degrade the nature of mankind: the first to demand truth, the last to require power. Gratify the first and she blesses; yield to the last and she abuses her trust by persecution and bloodshed. Monotheism invokes the soundest reasons to close all errors, if mind leaves improper constructions of her immutable truths.

Sulphur and brimstone sophistry, will not do it. Monotheism takes the only tenable right course in things and holds it to the end, never to desert the God of nature, or be deserted by his noble principles.

She asks for no military renown or glory of chieftains, no gorgeous outlays of power, and instead of worldly pomp and display, requires that the money legitimately raised be appropriated for school-houses and teachers of science, to invest mind with its best calibre, quality and capacity.

Her light excludes the propagation of peculiar faith doctrines, that her's eclipses.

With her, the sooner equality of rights is given the world by conquest of mind, the better.

With her, toleration is the friend of man.

She promotes proper self-government nationally and individually, as the highest dignity of all governments. There can be no opinion for there is no analogy, to affect this position.

Monotheism requires no political or faith propagandism by particular missions, except through the science of mind whose benefits are universal.

Wise statesmen cannot oppose this, as they are the best agents, not the corruptors of the people.

It is right that monotheism should disabuse the mind of the world on the subject of religion, that the mind of the world should disabuse itself.

She must be independent of speculation and powers of government, as it ought ever to be and must be the noblest as purest of actions, separate from all the adverse machinery of priestocracy.

Monotheism is the great leading question; all others are sectarian and led.

She considers it right to believe that God can do all the works of preservation after all the principles established prove it, without being taxed above the measure of the ability of the operating power, that the creation imposes.

God will certainly not dishonor the right draft.

We can well appreciate what kind of religion presents the very highest order of morals and ethics.

If we cannot find truth and reason in the bible, where can we expect to find it in its peculiar faiths?

Which is orthodox but rational religion, that increases only from the purest culture of mind, looks to all such immutable principles that vindicate themselves in penalty of vices, presents the highest views of all science, and illustrates by physiology its benefits?

She refers man's thoughts, words, and actions, to the highest earthly tribunal, when pure and enlightened, that of his own conscience; that reflects all the pure operations of his own mind and reason, corrected by enlightened public opinion, their highest exponent.

Her's is the security for the best condition of life in this world, and in the future.

The best promotion of all such, is the best science—education. All should be pleased to respond to the just demands of nature, illustrated by the highest civilization of mind, and fulfil the requirements of all the affections; filial, parental and conjugal, to soothe the paths of aged parents, to enlighten children, and fulfil the highest obligations to families, in the course of life with becoming dignity and action.

Our obligations to our country, the world, universe and their Creator, should require a higher elevation of our daily thoughts, by meditating on the vital blessings of that happy land where freedom of mind dwells and rational religion abides, where we can aspire every way for the best earthly happiness, undisturbed the least to meet death, one of nature's noblest and greatest functions, the soul-purifier, with a conscience least void of offence to God and man, as the action of a wise and self-studying Being.

Such theatre, gives best scope for effort.

Thus all rational minds have much duty to perform, as all things of earth require of an immortal mind, the bright light of a bright age that looks to God.

We need mind-ethics, and must look to the great laws and principles of an immutable infinite Being.

Belief in one true God unites all faiths into one religion, destroys all sects and creeds of sects, makes men candid, moral, virtuous, independent of all kinds of faith-craft, cant and hypocrisy, as aliens to religion, as it takes away all the temptations, shows truth, and excludes sophistry with bravery, diminishes perjury, places man at once in the presence of his God, whose providence superintended his actions all the time, and rendered his life as a moral agent more or less accountable under his peculiar or personal circumstances.

The reverse is verified by the doctrines of peculiar faith, that publishes to the world as its own, what is the property of God.

Why should not rational religion be silent in God's presence? What have availed all the babblings of peculiar faith? The silence of rational religion effects all good, while peculiar faith has been blustering, brutalizing mind, outraging its rights, misleading, by her infatuation, bullying it with her brute force, deluding it with her abominable sophistry.

With all this load of iniquity, man not God, has to change. Religion asks for no dangerous peculiar school, but that which is safe, pure and just, most rational.

The citizens of the world have to rid themselves like intelligent freemen, of all feudal habits, and seek liberal, rational, conservative principles.

Under these circumstances, rational religion asks for no weak, meagre and doubtful or doubting faith, but inherently just and adequate.

Rational religion is the only representative of principles of God, and they constitute an impenetrable phalanx. To do justice to this whole subject, nothing can be more important than a well balanced and cultivated mind, in all the social and religious obligations.

This individual state refers back to the general principles of phrenology that is founded on the eternal and fundamental basis of physiology.

Scientific people can appreciate all this, and cast off the shackles and false pretences of the fraud of monopoly, no matter from what source.

Thus the destiny of the world will not be referred to fatalism and occult astrology, demonology, or lunacy, but will be left to rest on the eternal principles of philosophy, as given it at its creation by the Creator.

Analysis in a court of justice shows human nature's characteristic, the action of perverted mental organs.

Rational religion gives mind its full rights, corrects it, raises it to its best capacity.

She is the only cure for trickery, and charlatanry of thought, and vanity of earth, under the best view of proper sense, and enables the world to estimate man's action more than his words, but herself estimates both rightly.

While she fosters eclecticism on the principle of will for the deed, until toleration can be superseded by conservative revolution, that constitutes her order of mind, distinguished for refined intellect, she teaches principals the knowledge of the government of their families.

She directs the world not to sacrifice to mere fancy, and informs us that religious duty will enable all rational mortals to meet in a rational way the dragon of superstitious terror, and breathe with conscientious satisfaction in the universal mirror of truth.

What do mankind need, as soon as reason dawns and mind acts? A mantle to cover their physical and mental nakedness. They need a moral code to be at the same time intellectual, to protect and defend their weakness. Who does not wish to be guarded from the blasphemy of feeling, thought, word, or deed, as from misanthropy?

It is wonderful that we do not commit greater errors than we do, influenced and misled by the superficial and crude opinions and errors of others, who assume to dictate their views and interests on society.

WHAT IS CONVERSION, BUT A RATIONAL IMPRESSION?

Conversion consists not in mere outward changes or speculations, but internal conviction resulting from the lights of conscience on the necessity of reformation, and using the conservative principles, by a proper respect and compliance with their requisitions to the best of personal ability.

It is not fashion or mere opinion, but satisfactory facts and their proper fruits; a proper deportment in thoughts, words and deeds.

To whom does it show fealty, by man?

To God alone. There can be no real benefit from mere excitements, and impulses of intense passions.

Religion is and must be a principle of due and adequate action or practice, paid truly to the great and living God, as reason construes, united with all the feeling that conscientious right actions can impart to one satisfied with doing the best, hoping the most, fearing the least, but confiding, as safest, under the loftiest and highest protection of the Almighty Architect of the universe. It is built up on the noblest principles conservative for rewards, self-vindicative for penalties.

The best confidence is the most rational, built on a wise comprehension of duty and its noblest execution.

But the doctrine of falling from grace, an opponent says, produces "fatal delusions in regard to conversion, and the mind bewildered and distracted amid the storm, is rendered utterly incapable of deciding, with judgment and accuracy, anything as to its operations or experience"! And reason at last is admitted.

"Many enter the church unconverted," admitted by churchmen.

Conversion will do, so far as mind is capable of right action, without "forced faith," and no farther for us. But the opponent of falling from grace admits, that this fatal delusion of "the many that enter the church unconverted," may extend to the fourth time, or even oftener, and yet this prevails in the operations of minds seeking after immortal happiness.

The correction of this potent evil is called for, by the advocate against falling from grace. The potent evil, is the base most radically wrong.

Radical errors can be corrected only in looking to God alone, and his attributes, by rational beings.

Gratitude that ennobles the manly independence of mind, is due to God alone, as Creator.

The highest reverence is only shown by admission of God's functions, faculties, attributes, and principles. To divide them out, is to lessen that sense and feeling.

All his qualities unimpaired, beget affection and love; and constant obedience arises as a matter of unerring certainty.

God can arouse the noblest emotions and actions on principles, due him from the mind thus instructed in the highest and best.

All others bring blasphemy, and their contradiction impairs confidence, and bespeaks low degrees of feelings.

We leave out fear and blind faith that govern the slave of superstition, but appeal to reason and mind, that dignify the freeman.

The mind of man is taught to estimate purity, by that attribute of God.

It is his power alone that saves man all the time, when blasphemous vicegerents were naught, and have become less.

Mind's fidelity is due to God alone, expressed by rational religion.

Duty to God and man begets rational religion, gratitude, and love, takes away terror, and substitutes confidence, supersedes contingency for uniformity, gives a universal brotherhood for fragments and sects; science and education for ignorance and feudalism, an Almighty God for an imbecile vicegerent mortal, the freeman for the slave and vassal, mind for blind submission, and reason for guide and helm; sincerity for self-delusion, elements and principles not to clash, for clashing dogmas and schisms—and above all, that the eye of an Eternal Ruler is ever present, and a ready providence ever potent.

This will teach man to act as best comports with his nature, doing what its capacity enables and its character justifies, advancing in light of mind and liberality of feeling, improving in the fruits of knowledge that enlargeth the understanding.

Our religious creed places us, unalterably, at monotheism. Should we advance any farther? How can we do so, as that position reaches to God, the supreme?

The bibles of all traditions will be most demoralizing and fatally immoral, whereas rational religion is and can only present the safe faith in the bible of mind, that must seek to be critically exact in moral, religious, and physical science and philosophy.

The bible of mind pays no respect to authority, but as that authority accords with reason—any other cannot suit even slaves.

No freeman can give in his adhesion to any, but rational religion.

She teaches whatever be thy impulses, let them not carry thee ever beyond reason and principles.

Farther than that, is not the path of safety.

She teaches us, then, to look in the might and majesty of mind, to the might and majesty of God, to the power of reason, and the purity of principle.

To adore none, no authority written, oral or personal, but what supreme reason commands mind, when it looks devoutly to God Almighty alone.

The only rational religion, as the only true path of safety, consists in being reasoned into faith and belief.

The bible of rational mind alone, gives us the safe and correct moral, intellectual, rational, and religious faith.

No other bible excludes the thousand and one bibles, that innovate on principles of the God of nature, the right and virtues of rational mind.

No other bible excludes iniquity and sin, in the true and full legitimate comprehension of perpetual safety.

Hers is the tuition to turn all passions into their legitimate channel, and use no enjoyment thereof, other than what accords with true principles.

No genuine confidence in any other than rational faith can be at all conclusive to any proper religion.

Pure religion increases in the growth of wisdom, the benevolence of deeds, and in the truth of science.

Let religion flourish by the disinterested system, that spiritualizes the world through God's universal inspiration.

How many ignorant people in the world affect to know all about religion, the science of all sciences, the sympathy of all sympathies, and yet have hardly one idea in their minds about any of its dignity?

Knowing ourselves sinners, let us seek ever to sin the least, as the safest position practicable for all souls. Most can avoid extremes of sickness if they will timely correct their case, so in law and sin.

Our sickness, adversity and prosperity should be wisely estimated as blessings in disguise, and should elevate the thoughts of the creature to the Creator.

Our life may be spared out a few more years, and let that be a benefit to our fellow citizens and creatures, not an oppression.

The great institution of religion, God's best principle, ought to create the most enlarged views and actions of the virtues.

The best exercise of religion results in rightful actions of mind, through reason to God alone.

Can those advocating rational religion differ? They can never differ materially, for they all believe in the essential doctrine of God alone. Where they seem to differ, they will find the error theirs, one way or the other, not very material, and that such have not investigated the whole subject. Who has?

Good men and true can be nothing less than monotheists. What is there to mortals, but the immortal God's gift, religion? What nobler benefit can there be to mind?

The secret societies that apparently divide the globe into so many clans, antagonistical to the enlarged and liberal benevolence of the world, must give up their cohesion of clannishness, and attend to the invocation of universal brotherhood, that looks to the sublime majesty of principles. The whole world must do this.

Who can give greater safety to all than the helm of God, who is the First Great Cause?

The people must not overlook their own responsibility in this life, at all times.

Give us reason, mind enlightened, liberal and just laws, right and freedom of the people.

Can the people be more justly dealt with under God's guidance?

WHAT IS SPIRITUAL RELIGION?

It cannot be of peculiar faith at all, most assuredly.

Can there be any but the only rational religion, and is not that co-existent with the very first creation of mind?

Mind is identified with it forever, most clearly.

To best elicit all that is legitimate, rely on reason, not tradition, as the highest of all earthly authorities. Persevere in correct principles, whereby you may reach good ripe fruit; otherwise the fruit may be bitter, green or decayed by rot.

Theology, then, cannot be too pre-eminently a free subject for rational discussion, but the human mind has been not only trammeled in all its best powers, but superstition and bigotry to suit the times, and the gods of idolatry, with the interest of the minority, have forced to increase their absolutism, by even military brutes forced mind to the enslavement by peculiar faith, that acts as a fashion of the season for a few centuries, and is no more.

More misery has been entailed on the billions of the world from all this degraded machinery, than all others. This is one of the great bases of all evil. It has been like cutting off the head to direct mind, which it has outraged by usurpation of its rights. It has depraved and demoralized mind all the time, with some few exceptions.

Let him who affects to claim aught for peculiar faith show any of its intrinsic fruits, above what good minds and true, rightly civilized, can effect.

Billions of minds have never heard preaching in their lives; has God not provided them with mind's tuition nevertheless?

The fault is in the people, who must not deceive themseves about the means of their own action, civil and religious, then others cannot deceive them.

Her faith combines all that is reasonable with what is just, arousing the proper qualities of mind, the intellect, in its best views of wisdom.

Not otherwise can we prevent absolutism, combined as state, church and military despotism, the most powerful and odious tyranny.

Religion is the right action of minds to God and man. This subject is universal, to mind and the world.

Rational religion imparts all that is great in goodness.

It corrects those who might be incorrigibly dissolute and vicious, but only on rational principles.

The prime and the whole of life are well spent in their exercise, for she asks for no impracticable faith.

She requires the best of good works in an unpretending manner.

But the supremacy of rational religion is gloriously paramount, and vindicative of God's attributes, when she triumphantly rules out and silences, by her august presence, all the false pretences of all ignoble peculiar faiths.

She alone is the only true exponent of the God of nature, Creator of the universe.

She tries all by her own just tribunal, of her own standard of merit and trustworthiness.

It is she only that rightly responds to the question, what proof is there of any divine writers or writings? Her just analysis declares, none, for all is imposition. Monotheism alone can save; her institutions, without speculation, should be reared for the world's benefit. Let her press and teachers do their duty.

Let her permanent benefits be felt throughout the world; causing mind to rejoice in the purest joys of existence, as the landscape of nature's rearing reflects the joy of the birds that sing and carol on trees in the rich green of spring, and the variegated gorgeous display of autumn. Let her acts be strict justice of mind to be cultivated, and reflect on the happiness of mankind, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and comforting the blind, aged and helpless, as an indispensable, legitimate duty. Let wise organic laws fix the equilibrium that will dispense what is to be done. Let her rebuke the false expenditures of pride, rearing palaces and churches for fifty and one hundred millions of money, while the mind of the people is uncultivated, and their organic constitutional rights unredressed.

Rational religion suffers no sophistry of faith to pollute the inmost recesses of the minds of her followers, nor prevent the right perception of their judgment, nor degrade their right action by any malign influence or interest.

She will produce rational and individual righteousness, that consists in the purity and honesty of purpose and actions, and calls for positive laws, to be executed for life; all the blessings of civilization, that excludes wanton injuries, violence, murders, that go unpunished among cliques and clans on account of the temporizing mockery of corruption and of sophistry, in all their wiles.

We need to be exempt from the contingency of deception.

What can do that but rational religion?

The code of rational religion destroys any idea of skepticism, as that code is definite, and rests on definite principles. The only remedy for schism, is reason and rational mind. The standard for unity, is the God of unity.

The Romanists number some thirty-four schisms in their church.

The great schism of the west, lasted forty or fifty years. Who are the christians, but a great schism of Judaism, arising as a sect on other sects, as Samaritans.

What greater hatred was there than between the Jews on one side, and the Christians, Samaritans, &c., on the other? And are these characters pretending to teach mankind to follow them? Do they want more vassals?

All main advocates of peculiar faith, are hostile, as Mahometans and Christians. Where then is their love?

God's conservative principles do assist man to good, and are a restraint upon evil actions, as they constitute the constant circumstances.

Where then is man's pretence about other vicarious means that are perfectly nugatory and idle before God?

Rational religion advances in the best lights of rational mind's solution, a fixed fact as old as creation, but dependent on mind, the beneficiary for evolution. She asks for improvement of the bible of rational mind, with the best of sincerity. We all need this, as the bibles of tradition prove no valuable characteristics of worship, much less of high-minded adoration.

How can such bibles prove the immortality of the soul, when they are not endorsed by proof of themselves?

The thousand pretences of miracles and prophecies, are no proof. They are all false pretences.

We may be told as if in triumph of some being fulfilled, as we hear of the winnings, not the losses of gamblers. No mortal can claim to be prophet. The intrinsic character of such claim proves him impostor.

How many thousands of Hebrew, nay, of the world's augurs, are unknown, as ignobly false and degraded.

That province so foolishly looked for by the world, was never given to mortal or earthly inhabitant,—never. The human character becomes debased too low for appreciation by the corruption of sectarianism, which is rebuked most severely by the moral triumph of rational religion. She teaches the world to bow to universal rights, justice, courtesy and liberality.

She teaches woman's elevation equal to man in all countries and in all governments, and that her education be not perverted by imperfect and imbecile systems, superstition, ignorance or prejudice.

Analysis of all things is essential to truth, hence the absurdity of any faith that receives all for granted.

Rational religion requires restitution of all overpaid, as the duty of the debtor, without limit of time, what conscience enlightened requires.

To injure no character sooner than property, and hold all such sacred by the laws of God and man.

All systems of faith short of rational religion, are imperfect, defective and vicious, when tried on this position.

A universal benevolence by the universal brotherhood, is the order of rational religion, that unfolds new beauties and worth the older creation grows, a universal beneficence of rational mind. The whole comprehension of this subject is in good faith, nor can any part be basely withheld by peculiar faith, whose doctrines prove that the whole code should be constantly embraced.

The only faith that religion that is rational can know, is good faith to be carried out in due faithfulness.

Mankind are too credulous and disposed to take for granted as truth and science, what requires the fullest investigation and elucidation.

Impostures at every age, especially in the dark and ignorant, have been most wantonly propagated by men whose conscience for truth was measured by self-interest and sordid inducements; above all, by the sophistry and power of governmental despotisms.

Monotheism comes to cut down the atheist and polytheist, and establish the only principles of rational religion.

She modestly submits all to the light of mind and reason of rational beings, and claims nothing but what is self-evident. No messiahship can be her companion, as she proves all counterfeit, and utterly unworthy of her and mind.

She goes for no fancy, fashion, custom or institution of that kind.

She invokes solely God's principles, to govern mind in morals as the universe in physical potency.

Rational religion asserts no pre-eminence, for all have it, and good minds can improve it more or less in all parts of the world, thanks to the Creator of religion as well as mind, its recipient.

By works, all are proved in truth and reason to reach faith. All that are sincere cannot be hypocrites, as rational religion offers no speculation, but demands exclusion of all that can corrupt mind, and especially all that can delude it.

Rational religion is the universal greatest good for all, and must take precedence of all, just as much as the Creator, its only object of adoration, takes precedence of all others who must be his creatures.

Wisdom, science and learning, take precedence in defining religion that is proved by the superiority of its character, that must be necessarily rightly formed. Above all, is Monotheism, that must exclude all peculiar faith the day that science and philosophy triumph.

It is the part of science-advocates to record facts, and modestly hold themselves in abeyance till further discoveries verify the solution.

The creed of rational religion is as old as mind, and the best that legitimacy and genuine purity can make it.

We absolutely need rational religion to govern fanatical atheists and monomaniacal blasphemers; neither can survive in her pure atmosphere.

She commands the sword to be sheathed that has been uplifted for the world's age, and invites the pen of reason that has been banished all, except the civilized world.

But for the remedy of rational religion, the age of superstition triumphs, and that of atheism must follow.

The sacrifice of reason by sectarianism, invokes humanity, philanthropists and statesmen to analyze all this for their good and the benefit of all.

The wise men of legislation must counteract by superior states of mind, and meet the axiom that God extracts good out of supposed evil.

What but reason should elicit the best views of faith, when the philosophy of exact science alone decides the highest religion.

Is monotheism, that is rational religion, the friend of mind without mistake? Is this what the world has to cling to?

It is that which teaches of God all the time, in his purest attributes and loveliest purity.

While peculiar faith, even christianity degrades its heaven to a hell, and angels to devils, this the friend of creation espouses its Creator and exalts mind to its God.

Light will give religious rights to the people, therefore the suppression of investigation is base indeed.

Whenever rational discussion is evaded, or its books proscribed, then a black felony pervades the priestocracy that cloak the peculiar faith.

All the world is concerned to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Why make any fuss about getting religion at any time, that all rational beings have by creation birth-right, that cannot be alienated, only injured by their perversions of mind? Like the genius of discovery, let all such be free as air.

Rational religion cannot be a creature of state policy, for its origin is the most exalted, and its object the noblest for rational mind. She is built on God-given elements, through the best mental elaboration. She is advocated by no vassal or feudal schoolmen.

Let us live at once aright, not to deplore and repent, but prevent the necessity of repentance.

Rational religionists wish to be right, and desire no victory but what is exalted, moral, dignified and intellectual, and will accept of no other.

Monotheism was the first, and will be the last religion, and all practicable faculty will be her's.

She commends that the gifts of mind be not accepted at the expense of independence, or being crushed. She enables the world to observe whether priestocracy, or mind cultivated to its rational capacity, should rule the world?

Which is competent in time and constancy, a responsible agent, ever present, as mind, all over the world, at all ages, from its creation, ever imbued with the principles of religion, ready to be evolved at the right time and by the right mode, long before priests and their bibles were ever thought of; both being filled with mind's perversions?

Rational religion can ask no advance of her principles, unless they are clearly those of mind, God's works and book, incorrectly read at first, better and properly appreciated at last.

Rational religion requires rational faith and consistent practice. A religion of principles pays all duty to God and man. She requires children to be dutiful to their parents, respectful to their teachers; and parents to be faithful to their offspring, and not desert it under any circumstances—of course avoiding its illegitimacy. Above all, citizens to be faithful to their country. Under her auspices, husbands and wives will be faithful to each other; guardians and teachers will meet their responsibilities with faithfulness. Friendship will meet with gratitude; the country will be served with patriotism; mankind will be justly dealt with, and the whole world will be harmonized, under one universal brotherhood. Those that take all advantages will be counteracted by wise precautions of mind, and the weak will not have to succumb to the strong, as adequate world-legislation is progressive by the wisdom of mind.

Rational religion enables mind to say its soul is God's, not man's, whereas all peculiar faith compels mind to the stupid acknowledgment of a master, an imposition on the world, instead of revering God at once, as the source of purity and wisdom.

Thus man, with all his bibles of tradition and peculiar faith, is the author of folly and wickedness, as often as of his sickness and its intensity, because his mind does not adhere to reason and its attributes, but to exploded nonsense.

What genuine assurance is there of any spiritual religion, independent of rational religion?

How can the first exist without the last?

We might as well expect to see the pretence, that mind need not recognise it; for if it do, it must be rational or absurd.

We ask for certain evidence and proof, that cannot be furnished.

There is full ground, not only to doubt of, but exclude all, except rational religion, that is adapted to mind, soul, spirit, and hence is the only spiritual faith.

Rational religion, then, causes rational and universal liberty of mind.

In rational religion, no rational being can now mistake, as all can appreciate principles, the guide and pilot all the time.

She has amity for the whole brotherhood of the world, that is united in eternal principles. The world should understand, to appreciate and enjoy.

If mind be unable to get the idea of a God from the universe, the first and only accurate idea that necessarily and absolutely, on the principles of causation, presents itself to a rightly cultivated intellect, it would be utterly incapable to appreciate his attributes and the obligations imposed thereby, on mind. There could be, otherwise, no universal standard.

Rational religion, then, resorts to science and philosophy, God's genuine emanations, to ascertain her right duty, and declares reverence to whom it is rightly and exclusively due, in her faith, and invokes no wild conjecture in reason, her guide.

Polytheism, with all its messiahships and all its pretences, starting with its various comprehensions, has split into fragments, and is now withering before eternal principles, to be recognised by monotheism.

None can stand in opposition to conservative principles, that keep the universe in order, harmony, much less this globe, a position that all messiahs can never reach.

Rational religion inculcates and instils all the principles and actions of a gentleman, as its characteristic is the most gentlemanly conduct.

The best advocates of religion, if they do not possess what is rational, can adopt no other but peculiar faith, and must fraternize with the most inveterate enemies of all religion.

All the world, when civilized, will embrace the universal comprehension of rational religion alone, as the only practicable and safe ground, since it is utterly impossible for there to be any other.

We need its moral aphorisms, to do away with all sectarian dogmas, to exclude the idea of satanic temptations, no matter how metaphorical, figurative, or substantial; melancholic, ominous forebodings; visions and dreams; faiths and creeds in many absurdities, as in astrology, alchemy, &c. Speculations and rational religion are unconnected.

Can any deny that there is any such thing as rational religion? Give us a proper audience, tribunal, or jury, of honest, intelligent monotheists, who must have rational religion, as rational beings, created by a rational Creator.

God's book, the universe, is the living witness, that proves exact harmony of system, an abeyance to its conservative principles. The jewel of the universe, the mind, proves it most conclusively, too.

You cannot supersede the mind that is inextinguishable, by dead books, the bibles of tradition—dead as soon as conceived, much less finished—no more than supersede the living faith of religion by the peculiar faith of dying priestocracies.

Rational religion is correct as rational beings are accountable, if for no other reason. It will be the happiest moment of our lives, to die monotheists, rational religionists.

What respectable monotheist, having enlarged patriotism and philanthropy, but wishes all the blackguardism of peculiar faith abolished, on the enlightened principles of mind, whether Jew or Christian, Mahometan or pagan, are concerned.

It is incompatible with the light and spirit of the age to continue any incompatibility, to have any party or right crushed, lowered, or dispirited.

OATHS FOR JUSTICE,

Can only be administered in the faith of God, who is omnipresent, in this wise. I, the witness, affirm to the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, of what I shall now state in this matter.

Who could safely make oath, but on solemn affirmation? As there is no divine authenticity of any scriptures, there is no truthful authenticity. Hence the oaths administered on them are not only absurd and criminal, but blasphemous. There should be no cursing or vulgar invocation of Deity; and who that is rational would hail the plurality of peculiar gods in all their scriptures? Who can object to God's system of rational religion, but those devoted to the vagaries of peculiar faith, committed to take for granted all about the ancient fables and legends respecting hell, assimilated to volcanoes, &c.?

Peculiar faith resolves all other faiths out, including, most unjustly and untruthfully, certainly most unreligiously, rational religion, while that the only pure one, the world's republic, resolves the world in, and cannot be destitute of its principles.

Contingency, then, sticks to the first as accident of peculiar education, and discloses her pretences or presents them, while nothing prevents the primary main part of the last possession. Right improvement and cultivation are only needed. Rational religion enables us if we err, to do so on the safe side, and being the only religion of rational beings, she only uses universal means of reason, truth, and honesty, for ever.

Rational religion institutes the essentials of social relations, and recognises that God is always with us.

We require rational religion associations, on the principles of universal brotherhood.

There is no need of fanaticism with rational beings.

As the world will declare for rational religion, the sooner we establish her principles the better.

The highest species of civilization, is that of rational religion.

Monotheism adopts only one right bible, and that of mind, that declares the perfect unity of God.

Rational religion calls for reformation all the rational life-time, on the highest principles of rational education. She is the mutual obligation of God and his creation—in perfect consistency—all peculiar faiths are in antagonism to that, and must be in blasphemous rebellion to principles. All mysteries, prophecies, miracles, come under this category, with their peculiar bibles of tradition and all their designing priestocracies. Be done, miscreants!

Rational religion reconciles all doctrines of pure religion, upon the principles of reason submitted to the sublime standard of the Supreme perfect being.

There can be no difference of opinion but on the scale of ignorance, as speculation cannot breathe in her pure atmosphere. No doctrine can be permanently adopted by rational men, unless it be rational, and therefore must be principle. Rational beings need a system that has principles and elements conservative, that will place the whole above any of the authorities of priestocracy, absolutism, or sophisticated superstition.

Rational religion will exclude all the peculiar faiths of the world. Universalism is a small incident in monotheism. Rational religion will permit nothing in the dark, not at all.

The world must, necessarily, become monotheist, when the right principles can be appreciated, and when the right spirit of the people commanded. Monotheism is obliged to prevail and triumph.

Rational religion requires of all, when anything is personal and they are not certain of the purport, to inquire modestly, not assert boldly and then become recklessly responsible. The right performance of duty to ourselves, as all, takes precedence of passion.

Now, if rational religion clashes in its principles, stop: it is the error of its adopter's not of its author, whose principles do not clash. The days of peculiar faith are numbered by rational religion, that can expel any number of its advocates. True analysis, the profoundest of all profound subjects, not attainable by common minds without proper pains and exertions, declares, as sure as the empire of ignorance yields to the empire of mind and reason, so surely does the empire of peculiar faith yield to rational religion.

The day has been when more attention was paid to the moon and stars in astrology, than to reason in the various duties of life, in the heart rather than the mind. In such times, peculiar faith usurped all the rights of reason.

The bible of rational mind must be that of universal brotherhood. In doing justice to the analysis of the position, psychology proves rational religion, that needs only a right statement of facts for self-demonstration.

The Creator of the universe has duly impressed mind, and no messiah can remove that impression.

The head of the universal brotherhood, not church, is He who ought to be, no less than God himself. The only spiritual religion is rational, and nothing less. We profess to be monotheists, believing in one eternal, immutable Almighty, that rational mind traces to the first Great Cause. We believe in the bible of rational mind, that is the greatest gift in the universe, whose adoration of Deity is rational religion.

The bible of rational mind must adhere to principles of truth, reason, and the God of the universe, or such bible is non-existent. People may not be afraid to take hold, as monotheism will support them.

The province of rational religion presents the noblest of principles, which is a pleasant duty.

Peculiar faith is always in restraint, to support its inconsistences and its sophisms, the devices of the priestocracy.

Monotheism, illustrious conservative revolutionist of the world, should never be outdone by advance of progress of mind. We defy sectarianism to be born of monotheism, that would have excluded all the piracies of peculiar faith wars, all the inquisitions and proscriptions of church tyranny, all the bayonets of despotisms. Rational religion places woman on her only elevated and dignified sphere; gives her mind and soul—the first of which man has not got by even christianity, or any other peculiar sectarian pretension or dynasty. Monotheism asks you to assist mind by your most rational discussion, the best for rational minds on rational subjects; she knows nothing but what is right—to have all right; knows not herself except by rational position. She is out of existence when not right, for otherwise she cannot exist.

Where one says there is falling from grace, another that it never was possessed, she composes the conflict, a war for centuries with peculiar faith, by affirming on the true averment, that the elements of religion were original, cotemporary with not only birth, but a creation-right—and improved as mind is enlightened and civilization refined. Morals can only be secured by rational religion. This argument cannot be evaded.

Rational religion begets the deepest conviction that there is a God, whom humility in the sublimity of her silence, acknowledges the Supreme, and to whom confidence in her deepest reverence, confesses the loveliest adoration.

As phrenology or psychology is to physiology of mind, so is rational faith to its obligation in morals and religion, all else is mystic metaphysics that beget the subtlest sophistry, and create infidelity and disbelief. We leave the chaos of conjecture a partially discovered system of judaism, blurred in superstition and clerical despotism, in christianity, man and image worship, where priestocracy stalk in all their horrors.

And what philosophical science does monotheism present? She kindly leads mind to the contemplation of the mighty vista of nature, she takes away the veil, and introduces to a nearer and juster appreciation, the God of nature. Superstition, however refined her every faith, is unworthy to have the audience before rational mind. She never can be else than false faith, when she is superstition. At first ages, man hardly had abstract ideas, and the proper analysis had not been then made. Now, rational religion stands alone in her sublimity, unapproachable by all peculiar faiths.

The difference between monotheism, rational religion, and peculiar faith, is this: the first is after truth, the last is after faith! Rational religion needs nothing extraneous; thus she rests on her dignity and grace.

Rally for her in this approaching age of civilization, and we shall soon see a triumph indeed. This rally is not for her, but yourself, world, grand and glorious. She is the independent minister of God. How can you live a religious life? Only by rational religion. None have dignity till civilized by rational religion. Monotheism is the only rational faith, the only religion—that enables us to get rid of church bigotry, sophistry, tyranny, expulsion and excommunication, and all the idle dreams and visions of the supralapsarians, who cannot fall from grace! what peculiar faith never had, but on her borrowed yet unacknowledged capital.

Rational religion rids the world of faith tyrants, and all such petty evil doers, and while peculiar faith cannot reconcile only two persons differing on her premises, she holds a brotherhood of billions, responsive to the bursts of manly feeling and love. This bespeaks the sublime magnificence of the God of the universe, itself united in indissoluble union. But for the supreme wisdom and power of the Creator, this mighty bond of man, religion, had been burst asunder, by the odious and vile machinations of myriads of peculiar faith that assumed her province.

Rational religion needs no martyrs; she depends on truth, that will render the world generous to create the noblest links of peace and happiness. Monotheism calls for God's grace. She causes her advocates to meet the views of her tuition by proper elucidation and discussion, hoping that mutual benefit will accrue.

Rational religion directs the legitimate use of all the passions among their towering ambition. The world has grown, wiser and better under her noble auspices in rational morals, that define her peerless excellence over peculiar faith.

Who but she is the protectress of true science, as she ever aims to be right, and lead all aright? No peculiar bible, or its minister, can teach monotheism. If the people were enlightened, and willed right, perfectly untrammeled, all would have rational religion. She teaches the rescue by inherent benevolence, the risk of life, when necessary for exertion of the noblest feelings.

There can be no other but rational religion, all else is idle and absurd, a nullity.

Monotheism has sublime principles, above all bibles of tradition; and whilst she challenges proof for the last, that never has been given, she yields the best analysis of herself.

With all the courtesy of toleration, we must have uncompromising resistance to all human plans destitute of purity of mind, that does not recognise the unity, and the almighty omnipotence of God.

Why monotheism? Because there can be only one correct view of God; all others are more or less species of superstition, reckless polytheism; but monotheism presents the bulwark of principles to all, rich or poor. There can be no hypocrites in rational religion, as she recognises no profit in profession, and no speculating professors.

She has no speculation in worship, nor worship, but adoration of God. God is not to be worshipped by any rite or ceremony, but adored in the purity of mind.

It is she that separates government from faith, and proscribes faith or church proscription. The mind can only conceive of rational as true religion; any other is superstition.

This question of rational religion is paramount, and above bibles of tradition, that cannot teach, as their writers did not appreciate it.

Rational religion never quarrels. Anything short of rational religion is superstition. Rational belief is true, irrational is untrue. You have for rational religion elements already, if you be rational, to satisfy the most rational mind. Why, then, change the real genuine for the counterfeit? Appreciate at once and forever the right functions—those of time, of sense, rational action.

Who could not glory in being a monotheist, free from bigotry, ready to reason, and bow to the decrees of rational religion? Who wants irrational faith, when none but rational religion is true? We can only ask for this as the purest to hope, live, and die by. Rational is the legitimate, real, and substantial. You desire the best triumphs of rational religion, then seek the most rational to be the most successful means of their attainment. Rational religion unites all the fragments of society, all sects into one universal brotherhood. It is the noblest duty of every rational mind to investigate the subject of rational religion.

Define monotheism; it is that which defines the correct adoration of one Supreme Being, in his strictest unity of character and design.

The subject is so deep that it cannot be exhausted, and rises in confirmed sublimity on the advance of mental light, that will illuminate the world, the universe.

The bible of rational mind and religion is the only one that can be given the world; there can be no other. The world's happiness requires principles.

Rational religion is demonstrable, whilst all the rest is mere peculiar faith, nothing but dogmatism, vicious superstition, idolatry, bigotry.

The only thing consistent with herself is rational religion. In the essential points of their faith, all monotheists are obliged to agree.

Rational religion cannot be secured by any bible of tradition, but secures the people their rights. It is the only, the safe side. Monotheists adore God, the highest act of the highest religion. They are honest to acknowledge that they are indebted to mind's action upon mind for progressive light on mind, next to God. Liberal, generous, cultivated, refined, civilized mind is concerned for the perfection of monotheism, not to be caviling or quibbling about its minor errors, that will correct themselves. Monotheism is perfect, and requires mind's perfect appreciation. Can this be done on this earth?

Rational mind can only believe in one Supreme, identified with unity of existence and design.

Monotheism inculcates, that if there were no law written, that with the present organization of the universe, rational mind is bound to act rightly on its noble principles. Peculiar faith could not exist on this noble rationality.

Who meets fairly and honorably the arguments of monotheism? The advocates of sophistry?

Rational religion demonstrates herself, whereas all peculiar faiths resort to all the low intrigues of sophistry to reach the position of imposition.

Rational religion thinks or originates as rational mind directs, by the right standard, whereas peculiar faith of superstition, the highest that can possibly be attained, binds to her car the worshippers of self-interest and fear. The difference between rational religion and peculiar faith is so vast that mere children can analyze after their attention is rightly fixed. The first starts with the premises of God, the glorious universe; the last starts with man's premises, the inventions of the priestocracy. The one shows her revelation in creation, the other a meagre black-letter pretence; christianity and all analogous being false, because sectarian. God's revelation is written in the annals of creation's records, forever brilliant, as forever true.

It is written by God's grace, that towers above justification by blood, that is conceived in ignorance, and perpetuated in bloody iniquity, following in the footsteps of its ignoble predecessor. Peculiar faith trades on the capital of rational religion for good, as it must embrace principles to reach the comprehension. A part of every bible of peculiar faith has a part of religion mixed with it. The situation of the world requires the full and comprehensive exercise of religion, not base mixtures, as was and is done at Rome, in China, America, the world. All the morality, religion, and good ostensibly derived from peculiar faith, as Christianity, Judaism, Mahomedanism, Mormonism, Brahminism, Bhuddism, Confucianism, Lamaism, are derived from God's fund, religion. All this is by the immutable laws of nature, that display God Supreme, sublime in intelligence, power, and goodness. Christianity has its pretended revelation, as Judaism; but religion must look to the universe, its annual and eternal record for the truth. Short of that, mind cannot find it.

Mind has the world-machinery, now let it put it into motion most certainly, as otherwise useless to the people, who should act at once, constantly and rightly. What is rational faith? You need not be alarmed that any of the degraded examples of compulsion or seduction of peculiar faith will be imitated by rational faith. She abhors all such. When there is anything wrong in her circle, it is improper construction, that must be amended. Her voice, not that of her advocates, her principles, not their policy, are to be canvassed. Natural religion and revealed faith do not harmonize. As they clash, one is surely wrong. The first cannot possibly have any sectarianism; the last is made up with it, blasphemous to God, unjust to man, not dealing in fact, but in sophistry and cant. Revelation takes away free agency of mind, and makes no merit in reason. Revelation is not begun by books.

The highest moral or religious reformation is rational, with God for the standard.

The ancients are quoted to us as if they had fathomed all science, whereas they knew but little of it accurately; hence their miserable blunders about faith, morals, and above all, rational religion.

Peculiar faith alone was known to them. None knew of monotheism in its purity, for the priestocracy was in every thing the alloy with pure metal. Rational religion is before the age, if the priestocracy will let alone what is right.

It deals in facts of reason. It is obligatory on the world, the people as patriots and citizens, good and true, to carry out the rational and religious principles. How have they been met? Have the people made themselves acquainted with them, as essential as the noblest principles of freedom? Will the priestocracy begin to do justice to such a sublime cause, when they are in the quagmire of their own peculiar self-interest and correspondent faiths? Do they pretend to meet any real issues when they take hold of the little unessential points of controversial errors, not the pure and immutable principles?

Rational religion teaches to realize the beauties, strength and virtue of the world, to read it as it is, and elicit therefrom all that is practicably good. Have you put yourself on investigation of what its system is capable? Do you know the relative capacities of the different systems? The chaste aspirations of rational religion tend to produce a generous rivalry throughout the world, while she is competent to arrest and silence all the collisions of sects, no matter where and how widely diffused, relying, as she does, on obvious plain facts, and a convincing demonstration.

Her great triumph is, that souls cannot, otherwise than by her inherent elements of uniform protection, be best prepared for close of life, either by contingency or in the natural course of events, and that by fiction of peculiar faith that usurps her capital.

That thing of contingent repentance by preaching of the gospel or not, believing or not, is unsound and irrational, and nothing after it is supposed to be established. The soundest state of the world's mind requires proper proof, and ere that be given of the gospel, that never has been properly proved, the soul passes into another state of existence. Where would the soul have been but for its inherent elements of religion?

Mind had not been able to meet all this contingency, if God had not instituted an almighty providence. The pretence of the gospel men that theirs is the only way to be saved, is an insult to a freeman's mind. The horrid picture they draw of monotheism, as certain to destroy a man's soul for present and future happiness, is unparalleled imposition.

Rational religion teaches us to act so that all ages may be satisfied that justice is done, that philosophy approves, science portrays and conscience confides in. After all the sectarian denunciations of monotheism, you will find the most awful ignorance of principles, not only among the people, but their ministers. Now, cannot they be at least modest in all this matter! They affirm to the monotheism of the Jews' peculiar faith, as it was, and deny that of the perfect unity of God, pure and immutable as mind can now make it! While the whole of Christianity have to advocate the peculiar faith doctrines of the Old Testament to reach their own position, they most inconsistently betray themselves in regard to the only pure religion, which they libel. Monotheism commenced with mind and time, for the good of both, whereas peculiar faith commenced long after both, with the priestocracy to corrupt both. Who would give the title-bond indisputable of the first for the counterfeits of the last? The theological sophists have tried to supersede rational religion by their own peculiar faith. Unless we institute rational religion as a consummation, we stop short of the ultimate final earthly dignity, as we would mar the soul's dignity by merely closing with mind. There can be no true humility but through the recognition of God. This produces the only true conversion, as it begets the most entire confidence, and the most conclusive resignation to his divine will, that is supreme in justice and intelligence. All this position looks relatively at all mankind, in regard to merits and retributive justice. The doctrine that a child or person is prepared for future happiness under a certain age, or of a certain way of belief or faith, and beyond or out of that, no matter how close, condemned, is odious, detestable, and abominable, revolting to all principles of justice and intelligence. The world has to adopt the system of rational religion sooner or later, as "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," for the people, the whole people, and nothing but the people—for mind, rational and religious. Then things will be called by their right names. Under this position, the church, the hierarchy, the priestocracy get all that honest and truthful modest people ought to ask for. The people are the proper guardians of the world, and should act for each other in all legitimate constitutional ways. What is a worse animal than man, when irrational? He is a mixture of nearly all the animals, when debased. Surely, the whole comprehension of rationality can best protect him. What state in this world is that wherein the people can get along with the least evil, sin, difficulty and antagonism? Is it Christianity, or any best of peculiar faith? All such, as sectarianism, presents antagonism. As a necessary consequence, it is monotheism. Wise, honest, truthful and faithful people ought to give up the useless contest. The wise man will not commit himself to a bad cause, nor leave a good one; therefore he will adapt himself always best to the circumstances of his creation, with proper reference to present and future improvement. What is harmful in rational religion? Is the parson's objurgation any argument? If monotheism be right, as rational mind must conscientiously believe, is it not the most infamous blasphemy to oppose it? By this position only can justice be done all nations. The advocates of peculiar faith assume their usurpation. Religion should cause the world to avoid all sophistry, let alone all false pretences in faith. Monotheism is the only correct view of the Almighty Creator of the universe. What can give a more exalted idea? All peculiar faiths are ungrateful prodigals, that have to bow to the majesty of monotheism, their mistress. Theirs is a false position, of subordinates.

What can all the peculiar faith people do with monotheism? Their best efforts are futile against this, the only religious doctrine of God. Well, say they, their bible doctrine must be true, and the only word of God, and that those who dissent must be against their God. The only proper answer to any question depends on the nature of it, discovered on correct analysis. Now, all their position is not only the most dangerous sophistry, but it is really right down blasphemy.

The bible-god only has one flat four-cornered world, that rested on pillars, and a hemisphere of heavens for his creation, and peculiar characteristics besides. He is the God that for four thousand years restricted himself to one small people, the Jews, and left the balance of the world and creation to shift for themselves. Then he left even on this globe alone, some one hundred and thirty-three generations of the people, allowing two hundred millions for each of thirty years, some twenty-six billions of mankind, most recklessly for that time. To such absurd results do all the peculiar bible-mongers come. This is too great a God-libel for the most vulgar unsophicated mind to accept. People have not thought of these things. But they pretend that all the combined wisdom of the ancient philosophers and systemizers never could originate the idea that the Jew bible did. And what does that prove, after all? Religion? Not at all; only that Judaism was a peculiar faith doctrine, and even that not original, as Moses, the writers affirm, was skilled in all the learning of the Egyptians. Surely, it would pester any rational mind to follow, much less invent, such absurd doctrines. No wonder the Hebrews were always wrong in this superstition, when they were misled all the time from the right influence of mind.

They were not permitted to use the noble and independent prerogatives of mind, but were ignominiously tied down to all vassal restrictions of mind. How could they extricate themselves? They could not escape from military, political, nor priestocracy-barbarism, and are suffering to this day, the bitterest dregs of that odious and abominable superstition, the remnant of a denationalized people, an exotic on the globe. What a curse to their nation.

Where, in the mean time, was that pure rational religion, that exalts the world, and ennobles mind? The Jews never possessed it.

What, after all the boastings of the priestocracy, all their falsifications of history of the world, this was not possessed by the world?

All their pretensions about the philosophers not finding it, are absurd and silly, for all their systems fall short of it. What is christianity? Aye, one of the worst of sectarianisms, and pagan at that, all of which have the elements of death in themselves. The whole brood of Judaism down to Mormonism, is in that category.

What, the Son of God, sectarian and pagan? Yes, as much as Foe, Fohi or Bhudd, his prototype, many years before him. All are ignominious sectarianisms, distinct from monotheism or rational religion, the only one legitimate or in existence.

How, but by usurpation, effrontery and monopoly, have they triumphed? They have crushed and silenced the lawful heirs, because the mind of the world was not competent to defend its rights.

Have not mind and science done all that we see done, by the conservative principles of God? The Jews had no just conceptions of the God of the Universe, certainly not of his attributes, nor of rational religion, that is the best action of duty on the highest appreciation to God and man.

There is no just idea of a God, but in monotheism, and that of course, the Jews did not have. Their whole doctrine was of a peculiar god, that had a peculiar people, that claimed him as their peculiar protector against the world, and thus setting the whole world at variance with itself and religion! Were there ever such ignorance and presumption? Such blasphemy, unless with the modern priestocracy, who do not know what they say, when they affect the Jews had pretensions to religion, much less the God of the Universe! when they did not know either? How stupid is even the worst Jesuit, to commit himself on these false pretences! The lights of monotheism will disclose at once the whole idea of church sophistry, which no man can duly estimate, till he sees and hears the whole. What is their faith? Peculiar. They act against monotheism with perfect assassination, having broken into the chambers of religion, and carried off a caricature, a pretended original, peculiar faith, to oppress the world. With all seeming fairness, they befouled the whole world.

The bible-people cannot touch the subject of monotheism that towers in the sublimity of its own greatness, established by its immortal author.

All that they say against it impeaches them, because all their side is of men, not of God, for they continually libel God. Monotheism was the first and only religion necessarily instituted, all others are pretenders; then peculiar faith, as Judaism, and all her brood Christianity, Mahommedanism and Mormonism, are all pagan, parricides and assassins. The opponents of monotheism, often do not understand, and the bible-partisans misrepresent the object, as if it were a pity that sectarianism, peculiar faiths, and their bibles, should be put down. But, as the last cannot stand, but must fall, monotheism must be elevated to her dignified rank in the world. Her purity was never conceived by the adherents of Judaism nor her offspring. Her dignity is above all peculiar faiths. Yet their ministers pretend that a change from the peculiar bible-faith, would necessarily result in atheism.

That is not the fact at all, but the reverse for the better, if the truth be followed rightly. Polytheism and atheism are convertible—monotheism is above both. Such pretend that all the so-called wise men of the ancient world, could not devise a proper system of religion, and that God devoted all of four thousand years to their trial. All this is perfect nonsense. All these pretenders, with their philosophers, stuck in quagmire. Action of mind on mind, only evolves in time the appropriate results in all matters that concern the world. Will these ministers fix time and mind-limits, by their absurd standard? All the peculiar faith philosophers, with all their bibles, have done nothing for the God of the universe. Under the misrepresentation of polytheists and atheists, who have not their eyes open to their own blindness, monotheism cuts short immortal hopes in a future state! The simple question might be asked, are the unprincipled opponents mind-deranged bible-bullies? Some of polytheists deplore under the state of ruins, necessarily arising from the destructive elements of their faith christianity, that atheism will be the result. Atheism is as good as polytheism, both are absurd. But monotheism results, if man have the whole truth, and trust the balance to the God of truth. The bible stands or falls on this proposition, that it must be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, which is not supported by true time for the author of even a part of those scriptures. It is utterly impossible for Moses to have been the sole author of the first five books as claimed, since no man can write his own obituary, and other matters subsequent to his history.

But the polytheists will not let monotheists die peaceably, but advance their pious frauds, as if that altered the correct position of religion.

When polytheism resorts to such shifts, she is nearly run out.

Too many people, on their supposed death-beds, have proved a triumph, satisfied to resign their spirit to the Creator alone. Indeed, what other is the safe position? All the clan of priestocracy, along with their laity, may pretend otherwise, but is it not an insidious malign pretence to deceive the world? Neither polytheists nor atheists, with all their advocacy, can touch monotheism that was God-written from the first, that has been most awkwardly imitated, and most ungratefully libeled by the two first. But how are heresies, the heterodox faiths, to be managed? By the orthodox. Facts only declare for monotheism.

The world will be savage, barbarous and hostile in parts, till that is universal; of so much consequence is rational religion to decide mind's refined rationality.

People may talk of polytheism and atheism, but monotheism is what all are bound to come to, if right be the world. Mere toleration will not do: the world has to act right, the sooner the better. This declares that the True God can only be read of through the universe by mind.

Then this matter of monotheism is God's, not man's, that renders it truly holy, just, good and true. Are not the principles of monotheism conservative, and of God? Let any opponent deny this, truthfully, if he can. His own utter ignorance will alone save him from being considered unprincipled. As nothing but principles will carry a rational being properly through life, then monotheism, that authorizes and enjoins them, is absolutely essential. The principles of monotheism permit no popes nor priestocracies, peculiar gods, people, nor messiahships.

Monotheism sanctions no position at all, of unprincipled characters, who renounce bibles to get rid of moral and religious, civil, social and relative duties, but requires all rational beings to improve in all principles, to the most refined civilization.

What immorality in those who object pretendedly to monotheism, that they cannot touch, to support trash that cannot support itself without hire, bribery and corruption to perjury. Let the whole truth be told.

The errors of mind are not to be put to the account of monotheism. The last is perfect as of God; the other is more or less objectionable, as of men, as it departs from the noble principles of the last.

Monotheism is unapproachable by atheism and polytheism, in their devices and ramifications. Then let no good citizen define monotheism by mind's errors, but by God's principles.

Those who think a pious fraud by the scriptures no sin, had better take up the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, of monotheism, the only way that God reveals himself to mind.

I invoke the sublimest protection of all that mind can rear, for refined civilization of the world, all that true religion, monotheism, can do for mankind. It is she alone that is hallowed by God himself; let all blasphemous idolators and libelers beware how they encroach on God's sacred functions. It is the cause they must look at, not the advocates. How few can see the remote, proper, comprehensive bearing of subjects, especially in monotheism? The minister of peculiar bible faith, berates that position, sophisticating the whole subject, seeking to prejudice the people, and winds up after all, self-exposed and condemned in the infamous attack of a subject, that he, all his aid, the whole world's peculiar faith cannot touch.

The priestocracy are wound up by the sublime subject of monotheism. Man must not forsake his judgment for any man, when it is founded on right justice and reason, otherwise he cannot form it.

Mind must avoid bigotry, injustice and intentional error, as it most conclusively does in monotheism.

The world should possess an honorable analysis and action, despite of all social, civil or ecclesiastical despotism. Can we expect the world to do itself justice, when it does not know what is justice? The whole world should be able to think justly for itself, in all matters of mind and religion, which is the height of refined civilization.

Monotheism originates all the virtues of all the peculiar faiths, without their vices, errors and crimes. Religion ought to reflect as a mirror the attributes of God, and noblest elevation of mind. None but monotheism can do that.

If there be one only truth on earth, it is monotheism or rational religion. It is the loveliest of all principles, as it comprehends all—all truth practicable for mortals. The priestocracy that oppose it, expose themselves every step, not only their nakedness, but their deformity and obliquity. They think themselves the privileged class to attack it, but in that is their greatest weakness, as all theirs is the veriest patchwork on previous botch-work. Monotheisn can gloriously triumph over all prejudices, all sectarianisms; all uncivilized fragments of peculiar education. It is the interest, the highest duty of all intelligent minds, to lay hold of it, to put down all sectional, sectarian demagogism of the whole world, especially of the priestocracy, which ought to be discarded as its cause, the way they oppose monotheism. The whole world ought to know analytically what monotheism is, and most gratefully thank their God that they can do so. Monotheism is sacred, is God-created. Its sublime supremacy is over all peculiar faiths, it rises the only representative of the God of the universe, pure, innocent and unsullied, though unsung, yet most honored and glorious. Stop, priestocracy, your vulgar blasphemous babblings.

Monotheism is the only means for the world to adjust itself to all the developments of time. She is God-given, adapted to the best faculty of man's soul, his conscience, and is the highest duty to God and the universe, to mankind and the world.

The bible bullies cannot touch monotheism, though their language is vulgar, and their intentions blasphemous. That is monotheism that ever perfects the best system of most refined civilization of mankind, throughout the world. The world owes it to itself, to analyze its position. Release not your creation-birth-right rational religion, for all the peculiar faiths of all the world priestocracy, who should not succeed if they were to pay the world to accept their pretences. Monotheism is something worth looking at, whereas there is no truth uttered by the priestocracy about peculiar faith, that has no existence. The monotheists must be organized. The books of monotheism have no peculiarity or any mysteries. They teach that the people of the world are bound one to another. That man is a social being, and would go right in affections without antagonism, unless others excite a contrary interest. The world has been harassed time out of mind, by supposed contrary interests for church and priestocracy speculation, whereas monotheism unites the whole in one paramount necessary duty, that of rational religion. Therefore the world has never analyzed this subject faithfully. Give the world the subject of monotheism, and all will have to come to the same main conclusions. Religion is to civilize the world, now how can you by peculiar faith, bring all the others to civilization? They will reverse it.

Having completely satisfied myself of the validity of monotheism, considering it one of the most high-minded of my life, it now remains for me to introduce it before the whole world, as most worthy of its notice and adoption. This subject of monotheism is endless. The monotheists have their minds in constant abeyance to true humility, confidence and gratitude to the author of perfection, and go for thanksgivings, humiliation and abstemiousness, not fasting, all the time.

Some minds may affect or act as if God had no particular care: if polytheists find fault with any appreciation by monotheists, they will please help amend all that is imperfect. They should know that monotheism expands, while peculiar faith contracts the characteristics of God and mind. But mind has not taught men right. There is the point of difficulty, which has but rational mind under rational religion? What has all the pretence of revelation done? What were more contemptible than the Jewish notions of an adulterated priestocracy speculation that was as far from religion as their peculiar god was removed from the God of the universe? As wrong as that, christianity, that is founded on it, is worse. The Jews made one peculiarity, and the christians make several, whereas monotheism declares for no peculiarity. She teaches that God established all his immutable laws, of course, at the creation of the universe, of which this world is only part, when all matters were created.

But how shall all this matter be fairly decided? Bigots and priestocracies will put down all books not of their faith, as they are after their peculiar faith, not truth. Will they not run from the advocates of monotheism, or evade the justice of the position by proscribing all their books before as much of the world as they can influence to a false position and opinion?

I have seen the advocates of peculiar faith avoid monotheists, to avoid meeting their propositions on premium to prove the authenticity of their scriptures. Monotheists have no peculiarity about their principles; for if they possess anything of this, there is something wrong. The principles should be modestly but firmly advocated, by dissemination of facts. All peculiar faiths unite speculation, while pure monotheism excludes all such. It is one of the most difficult things for some people to take a correct and firm stand, and hold out to the consummation, but on this platform mind can hold most conscientiously and knowingly. There is no doubt about all this.

I know that the vulgar, who adopt the loose ideas of deism, as trammeled by previous restrictions, or those that libel the correct position, think that it is to cut loose from all moral and orderly restraints, but the highest of all monotheism puts no such constructions, as it feels bound to the noblest principles of rational religion. It is no more accountable for loose constructions or malign libels, than one peculiar faith is accountable for the peculiarities of the other faiths. She holds no peculiar dogma, nor can hold any, and if it be put in her sacred precincts, mind, refined in its noblest civilization will exclude it. We are not spiritual but rational beings on this earth, hence religion is rational that includes all that may be spiritual. Rational religion teaches mankind to attain the highest of all that is lofty, magnificent, and sublime.

What is the good of monotheism? All good, to cut down all the false pretences of polytheism or trinitarianism, and nonsense of atheism, all paganism.

If there were no other means for mind to do better in belief or faith, then I would be silent; but here is the glorious rational religion deserted for a false faith, and all that is degrading in the frame-work for perjury, if carried out, and does cause millions to damn themselves by perjury, and risks their souls any way. Is this manly, American, or republican? Can any honest mind require of the world a sacrifice of all that is sacred before God, for the minor, base considerations of no value—devices of mankind?

Rational religion gives justice, and deals in beneficence. Monotheism has conservative principles of the universe, adores the Creator in his supreme and eternal unity.

All defects apparent are in the mind of the receiver or the imparter, and not in the position.

I do not declare my individual opinions, only as the exponent of rational religion, and abide all correction that is legitimate. All the unprincipled opponents of religion, advocates of peculiar faith, ought to remedy all the defects of monotheism's exposition, which is not monotheism, if wrong. She depends on her principles, God-given, not fails on man's exposition. She has no priestocracy. All, as people, whether they will or no, are under the holy banners of religion. Will they, as rational minds, improve it, to the loftiest rationality?

I know that rational religion is the right and safe side, God's, nature's, truth's, reason's, that of the universe. Rational religion forever, and nothing less.

All questions of rational religion can only be answered properly by the whole comprehension of the universe, the world, mind, all God-relations. Nothing short of that will do for the immortal soul. This world and universe-wide problem has to be solved. Then how can a petty, paltry book called bible, meet the correct position, condemned, positively convicted, by line and precept, of being anything else?

Religion covers the whole ground of rational mind victoriously, as the God-gift from mind-creation, while peculiar faith only pretends to help the peculiar possessor, an intruder into the legitimate premises of the first, that is as ancient as mind, while peculiar faith sprouts up like a mushroom, a mere fungus, a parasite of the moment, and always subsequent to mind's functions, that clearly rule all its nefarious innovations, as futile and impotent.

This thing will not do at all. When we say rational religion irradiates rational mind, we mean mind cultivated to its proper state, regulated by conservative principles, that guard it strictly against lust, drunkenness, absolutism, especially peculiar faith, and the obnoxious peculiar education.

The world needs religion of principles, to cause mankind to solve the noblest problem of mind, that has not been accomplished by any one nation. The United States commenced the problem, now the way is clear, let their actions in clear light prove.

No extraordinary tradition can be truthful as of religion, as all such are incompatible with the immutability and perfection of Deity. As all honorable religious positions are necessarily truthful, they cannot be less than rational. All religion is in order, none can be extraordinary.

All bibles affecting tradition, that are not rational, are not truthful, therefore not religious.

All rationality is compatible with truth, and all faith that is not compatible with the first must be excluded by the last. There can be no religion but what is rational, and all faith that is good must be consistent thereto. Who has religion? All rational beings; they that do most justice to their fellow man extend it in the scale of rationality.

Is not Christianity religion? Not a particle of it. How come Christians to excel the world? They do not. Those that are good, are so by mind that is relatively rational. What is Christianity? Western buddhism, and all, paganism. All are equal, and differ only in the relative state of mind that is either more or less rational.

The monotheist knows certainly, that God's word, cause and effect, declare to the whole universe what religion is. Now peculiar faith has none of it, but is in conflict thereto, and as it is antagonistic to principles, as a culprit and felon the blasphemy of all, excludes all. Their stupidity prevents their seeing. Instead of being hostile to the author, they ought to be grateful for the exposure, and amend their ways by the illustrious light of rational religion.

Let an intelligent, honest press do me, itself, God, mind, justice. If people were to perpetrate crimes on government as they do against religion, by peculiar faith, they could be rightly adjudged monsters of iniquity, fraud, deception, tories and traitors. They do not act man-like nor God-like, but priestocracy-like. It is not partisan feelings, but justice to be evoked, in this momentous subject. Let all the feelings legitimate be aroused, but let them be established on just views.

Whether principals or protestants, you go for religion? All of it, in its purity, but none of peculiar faith, bibles, or people. But does monotheism conflict with peculiar faith? No, sir. The last has counterfeited it all the time, and libeled truth. Peculiar faith perpetrates fraud, and sustains it with bloodshed—religion elevates the mind and the world, all the time.

Why has the world deserted rational religion? Is it on account of fool-bibles, bible-bigotry, bigot priestocracies, priest-kings? Put down all such stuff. The world has to put them all down by conservative revolution, the sooner the better. The rational world must not let all such take advantage of it any longer. Do you call this their profession, religion? Are you a monomaniac, or is your mind so imbecile, so degraded priestocracy, as to impose the base fund of polytheism and atheism for monotheism, on the world? Are you so tory, as to sell all that is noble in mind and principle, for their abomination? Cannot the American people carry out the great life, mind, soul, universe-religion, the God-problem?

Religion, that is rational, is the sublimest of all creations; next the immortal soul, it towers to the height of mind, the depth of creation.

Instead of making skepticism, atheism and self-sufficiency, monotheism institutes at the start rational religion. It has none of the speculative mysteries of atheism. Religion is no mystery: it is the highest rational duty. As man is rational let him have proper discussions, liberal, &c., for best improvement.

The question is not as to the popularity, but its correctness. If popes were to consult the propriety of religion, they would not be prisoners to their own creed. A fair trial and nothing less, that proper justice may be done mind of the public, is demanded by monotheism. The principles of protection, are for the paramount good of the world's society. All religious, is as expedient as political discussion, to reach the right appreciation. The truths of monotheism are sacred.

In justice to creation of mind, it should have a proper religion of principles as suited to the whole human family, but peculiar faith is unsuited to all. Responsibility of mind's agency is comprehended by monotheism presenting a proper potency over the will, the most characteristic of good qualities. The rights of rational education embrace religion, that gives the most exalted conscience.

What is the difference between deism and monotheism? Deism, the opponents say, has been incompetent to defend religion or meet its question, and monotheism by Brande has been wofully misconstrued as peculiar faith illustrated as such. I adopt monotheism as defining most exactly, all that pertains to rational religion.

She only makes the refined gentleman, in all senses of the word when she invests rational mind with all the purity of rational religion. One can only live religious on principles, all others are trifles. Monotheists above all others have to be extremely thoughtful and cautious in all their duties, else they may sadly err.

The practically religious, are the rational religionists. Social, moral, and religious duties, with knowledge, are implied in rational religion.

Nothing less than monotheism can take proper care of conscience, therefore individual responsibility must demand at once the absolute expulsion of all peculiar faiths. Prevention is godlike, far beyond counteraction, good as it is, and this monotheism does as there is no honesty or sense in faith, as mere faith is all nonsense. The professors of such faith have no bible—poor blockheads, only the humbugs of the priestocracy who have published their false pretences. They have no bible of their own, but seek to make hypocrites and sophists. Mind can see the world debased by drink, peculiar education and faith, and all the peculiar results. Now what religion can all these shadows of peculiar endowments present? They end in trash, instead of leaving mind to secure the high purposes of creation. The religion of principles causes all rational minds to come the nearest, to be a law unto themselves.

In respect to God, taking him for all in all unity, the least of all mistakes and the least of all atonements expedient therefor would be committed. No one but the priestocracy would start their metaphysics, and none but their dupes affiliated could receive it. Again, what of all systems, including all theirs, if this be wrong can be right, or do less error? This is the paramount question, if speculation was necessary, but we have omnipotent facts that preclude all such. What is practicable, in all that can be started? To the God of the universe is due adoration, gratitude for the divine faculty of religion that has no abuses, no defects, that are referable to peculiar faiths of fallible arrogant minds, as of popes and priests.

The ennobling sentiments of patriotism and philanthropy emanate from religion.

Reason may then be the God of monotheists? Not at all, as it is the agent to appreciate rightly the God of all. What would the world be but for monotheism, rational religion? That is nothingariness. How can that be, when all the religion, not only in the world but in the whole universe, is that? All that peculiar faiths have is taken altogether from this fount, and trade on this capital. When detected in the stealth, they, like convicted sophists or bigots, fly from reason into passion, instead of from the last to the first, and disavow honestly, abjure truthfully all the blasphemous plagiary which does not avail them, but impoverishes mind indeed.

Monotheism commands entire disbelief in all peculiar faith's bibles and priestocracies, as especially their peculiar god, and sincere trust in religion and the God of the universe.

But some do not wish a change from their vicious errors of faith, deeming that blindly adopted as taught, enough. Such minds do not wish to become wise in wisdom of God, but stupidly persist in the detected, exposed, and exploded false pretences of dishonest men.

Establish a proper view of the religion of principles, and then all whining and cant about faiths would be at an end, and all would have fixed principles. The atheist is defective in the comprehension of the whole subject. What principles have atheism and polytheism? This earth, as universe, abides on conservative principles. Atheism and polytheism abide in their fixed dogmatic bigotries, man's conceitedness. The monotheist adopts universe facts, and uses them for the greatest good to rational mind. The absurd positions of the others can only abide for the time of bigotry.

What year shall the monotheist adopt? In the absence of better, it will be well to adopt the year of American Independence, till that of universal mind is proclaimed by monotheism, the presidency of which will establish a perfect independence for the world.

Monotheism furnishes the only standard of God. It is the principle advancer of conservative peaceable revolution, whilst polytheism and atheism cause bloody revolution. Rational education only calls for conservative revolutions, the best of arguments for universal light of mind.

Are you after intellectual, honest, rational truth, or are you a vassal of priestocracy and their invention, peculiar bibles? If for the last, then are you tory to your God and mind, for the bribery of a peculiar god.

Monotheism stands on a platform commensurate with the universe, and is the only advocate of the religion of principles; and this is the potent silencer of all peculiar faiths and bibles, people and dogmas or doctrines that split the social world into fragments, instead of imparting the universal brotherhood of monotheism, that blends all in one harmonious unity, consecrated by universal peace and dignity. Socialism is only when legitimate, a constituent.

Is it not absolutely essential, then, for refined civilization, for this last best age of man, that rational mind should be educated rationally, to attain rational religion?

How long before rational analysis will demonstrate beyond contradiction that peculiar faiths, however numberless, are all false, and that there is but one religion—the creation's birth-right of rational mind, the diamond of the universe, and that on principles established as an element by the conservative Creator of the universe, a perfect being, whose prescience and omniscience precluded subsequent covenants, the after-thoughts of priestocracy, or tithe-monarchs.

Where was all religion prior to such characters, for thousands of years? Then as now, independent of them.

In the whole comprehension of this magnificent subject, hasty and partial views may have caused mind the commission of errors that are incident to all fallible mortals; but as a monotheist, I ask to have the correction on the highest principles of rationality.

Whatever is wrong in this work is so from the human mind, and not in monotheism.

That is unlike polytheism which uses all kinds of inquisitions to manufacture opinions at variance with principles, and the universal benefit of mankind. The first never desires any decisive measures to be taken to check the progress of principles. Principles belong to the God of the universe, and are universal. What fallible mortals can gainsay that?

Monotheism discards all men's bibles, and urges the adoption of religion's.

What are the purposes of creation? Of the highest, noblest, most universal, monotheism begins and ends with the Creator; socialism begins with mind, that has to solve the mighty problem. I do not know about the present popularity of this subject, but I know I am right, as far as I can know anything by the universe-proofs. Monotheism enables us to make all legitimate capital out of misfortunes. She is the only means to effectually put down all peculiar faiths. With her, now, the people truly have the mastery in their own hands, over the most insidious priestocracy. The only question for the people is to know, is it right? The result will tell, and silence all the ignorant clans of all sects and denominations. It will take away their foul game of humbuggery and imposition.

God is the vitalizing supremacy. Mind needs a correct standard of moral and social laws, with religion. It can never attain them short of monotheism. All peculiar bible systems caricature them, do injustice to God and man. The feelings of enthusiasm and fanaticism will be cut down by monotheism, that furnishes all harmonizing principles of philanthropy. Mr. Brande undertakes to define monotheism, and misrepresents it under the dogmas of peculiar faith most unjustly. Mind is to disabuse the world, discover and remedy the evils of peculiar education.

This is a universe of rational principles, that are active.

How did nature, that is passive, do that? Here we see the confounded notions of the athejst, whom also mind must silence.

To make rational mind rightly responsible, it must be so at the bar of rational principles: it can never be so at the bar of peculiar doctrines, as peculiar bible advocates would have us believe. Free agency is in abeyance to reason and rational circumstances, not to credulity and peculiar views, more or less monomaniac and crazy, absurd, despotic, smuggled, or exploded. There can be no infallible guide to conscience but through enlightened principles, that emanate from an infallible standard of unity. A rational conscience is indissolubly united to rational principles. Principles alone can carry the world with safely and happiness, and principles are concentrated in religion. What can avail over the worst of crimes, the most licentious passions, as lust, revenge, and ambition.

The main question with all minds is not, are you in a church, but, is your mind in abeyance to any principles?

All minds are as the universe, now that allegiance, that religion, is sacred. You then have not to cultivate faith or churches, but religion. What will carry mind through life? Money, power, friends? only that which is identified with conservation of the universe, principles, that which will do it in this and all future existence. Mind only can be sure on this position.

Do you wish never to doubt your religious position? Then see and feel the ennobling beauties and universal blessings of God-given religion, monotheism.

I could conscientiously choose my friends from those who are conscientiously wedded to rational principles, the religion of principles. These exert the only conservative influence on society. Monotheism is that I wish to live and die by; this is it, for the world, for it unites the universe to its God Creator. In what do monotheism and faith differ? If the faith be good there is no difference.

The position will prove the difference, if the faith be bad. Deists yield too much to Christ. Monotheists do not admit him at all.

The moral sublimity is in monotheism, that gives the only happiness in its principles. All others, as peculiar faiths, have no principles except what they select from monotheism, and most ungratefully without acknowledgment.

I desire to have the whole world act in conformity with monotheism, that can only absolutely restrain individual and rational passions, or put them into the legitimate direction.

It furnishes the only system of religious morals to master all world piracies. Atheism cannot do this at all, for it has no standard, no principles. Polytheism comes short of the sublime supremacy of a perfect God-standard.

Monotheism furnishes the only purity of morals—to govern man necessarily, to break up his unhappiness in this peculiar doctrine, his doubts, his death-bed of misery and recantation. The life of peculiar faith is a bad and vicious criminal one, derogatory to mind and its God, Creator, Almighty of the universe.

Monotheism should make men true gentlemen.

When you see the advance of monotheism, then you will see the full blessings of liberty, civil and religious. Is mind prepared for its mighty change?

If monotheism do not prepare it, that which cared for it from creation-birth, what can?

Monotheism does not ask for charity of the world, but requires justice. She does not deal in the coin of fanaticism, but in the bullion of religion.

What enables mind to attain right but the elements of religion? What objection can be found against monotheism? None valid. It is maligned because it confutes all the faiths of polytheism, as Christianity, Judaism, &c., as utterly false. They made their own false position, and monotheism only exposed it. The world has to adopt it as the only good faith—the faith—true and genuine. She that invokes the noblest cultivation of rational mind by the most scientific rational education, can civilize the world to its most refined gentlemanly rationality, or rational refinement. Ladies, above all, should declare for it, as the best protection of their holiest rights.

Monotheism knows no such absurdity and despotism, as priestocracy. Forethought for ever, premises the effectual conservation of all as taught.

Monotheism has the highest respect for man, woman, and child, mind, mankind, that it disabuses the world about the crimes of peculiar faith.

She forbids any to rebel against one of God's laws, with that position, the only legitimate one. All peculiar faiths conflict at once, that can only maintain themselves ostensibly, so far as they can be upheld on that basis, by uniting with the pure elements of monotheism. There is now a world-crisis that must be respected by mind for its own advancement.

Peculiar faith-people, the priestocracy, with their special pleadings, act as if their faith was the light that directed the world to civilization, supplanting mind and monotheism in all that is good. A man is only elevated to the highest scale by monotheism. All minds are bound to do justice to religion, monotheism; and if that be done, all is safe. It is matter of moonshine whether religion is professed or not, the acts of life are, if rational, predicated on that element. It becomes the most rational minds to inquire for their most comprehensive duty.

How often is the term principle abused, misconceived, or misinterpreted, equally as much as that of religion, that comprehends all principles.

There are many things to be fixed hereafter by a world's convention of monotheists, but only the representation of the sovereign people, for the year, names of days and the best appreciation of all other important duties needing. There is much to do for national, individual and world etiquette, subject to progressive revision of rational mind. If the world cannot agree on a universal common year, let it consecrate the day of universal brotherhood as the commencement of that year, and let it drop all the barbarian relics of past ages,—a disgrace to mind. The base of all rational education, is to instil the religion of principles into all rational minds who should be competent to comprehend them. The truly sincere, those desiring religious benefits, have entirely mistaken the means, when they appeal to any doctrines or means of peculiar faith, the last thing to be sought or the first avoided. The world or mind can never grow old into decay, under the protection of conservative principles. Monotheism not only aids mind to obtain a just equilibrium, but to manage crime, and thus obtain a free agency on the influence of principles, that promote all mind's legitimate purposes.

All the acts of monotheism, possess a proper unity. Constitutional government is only part of its principles, that rule mind. The universe must be enlightened by sacred principles, but in becoming of peculiar faith the devotees become sworn sophists, and hardened bigots. Who can become with the lights of conscience a conspirator for peculiar faith, when principles are involved for the universe. The peculiar faith of churches takes hold of policy, while monotheism is based on sacred principles—that perfect mind the noblest work of God,—while the first degrades it, having a vacuum never to oe filled, confined to time and space, while the last has no limit of either, but is universal. Monotheism is blessed with the sacredness of purpose from the eternal creator, while the other is stained with blood or effete explosions, abominable doctrines. Religion belongs to mind, not to the priestocracy, who cannot take charge of it. They cannot do justice to it: it is not in their element when they practice an impiety.

Monotheism is not understood, and is effectually libeled by peculiar faith demagogues. What will not the religion of principles meet? She does not deal in metaphysics, mysteries, but facts. She acts for all times, the future especially, if not appreciated by the present. She may be called free thinking, but her liberality carries her to what is correct comprehension, and she proves the only infidels to be anti-God. She analyzes, to reach correct thinking, no matter how free, so it is accurate; now if that be orthodox, it is rational.

What can promote the greatest good? If that be monotheism as it is, it is established on immutable principles,—stained with no reproach, she has no fear, and is worthy of all admiration.

All associations must be select in faith as in companionship, to insure perfect safety and eternal happiness.

Monotheism elevates, atheism belittles, polytheism perverts nature, the exponent of its creator.

When you appreciate what defence a police is to the city, the country's army is to it when invaded, you can know what the moral force of religion is, over all the despotisms of peculiar faith-world. She meets the wants of the world-mind, the universe, the creator's purpose.

If you go for the right base of religion, this will secure it; you cannot go for anything better. Not only go for religion, but a religious platform: then all will end well, and happily.

This will invoke the right actions, that will cause the world to approve, give right, just, due credit to all your sincere, pure motives. Monotheism specifies accurately, its position.

Religion is the only means that can pilot the soul, that is thereby like the magnet, safely to God. She will give the filling up that can be made by thoughts, words and deeds. She asks in her jurisprudence, does any injure by invasion of social rights, let him abide the penalty of principles. She regards the endless progression on earth of mind, that of immortality of soul-organization. If mind do not do justice to its soul, it commits the worst of pollutions. The denial of immortality to soul, reflects back the miserable bad government of mankind, who have to be ruled, and must be, and if they depend at all on that, such code of religion must be filled up. There is not only hideous deformity, but vacuum there.

In regard to mind that operates to self-destruction or murder, when the proper government of all preservation is interrupted, the function of all is invaded, and if the view of immortality be thus invaded, the correction must follow.

Monotheism predicates the sternest fortitude of religion, its most illustrious results.

In the abstract and pure solitary inspirations of mind, that expose in all its ablest resources of itself, all the degraded contradictions and the absurd stories of the bible, mind decides correctly, but then enslaved to custom, society and opinions of others, it forfeits all pretensions to freedom of mind, and betrays itself most treacherously to its very best teachings.

If religion be universal, how can it be peculiar in time or space? If God and religion occupy the whole of both, who or what can supersede them?

Monotheism is the superb work of constitutional liberty, both the brightest emanations of rational mind, the most illustrious of all embodiments. Monotheism teaches to be a man, the height and depth of religion, all honest means, if liberalized, such as the bible of rational mind and constitutional liberty, republicanism, not of toryism, mind-treachery and smuggling, not a question of man's bibles, but of religion, not of man, but of God, Creator, not man's creation. Improper advantage has been taken of man's feelings, to take possession of his senses and rights, superseding mind by faith.

If the ignorance of the priestocracy be arraigned, what must be their duplicity, complicity, conspiracy against the world, to condemn it with all their maledictions of superstition and knavish bigotry, for daring to think aright about bibles to analyze and rescind their false pretences to religion? They have stopped at nothing to fabricate the whole beastly proscription.

Monotheism has the most elevated of all standards, rational mind and God the universe Creator; peculiar faith of all shades and tints, its antagonistic, has fanatic man's creation, his bible and gods. The first is of the soul, the last is mercenary. The first carries out all the policy of religion, the last the policy of despotism. Mind has to look up to the first; man degrades himself in looking down on the last.

The rational world has to rally to the proper rescue for social, moral and religious economy.

Monotheism imparts sympathy of soul, she teaches that there is no enjoyment without independence, no peace without innocence.

Speak not of fictitious plaints of Christs, but see most wisely the demands of the world for religion. Enough is in the world, nay, in the universe, if rightly directed, to secure the benefit of all. Tell us not of charity; pay, due justice to the imperative demands of the soul. Monotheism gives mind incorruptibility, and soul immortality. Can anything be wrong about her? Is she not sublimely right? She permits no sectional factions against government. If anything be deemed wrong, seek redress by overt patriotic acts, as a noble Judge Curtis, not preach treason to government, and perjury to mind in the pulpit, as Parker, of Boston. She bids counteract all the ills of life, by mind. The poor to exhibit no ill-will towards the rich by envy or libel, but properly direct mind to all that can be legitimately accomplished, to subvert obsolete regimes and empires by rational republicanism. After all, mind will not be found if properly investigated by the lights of monotheism so bad, as we must allow for the bad impressions and false views from the false frame-work of society. Philanthropists will amend the last, with all the sagacity, the wisdom and protection of mind.

The proper tribunal and standard of the religion of principles, is the standard of principles.

She is consistently competent to meet the enlightened test trial, and prove mind and reason as well as herself, that have been all vilely libeled by polytheism, competent for all demonstration, as principles do not clash, all that are these are sublimely thus demonstrated conclusively so.

What is the mighty reaction of religion on the soul, estimate the beautiful reaction of modesty and emotion, that is the mighty response of nature exalted through the sexes. If peculiar faith does as well as its advocates pretend, what will not the religion of principles, the substance, effect?

Rational religion can meet and defeat, all the sophistry of atheism and polytheism. All that they say of themselves is sophistry, any other is from rational religion, her capital, and to be honestly credited to her unity and identity of mind, no matter about the body.

What can be more fascinating than to live and die a monotheist gentleman, distinguished for religious excellence of character in all that adorns man and mind? It is she that determines non-intervention, holding sacred international treaties, municipal laws and government, by principles of universal justice.

Monotheism will cause rational mind necessarily to respect character, and it institutes ever consistent with itself, a correct view of things, far different from peculiar faiths that differ with each peculiarity. She carries peace ever. She that teaches the highest confidence, that of humility in the Almighty, imparts the principles for the firmest confidence to mind and men, a great desideratum to mankind, while peculiar faith exhibits confidence betrayed.

Can you cavilers or critics object legitimately, to rational religion? Then you are unprincipled, positively, for she is only the consummation, the religion of principles. You are anti-principles as anti-Creator.

Monotheism is pre-eminently conservative and progressive, and has conservative revolutions for her eminent excellent civilization.

Of all nations, this has the greatest materials for national exaltation, and to do it effectually, it has to secure the everlasting benefits of monotheism. It has to cherish it with the deepest affection. Mind in its individual capacity is ever to guard this, for its chief good. How can man ever bear up best and most independently against all the storms of life, without this holy protection? How shall the stranger in all the vicissitudes of life, meet all arising difficulties, without proper references founded on appropriate deportment?

The American mind should seek that which ennobles and makes wise, imparts popular confidence.

Monotheism honors every honorable draft, meets all the requisitions of mind, refers universally to universal relations, and meets universal obligations.

Religion gives the commandments of the God of the universe that have universal, not peculiar relations, which, if mind refuse, that mind is liable to a suicidal negation of universal benefits.

Now the universal commandments satisfy and qualify all the universal wants of mind up to the soul organization, and not only silence all opposition, all criticism, but win the highest tribute of gratitude and adoration.

Not so is it with any of the patch-works of peculiar or pagan faiths. The highest claims of any faith besides that of monotheism, can only be pagan all the time, pagan in nature, and results, self-evident.

Monotheism makes this avowal by the best appreciation of the author of this book, that there is this about Providence, that his own special representatives, conservative principles fully and ably vindicate.

Let the most comprehensive views be taken of this whole subject, and much of it will be apparent.

Try it any way. Is it fornication, promiscuous or special. What are the results, but most specially nugatory of future good?

The parties that are led astray are victims of that or future acts of worse habits. They are not protected against further aggression on principles, as they may commit or suffer murder, infanticide, fœticide, disease, death, infamy, and a host of ruinous consequences, the character ruined and blasted, as that of their family, more or less, the mind affected, deranged, the feelings gone, the sensibility undermined. Is it rationally that we look, then we see a vast vista of good lost and advantages destroyed.

While the crowning triumph of republicanism is monotheism, exalting Americans free and happy to be men, as monotheists, seeing the loveliness of their constitutional government, that is most closely allied to their greatest temporal advantages, yet should they forego the highest obligations of a proper international code, they may alienate too extensively their future permanency.

The best of nations have to guard most strictly their sacred non-intervention from aggression, into the municipal regulations of others, in the great sisterhood of nations. The sword of retributive justice, is one that cuts every way, and prostrates the proudest.

The means of degradation, conclusively the worst and last, that turned the scale against despotism, was peculiar faith, the dupe of mind, the despoiler of its purity, and will sink all to practicable perdition.

Monotheism commands the dignity of nations, the worth of individual character.

She permits nothing privately or publicly that will cause nature or men to blush to own. If this be your motto, then you place your dignity in the highest order of conservation.

What renders ages, nations, pre-eminent?

All the lustre and intrinsic worth of mind best put into practice. She permits no armed interventions, no crusades on friendly nations, for any false pretences of liberty that is piracy—no peculiar faith, factious, or demagogical spirit, under any pretence, to disturb the government of its country.

All such must be considered as palmed on the world, the greatest subverter of its peace.

It is not the apparent impunity, but the real immunity, that religion regards. She comprehends all relations as the wisest foresight of Deity at creation, and she bestows the wisest foresight on mind.

Mankind must not mistake with after opinions.

She does not permit any ascetic condemnation of earth to reject the best, when it is then best profound legitimate direction.

The proper uses of the world by mind is the beneficent and wise purpose of creation. She permits not the abuse when she institutes the whole comprehensive use.

But the gross corporeal materialists affect that all such is for present use, as all obligations cease with what they call death, the last earthly change.

The mighty weakness is in their appreciation.

They, like all special peculiar pagan faithites, reflect on their own abuse or misuse of their mental faculties, involving their whole category with other conjunctions. They only take the animal views of the question.

Monotheism considers death, instead of being the close, is another brighter and more auspicious beginning of immortal existence.

She considers the mind-organization cannot possibly be inferior to the earth, and superior at one and the same time. To say that its elements can master the facts of the universe, yet all of its best powers, functions, and faculties to be subject, in abeyance to earth, is self-contradictory. Mind can master all the elements of earth, conducive to vital existence, under appropriate circumstances. Man roams the earth, traverses the oceans, navigates the air, dives into the bowels of the earth, and extracts therefrom her richest treasures, commands electricity, and overcomes space and time thereby; controls the winds and waves, and renders all tributary and subservient, through the science of mind, that scans the universe, and measures its sublime relations, that proves a capacity to meet questions of other spheres above the universe, when it boldly presents to itself the mighty question of its own self-existent Creator. Here, it finds an adjourned question, that overlooms time and soars to eternity. These prove a God perfect, and a mind, a soul that aspires thus to be.

It tortures the mighty problem, and demands data that cannot be given in mortal existence.

These too clearly demonstrate that corporeal functions of its brightest embodiment, however evanescent, however the only proof, self-evident of its termination, that it only presents an isolated and partial view, and leaves out the balance of the relations of the universe previously discussed.

Its illustrious conservative principles cannot be destroyed, however their functions are suspended; it was only a gross material that became defunct.

That all such was mechanical, as the perpetuity of its principles are renewed according to the proficiency of the soul. The architect is sublimely supreme, and has rendered himself responsible for the perpetuity and supremacy of mind-element, renewable in soul-organization. One of the best earnests is his gratuitous creation.

Life's best appreciable function, the soul, that possesses reason, conscience and will, is an independent individuality, the actor using time, itself and matter. Its future immortal improvement is clearly fore-shadowed in the immediate improvement of mind itself. Whilst mentality of the soul is ever progressive in cumulative improvement, it is essential that it possess all the necessary area appropriate. There can be no limit to mental advancement, only in the essential facts furnished.

Animality never can exceed a definite limit, and needs no transfer. Its organic action is not mentality, and therefore such a theatre is inexpedient and superfluous.

The organic action of mind renders organic areas essential to its position. It is clear that mentality was not created exclusively for animality, when such does not begin to satisfy its taste.

Nothing short of a soul-organization, and its appropriate spheres, can give the satisfactory solution to the whole sublime problem of creation.

The change of pagan worship, from age to age, as the light of mind progresses, eminently proves the progressive appreciation and adoption of monotheism—that will displace all such in time's and reason's progress. Time will be, when all peculiar advocates, will drop all the messiahship machinery, and advocate that entirely of rational religion, that must absorb all faiths as religion. What is the opposition to her principles from the priestocracy, but brutal, vulgar, and unprincipled, from selfish despotism? She decides by mind's civilization, that Solomon in all his sensuality, was much of the animal, and that all his temple professions were idolatrous. Those that are destitute of proper cultivation of conscience, are the animals in all ages of society. What can you do with all such? What is man, having mere animal materialism? All the brutes have all real defined natures, limited by instincts, certain animalities known, the mould of their nature. All creation is thus limited, as all mere animal nature has a defined routine instinct of action. The universe has definite physical principles, that if violated, destroy it at once, but mind clearly having free agency, the richest gift, as a gratuitous creation, is necessarily amenable to the deepest penalties. Otherwise mind might affirm that it could not help itself, but its free agency exonerates the responsibility of the Creator, and creates its own. As to animals, the more valuable they are, the more subservient are they to man's purposes in the whole scheme. Now there is nothing but definite instinctive existence in all, except mind, whose free agency enables it to follow its best qualities, and select its own future good. Why is man made responsible, but for all his mind's functions?

Every point of time, past, present, and to come, benefits mind. And what must not mind anticipate from the paternity of the Creator, to his universal creation?

Conceive of the natural affections, then, of the Author of all existence. All animated nature is subservient to the best of purposes, that must have the most expansive area. The animality is left on earth, the mind and soul organization change to a fitter sphere.

Rational religion holds all peculiar faiths and their propagators in perfect abeyance, as man is a being ever in abeyance to physical, moral, mental, and religious principles. As excellent chemists decide animals to excel vegetables in the multiform organization, so man excels all other creations by excess of religious organization, that proves the immortality of his soul-organization. Man cannot be less than a religious being, which demonstrates immortal existence. Rational religion is any way, worthy of God, the Creator. It is this that renders consolation to the intellectual rational mind deprived of a portion of the five senses. The blind has the function of the past, as he possesses in his mind an individual element, that regulates its storehouse of mentality.

Rational religion is the only catholic faith: all others are peculiar by the full confession of advocates.

This establishes a proper code for penalty of the culprit, and at the same time does exalted justice. Insanity is often plead in justification of high crimes, and defeats justice.

A plea of faith could be one of insanity. Mind may be corrupted by the peculiar scriptures, the worst of all involving hypocrisy, deceit, double-dealing with God and man, self-delusion. What is the state of mind, that has such base? Mind may of itself commit endless errors, therefore all its responsibility must be referred to the highest and perfect tribunal. It can only entrust its best safety to the consummation of the best tuition, that is of monotheism, rational religion.

What interest can it have in peculiar faith, that to the religious eye of science, has not one attraction? It is certain that no peculiar bible of this world can give religion, therefore the immortal treasure must be furnished by monotheism.

MONOTHEISM HOLDS UNIVERSALISM, AN INCIDENTAL QUESTION.

But can the doctrines of universal salvation prevail? The correct answer of reason must refer to the present world, in part, and the perfection of the Creator.

A vast diversity and variety exist among the human mind, graduated in intellect, character, and cultivation. The first best reward for merit accompanies, throughout life, mind refined for virtue and its practical action.

In seeking to render others happy, the action necessarily reflects on the appropriate centre.

Where, even before reaching their dying couch, is the position of the worst of all characters, the tyrants and oppressors of society, the pirates on the rights and feelings, those who delight to crush the human mind in its tenderest sensibilities, the low, debased brutes of vilest crimes, whose company disgraces on this and other spheres the first great character, an honor to man and the delight of Deity? The universal correction is somewhere. What shall be considered of those, who cheat their God by hypocrisy?

The mighty defect is in mind's perversion, individually. The correction is in mind's true intrinsic virtues, and capacity for correction.

After all the professions and pretensions of peculiar faith, mind rises triumphantly to the inherent powers elicited by rational religion. After all bad deeds, mind triumphs, taught by true wisdom the true points essential. To reflect on the errors of the past, and remedy the aggressive causes, teach the wisdom of the future. Mind must vanquish all supposed evils. God knew what man's nature and capacity were at man's creation. Mind will only know them after the universe-solution.

Who can criticise God's creation of man? Bibles of tradition blasphemously attempted it, but their authors were exposed, by their own folly and wickedness recoiling upon them. Who is possessed of the facts of creation, that enlighten us on that sublime action? The priestocracy have blasphemously pretended to it.

Be the relation what it may, all created rational beings, however endowed, are only actors from certain fixed principles circumscribed in creation, and perfect consummation perfects the organization.

God is the supreme—his providence is universal. The very facts of creation bespoke the end and purpose. Mind acts best according to the lights of reason and science. The world suffers according to that perversion—this necessity must arouse its best action. Comprehensive intelligence teaches us that retributive justice, in varied relations, is self-vindicated in the world, and that only commences the solution of the problem. Happiness on earth is graduated, then, in proportion to the best attainment by mind.

Nothing but equal individual merit can equalize all, in the varied states of existence. Enlightened minds, with freedom of religious faith, must redeem themselves from the miserable libel of dark ages on Deity, assert the progressive advantages and character of their own age, and triumph by their own best lights.

They can well rejoice then, all the time, in their Creator, who has made nothing in vain, and cause the future not to be ashamed of them, but rejoice.

All minds will be illumined as far as mind can be, to the verge of its capacity, not trammeled by the defects of idiocy or monomania, nor by the degrading beastliness of savage lowliness, much less by a cowardly acquiescence of the people in the horrid depravity of ignoble tyranny and piracy on the rights and feelings of mind. Then it is not so much the deeds of individual baseness that statesmen have to regard, as the spirit of tame, passive, and humble submission, that vassal mind of the many causes.

Society must be regenerated, on the conservative principles of the universe.

The world will be peopled by civilized beings, and its citizens will be cosmopolites, dispossessed of selfish views less than its circumference, when benevolence is presented aright.

Man's nature, as mind, will embrace its largest scope, and be exalted to its vastest limits.

Then his righteousness can best speak, in the circumference of his ability and peaceful acts.

The triumph will be over selfish considerations, that mislead to ignoble deeds of injustice and bloodshed.

Then nations or individuals will not tyrannize, and debase the human mind.

Constitutional rights of the world will teach mind its rights, and all their duty, the honor of principles. This best performed, will entitle to the fruition of happiness, emanating from purity.

All rational minds must then look forward with the brightest hopes, of realizing in the future all that belongs to mind's fruition.

The pledge of rational mind to merit, and of its rational God, for reward, bespeaks reciprocal obligation, that invokes the highest rationality for consummation, which of itself bespeaks the noblest of all happiness, that of itself radiates to the circumference of the universe, and the munificent duration of eternity.

To take less than this view incontestibly dwarfs mind to instinct, the soul to dust, and circumscribes the universe Creator to imbecility—when that universe demonstrates him possessed of exhaustless elements of creation.

Rational mind seeks the religious improvement, not defined by old regimes of priestocracy, a re-binding to their notions, but the consummation of God-given, written, executed, mind received, reason improved. Thus, catholic will be the glorious rational religion—not as the Romanist, that has pirated every way. Would God put mind created on earth, to prepare it for punishment? The idea is absurd—much less for extinction, for that is barbarism. Man cannot solve the soul-problem short of a soul's theatre. Is this theatre adequate? Not at all: far from it. The soul must be then immortal, and have an adequate universe-theatre.

The moderns have one vast and mighty duty to perform to sacrifice superstition and their bibles, and all their machinery to the sacred holiness of rational religion. Ask the priestocracy to resign, to depart the pulpit and all its hoary sophistry for ever. The world is of the universe, and that refers to God—the soul refers to God. Thus teaches monotheism. But cannot she be refuted? That is impossible, as rational religion is God-given and protected.

Free rational discussion, is on rationality.

The way to return God grateful thanks is by doing the best justice to that mind that he has given us, making it rational, its bright embodiment as pure as possible as the charge that he has given us, to rid the world of superstition, idolatry, priestocracy, absolutism, despotism.

Religion inculcates the idea, the obligation, not to leave the world or society worse than found.

Is religion a reality? As much as mind—the universe—individuality, all of which are held together by inherent conservative principles. Take religion away, and the key stone of creation-arch is destroyed. Now peculiar faith, has not, and cannot have, one particle of religion, no matter the imposing name, Christianity, Judaism, Mormonism, or Mahommedanism.

What does Brahminism produce but the degraded popular castes, the ruin of Asiatic society; what Bhuddism and other peculiar faiths leave of it? What Christianity lacks of this disgusting barbarism, is all due to mind that is getting the ascendancy of all these myrmidons. How is all this conclusively demonstrated? Because of the world's taint from analogous peculiar faith, one of its accursed evil genius to mind, principles and religion. Peculiar faith has divested the world of all these, as far as practicable. The world needs refined civilization, and that is only got by the consummation of rational mind in religion, the consummation of man's duty here, the highest aspirations of the future.

Nothing is out of date with monotheism, that is not out of the protection of principles. The more sacred the subject, the more rational investigation it demands of all rational minds. Religion demands most of all, by freemen. The peculiar faith-man, refers to his bible as the standard. The rational religionist refers to the Creator, as exemplified through the universe as the standard. Command your own best self-respect, on principle. Promise and act, on principle, the highest order of morals and religion.

Never let money stand between you and morals, much less religion. Let your word be your bond, and that on principle, not on impulse, to get you into any difficulty. Pursue the path of principle in defiance of the world's seduction or its influence. Always understand matters properly, before commission. This thing of power of any little brief authority, is most clearly to be considered, before any proceeding or acquiescence. Let nothing be conceded without principles. All grants of power must be constitutional, to be rightly used as trust, otherwise there is abuse of principles. We do not know so much of theology, as of religion that is implanted in all rational minds. What is the limit of an honest truthful mind as to temptation, but what is eternally based on principles? Who can tell, better than time, that convicts pretended prophets? Can aught save the world but religion, in the most essential points of society? The whole of the opposition to monotheism or rational religion, is unprincipled.

Monotheism after all the analysis of bible and church-matters of peculiar faith, decides that none such have religion. It remains for the Americans to prove to the world, that they have solved the problem of religion. The Holy Book of God, is his universe. Any black letter book, a peculiar bible, is a false picture. No master can be safely followed. Adopt principles.

Religion must be rational, and demands rational education, nothing short of it. But what shall we do for the Christian religion? There is no Christian religion. It is all a misnomer. There is only rational religion, but christian peculiar faith, and what does that all amount to but paganism most genuine? If the advocates contend for their faith being religion, then their own game is eternally blocked on them by the world gamblers in the balance of such stocks. Calling things by names, does not establish its first principles. How much is the world deceived, by all such fooleries. The world must expunge all its false position, to do right on its theatre fully and satisfactorily, to be entitled to the best earnest hereafter. Nothing else can answer, as nothing else is a test. Every base of ill feelings, and will, and all malign influences, must be removed from the world, at the instance of rational religion that commands the moral intellect of mankind. When any world-citizen talks of religion, he can only speak, write, think of and act on rational religion, and if he be not strictly truthful and honest, he cannot start on more than the God-given elements of religion that all rational minds have as creation-gifts, but which he has most basely perverted.

He must ever stick until he speaks the truth, and acts honestly for ever. Now what is the state of all peculiar faiths? Not a particle of truth is in their first or last points. What others they have, they have smuggled and embezzled. They will have to disgorge all their infamous plagiaries and larcenies.

Rational religion improves on her virtues, while peculiar faith holds to her odious and exploded vices and crimes, sinking lower to her lowest depths. The progress of rational religion in America, will prove the gratefulness to the winners of pure government. The vipers of atheism and polytheism bite a file when they assail monotheism, rational, the only religion. Can monotheism make the perfect gentleman, the accurately religious, the best aspirant to immortal fruition? Can it cause the enactment of perfect justice, to the absent? Who are the dignitaries of the land? Those who have the dignity of rational mind. Those who honor self-respect of mind, their word, obligation, honor and life, above all, religion rational. With them, the whole world adopting conservative principles, the details settle themselves. With them, truth and honesty are matters of habit as they are settled principles.

Rational religion requires the world, mankind to act so as to make every day as a holiday, every thought, word, and deed, winged messengers of future joy. The highest exercise of mind on earth, is the consummation of rational religion.

If a man die in his sins, he will be damned, say the peculiar faith bibles. What sins? Because he does not believe the rickety sophists, the priestocracy? Now rational religion inculcates the highest legitimate actions, words and thoughts with the best appreciation of nature's laws, God's laws, as the right position when carried out on the chastest taste legitimately furnished.

All others are false.

But for religion there would be no consummation of virtue, of conservative principles, to keep all in abeyance, &c. By the wisdom of rational religion, the world has due respect to innocence of mind that is as bold as truth, that is the boldest yet the most modest. She teaches the world not to contravene the customs of nature and nature's laws, but those of erroneous men not in abeyance to rationality. There can be nothing more of a dignitary on earth, than a perfect monotheist.

ANALYSIS OF FAITH, HOPE, REASON, TRADITION, RESURRECTION.

Peculiarity in faith, hope, &c. necessarily condemns all such. God's attributes being universal in their power, indite universal character, authority, faith, and all essential principles, and stamp their universal acceptance to all rational minds.

Peculiarity of faith, then, is originated by mortals in bad faith, is inconsistent with God's universal attributes, is basely unjust, and must meet with universal reprobation and rejection by all rational and enlightened minds.

Mind of rational beings is universal, and takes cognizance of universality as legitimate when Deity is considered, and worth of mind is assessed.

Reason, not tradition, takes proper cognizance of God's works, that universally speak to mind.

Faith and hope can only refer to God through mind, most reasonably, truthfully and honestly.

Tradition, then, does not embrace nor cover time and space, clearly proving its untenable position, that reason amply supplies in eternity universally over time.

What can reason say for man's resurrection?

All that can be said in truth on this earth.

What can tradition do for that, anterior to its cognizance? Tradition must fall on imposition to affect any knowledge beyond this world.

The way to meet this question truly is to be prepared to meet the Author of creation by the best course of life to God and man.

Reason can say, and sincere and faithful minds must abide her supreme decision, that the resurrection of man is certainly in the right hands, those of his Immortal Creator only, who is sublimely omnipotent in man's creation in the endowing the attributes of mind.

Where is proof direct of any resurrection on this earth? Is any recorded, that will pass the ordeal of an enlightened mind, capable of justice?

Will any honorable court of conscience authorize the faith of reason in any resurrection days after death, which must prove conclusively, all it can prove, its immediate execution?

It is the highest proof to see the defenders of any such doctrines avoid the condemnation, by shirking the main questions, the proof of authenticity of all the bibles. The balance are of no consequence now.

Was Christ's resurrection proved, when no positive proof is exhibited of his body being positively in the sepulchre, when the door was sealed? How can we take that for granted?

No court of justice will affirm that much, when dissolution proves the immediate departure of the spirit from the body.

Who does not wish to stop the father and mother of base superstition, sophistry?

Kill that, and the world-monster is dead.

To do so, give mind its legitimate triumph.

In the name of God of the universe, let not minds, aspiring to be enlightened in a free world, suffer themselves misled by such base superstition.

It will be an everlasting disgrace to freemen of the world, if intelligent, who are prepared to accept such humbuggery. the offcast of a degraded part of the globe.

Natural phenomena being most obscurely appreciated in the dark ages of the world, the mere imposition and pretence to miracles, divination, divine inspiration and prophecy were assumed in all the circles of priestocracy through mythology.

All their bibles are those of mythology, while the bible of rational mind espouses the only true principles of rational religion.

After all the pretended objections to science and philosophy in faith, how can they be dispensed with by the wisest, who seek a full knowledge of natural phenomena as essential to combat successfully all the difficulties of ignorance, error and prejudice, backed by bigotry.

The fault is in the people, who are humbugged about peculiar faith and all its peculiar frauds, when they can master the powers to control the degradation of their own nature.

INSPIRATION, REVELATION, PROPHECIES, MIRACLES.

The veils of the future are a bliss bestowed on mind for the best of purposes, for man's own internal peace, constituted as he is by emotions in regard to death, hope and fear for punishments, and the penalties for improper transgressions. If mind take cognizance of this subject rightly, the world that is so much disturbed by the Romanist view will be at rest.

That view is a very slavish doctrine of mind. The universal Creator has cognizance and exclusive power over natural phenomena, and these he has subjected to conservative principles that represent him, both unchangeable. To reverse them, or execute miracles would be a change of himself, an impossibility in his immutability, and be the God of the universe; also unsafe, inexpedient, unwise and unnecessary, for all wise minds, in the dignity of philosophical science, recognise his supremacy best by their consummation in the universe. No one but impostors on the best rights and interests of the community of the world could seek to perpetrate such degraded frauds, under the assumption of peculiar faith, as none but the Creator can have any power at all on the phenomena of creation, and no worthy member of society can put forth any pretension to appropriate more than what mortals universally have. Every man in his own mind well knows how incapable and incompetent mortals are to perform one single function of a miracle.

The whole constitutes false pretences, and the most wicked humbugs of the world. If peculiar faith had not been stilted on such, it could not have breathed at any time.

While the world may have to deplore past transgressions of the degraded impostors, it has to exert its most intellectual exertions from being the dupe and transgressor in turn, lest it make itself the curse and laughing-stock of posterity.

The reverse of principles implies miracles, or destructive negative qualities, the exercise of which, not understood by man presuming to chronicle God's government, impeaches at once wisdom and creative attributes.

The fair creation is often read with error, if not with impiety, the necessary and inevitable result of all systems of peculiar faith, that mislead from the only True One, recognising the unity of an Immortal Supreme, as those systems produce a constant sophistry, that mislead from truth and beget bigotry in their followers, antagonism if not contempt of the rest of the world for all such, and a culpable indifference to the requisitions of what is genuine and most worthy.

Baffled forever and entirely exploded are the tenures of those supposed strongholds if the zealot will persist in asserting them. He has to learn that miracles cannot possibly exist before the light of mind, as they are now forever superseded by a knowledge of natural phenomena. They are all as baseless as the peculiar faith that originated them. All such are false and foul pretences.

Miracles have never existed. Their record has ceased, because popular ignorance has abated.

A recent sect, the Mormons, as preceding ones, tried miracles, but they could not flourish in this or any enlightened age.

Then the age or authority the more affecting religion, mind, highest duty, the more disgraceful, and is impeached forever, that does assert, much less propagate, the doctrine of miracles, that always derogate from God's divinity and perfection.

Baffled to the last points in the category and links of corruption, the zealot refers to prophecies.

But here he is estopped by the undeniable fact, that time is God's only true prophet, and most benevolent at that, in only disclosing fast enough for man's good and feelings; hence prophecies are a libel on God's attribute of benevolence, to say nothing of the blasphemy of the false pretence.

The priests' God is not the God of the universe, painted as he is in false colors, and indebted to the priests' miracles, prophecies, enigmas and mysteries; of course the doctrine has to be dismissed as that of superstition. The talisman of science, the sceptre of the true God of the universe, silences not only the priests, but their god, all very corrupt and bloody, wrathful, and worst of all, a very changeable being.

Baffled to the last, with consummate impudence, arising in ignorance and bigotry, he refers to peculiar faith, mysteries, and enigmas; and fearful of not escaping if located on earth, he puts them in other regions.

But God made the universe, and wrote down all the characteristics with his own hand of electricity, all readable in simple appreciation as far as needed; of course, then, no mysteries but to ignorance.

The faith that reaches God is only the faith of reason, that can go no farther. Any other than rational faith is credulity, dependent on false positions and interpretations.

When God speaks to man he uses plain facts.

Priestocracies use mysteries, and veil them in enigmas, which the experience of best histories incontrovertibly proves impostures.

The mystery turns out a simple duty, that honest minds appreciate. The enigma or mysterious revelation of priests is needed to have that guessed at which proper sense tells straight forward, unless arrested by the trick and cruelty of the interlopers, who want pay or power for interpretation.

The cobwebs of the dark ages, and their darker workers, all the sphinxes, must be swept away forever and at once, as dangerous to the rights and morals of mind.

But reason is not the coin used by absolutism. That did not aspire to all the best means on earth. It affected to be divine, so miscalled, to maintain itself. All that are on the right side can well show it. All are meant, that their own position proves. The history is too plain to mistake absolutism for aught but an enemy to the rights of mind.

All are acquitted that reason acquits.

Absolutism, then, does not refer to reason, but to faith. How comes faith of any peculiar character?

It is the faith only of absolutism, that carries its point by the bayonet, or by malign sophistry.

But it is asserted to be the faith of the bible. So much the worse! It is corruption the blackest, that fawns on absolutism, unprincipled, and acting in the worst of bad faith. Faith, then, means any and every thing that credulity chooses to believe, and absolutism dictates.

But the degraded sycophancy of the world, that clings to the casts-off of sophistry, assumes that miracles have ceased, as if ever performed in good faith, or otherwise than by jugglery, legerdemain, or ventriloquism.

The miserable imposition is on the present mind, as if such things ever did take place, and never emanated from a lying priestocracy, always intent on popular deception for their own immediate emolument. Kings and priests have combined, and succeeded in deceiving the world.

Whoso propagates such sophistry is responsible for the frauds thereby committed; but what do an unprincipled priestocracy care for all if they can escape detection?

Every agent and preacher who help to propagate these doctrines are morally guilty of crime, high treason, and perjury.

Well can it be affirmed that miracles have ceased, because they never existed but in the brains of wiseacres, and the tongues and hands of pious knaves.

They only appear to cease, because stupid and blind ignorance, credulous of nonsense, has abated, and the phenomena of nature better understood by science.

Various hoaxes are often played now upon the people, and have been in every age, for all the seducing emoluments and gain to be derived therefrom.

The fact is, the people act their part too well in this senseless imposition upon them.

They are the dupes, so intended, to obtain from them their invaluable treasures of mind, to reach those of their pockets.

Will they be sold without redemption to such impostors; will they play their part in this iniquitous game, make senseless ignorance as culpable as unprincipled knavery, and worse than the deluded vulgar of more than eighteen centuries past; will they continue the currency of the base counterfeits, after being taught that this is spurious coin?

The people, if the subject be addressed successfully to their animal passions, fears, and ignorance, and most cunningly too, in the state of the conscience too often guilty, are ever credulous.

The other phenomena of bible of tradition-ethics, like that of the star locomotion in Christ's times, are more than remarkable, beyond any credence of rational faith. The canopy of heaven is naught but thin atmosphere; beyond, are the hosts of bodies of the universe.

Nothing but meteors pass on or near the earth, and they are projectiles of volcanoes, more or less, if solid.

The success of these abuses, indoctrinating the credulous part of the world into pretended miracles, brings forward unlimited faith-perversions.

The peculiar doctrines of Judaism, originating from eastern peculiarities, without doubt, most probably from Chaldea, where astronomy was cultivated, and priestocracy predominated, was the peculiar mother of a prolific offspring, the end of which is not yet.

On that arose Christianity, with her hundreds of divisions. On these two arose Mahomedanism, with its sects. Again, in these latter days, has been thereunto added the Mormon peculiarity.

The others, older sisters of superstition, desire to disown her, but the sisterhood is indelibly established, and what is a good ear-mark, they are all pagan, a foul crowd.

The priority of age is nothing at all in all such faiths; the characteristic superiority is in successful sophistry.

The world has to be deceived into its deception. "The greatest art is to conceal the art."

If the Mormons spoke with new tongues, what else could Christians expect, whose master asserted that "these signs shall follow them that believe."

Although hundreds of Mormons might have sworn and perjured themselves, that their prophet did not die without resurrection to them, still all their miracles and pious frauds fell still-born on the intelligent, for want of an ignorant age.

If intelligence heeded the Mormons, it was only perverted, as in all systems of miracle faith, by hope of rewards.

In what respect, then, are the Mormons less than their other peculiar faith brethren of the world?

But the greatest miracle is, it is surprisingly strange that the people, sovereigns as they are of mind and its cultivation, of the mastery of thought, should permit themselves to be led about by a few characters, as if a mighty elephant governed by his keepers, with this difference, that the elephant only succumbs to his friend the keeper, whereas the people succumb to masters alienated to their true interests, else the priests have no concert of action, and do not know what they are about.

Where is mind all this time, asleep or infatuated?

The miracles are mockeries and trifles, not fit for children; when the author is most wanted now, in time and space, he is not present, nor are his memorials, through his works, before us to represent him to the satisfaction of mind, honesty, and reason. Miracles cannot elucidate for mind, that looks for reason. Miracles are not rational.

But God's works are always before us, day and night, material and spiritual, that shame into confusion the impostors.

Miracles cannot be when the word of God comes through science, his messenger, that can only expose usurpations and monopolies, that are always jealous of talents and virtue in opposition, as all such rest on a false base, and never can be safe while reason and mind can combat them.

When phenomena are offered to our respectable credence, then they must be analogous to what reason requires, as philosophy teaches. All phenomena are for the five senses to recognise, that all refer to reason, and faith through reason.

The natural causes must be rightly traced, and none assigned that are not supported by nature's facts.

Phenomena, co-incident to any event, are not identified with it, as an eclipse of any sphere is not connected to the various births and deaths, marriages, and all vital business cotemporary to such phenomena.

Analogy, that takes the place of analysis in her absence, will set all right if true science be truthfully carried out.

Mankind must be enlightened by mind's light, reason, not to mistake the phenomena of the elements of nature, and give due credit to the creative power.

Faith of all kinds must have the truthful testimony of science in all cases of doubt, to satisfy man's mind.

Grant that all the sects of peculiar faith could not rise to a better state, and that only those have survived that conformed most to mind's advance, we have outlived those times, the days of miracles, when all that ever depended on miracles ought to die too.

Let the believer in miracles look to science for a solution of natural phenomena. The Jew bible says that "the windows of heaven were opened!" What was its heaven? "The firmament" that held the waters!

In those times of the tradition, the arch of the blue ether heaved above, was considered heaven, until wise astronomers lifted the veil, and by teaching man to look beyond at the millions of systems of worlds, that truly speak the only words of God, who created the universe, plainly prove the ignorance of those asserting this fiction, as heaven is as much antipodal as above us. So much for priestocracy inspiration, that is unquestionably priestocracy ignorance.

Now the telescope as improved by mind, recalls daily more and more magnificence, and shows space unlimited only by mortal vision, the universe exhaustless filled with the expansive riches of creation. While at the same time, the microscope, the work of mind too, displays to the minutest points, another part of creation of minutest greatness.

Did the botches of bible tradition ever dream of this philosophy? No wonder that they were afraid of the mirror of God, that reflected so strongly their deformities of mind. What can miracle-mongers expect of the Supreme?

What shall we think of those propagating such stuff at the present day?

All wisdom proves conclusively and incontestibly that we take nothing for granted that mind can test, prove, or easily investigate.

When any character pretends to deny this position, then his faith and philosophy, which simply mean the purest wisdom, rest on no foundation, and are negatived on all good principles. He may pretend to mysteries, and that the eye of faith can only see things after experience of peculiar character. But he actually forgets he stands on the platform of universal nature, and cannot escape by any pretences, spiritual or temporal, whether he assumes anything divine or of the heart. It is not as he wishes, but as God of nature has done.

Our part of analysis discloses the whole matter, that there can be no mysteries that contravene reason and her assistants, analysis and analogy, then how can the experience of the heart be philosophically correct, when the mind and the standard of reason utterly contradict and condemn all such?

This age is too enlightened, and owes it to itself to disenthral all, as far as practicable, by a better and wiser code of morals, when facility of faith, that is credulity, goes to corrupt the world in weakness of intellect, as many cannot distinguish but as they are directed!

Many tell us about passages of the bible read, as if that was proper evidence; they have been over the books, but was mind there, and was that mind fit to be trusted? Immortal minds seek the analysis of immortal truth, not the contemptible trash of ignoble ignorance.

Has mind's reverence been correct, its intelligence sufficient to see what an impotent God this bible made the Creator, divested of his intrinsic attributes and virtues, at the very time that it did its best to make miracles, a perfect libel, but self-impeachment of man? This is detestable for this or any age, however the world likes humbugs, which all wise and honorable men will arrest.

There is the resurrection that many good people believe actually took place! Would that all was right, and if it were right that the fact was unmistakable. But the Almighty never permitted blasphemous false pretences to have but one position, to define their own exposure and felony.

Joseph is said to have laid the body of Christ enveloped in the cloth, in the sepulchre, but who watched all the time, till Jesus was missed?

If the facts were tried to-day before an intelligent judge, the verdict would have to be, that there was no decisive proof at all that the body of Jesus was identified in the sepulchre, and that the resurrection ever took place from the sepulchre!

The testimony of the adherents about seeing Christ's spirit cannot be correct, for no spirit can be seen by mortal eyes, much less angels, whom God needs not as messengers, when he has mind and his principles to minister to it. That is an utter fabrication, about ghosts. When will the world shake off all this chaos of fraud?

Christ with the mission of a God, could have invited the whole world to witness his master miracles, could have called the planets, even the sun from his system, and could have caused the most public exhibition of his body laid out before the world, and then shown his triumphant resurrection, a mighty miracle indeed. But here eighteen centuries afterwards, much of the world is actually at a stand from doubt about any one of his merits, if they have not actually seen his demerits.

And this the being for mind to embrace, not doubtingly, but affectionately and devoutly? The world needs no better evidence of folly, than such credulity.

Why cannot we have miracles and prophet-inspirations now, as all such are as much needed in every age and country?

All such were laid low, because ignorance has departed, except among ignorant savages who have their rain-kings and war-prophets.

Happiness needs no mystery, to flourish on universal morals. What is inspiration? Some think it a supernatural gift of God to that man, who is this chosen one.

It is supposed to be a peculiar endowment, a miraculous influence by the operation of the spirit. But the God of nature is universal, not peculiar, else he was not the God of the universe.

What nation is there that had had specific peculiar faith, but thought theirs the chosen one of God, as the Jews, Druids, Christians, Mahometans, Mormons?

Science and philosophy discard all these, as preposterous dogmas. Inspiration, then, cannot be peculiar, but universal, graduated to the talents, their successful improvement and employment.

Mind that is cultivated by science and philosophy, conductors to the fountain of God, is the better instructed and rightly employed, the nearer it approaches to the fount of wisdom. But mind best endowed, yet perverted, is wicked, profligate and degraded, and though a master genius, may be one of evil to the world and the race of mankind. The Mormon faith is as much as any peculiar faith, and in using strange tongues as gifts, they could not in this age of science and philosophy, inspire the faith of others too rational for that, but believers in past pretences no better, because it is reason that governs modern acts in all other matters among present believers, but superstition that rules their faith in such ancient institutions, no better, in truth. Thus we see where the doctrine of inspiration leads us. Hence all are responsible for any peculiar faith that misleads the world about inspirations.

The bible of tradition, a mass of contradictions and false pretences, fills the world with errors arising necessarily from the ignorance of the supposed inspired writers, who could not embrace full knowledge of science and philosophy, which the bible-followers had to outrage through hand-maids of God, to seem right before the vulgar circles of the world.

Mind then has to advance a bible of rational mind, as mind progresses in science and philosophy.

There have been many messiahs, but all must be false that cannot perform any inspired functions necessarily, because messiahships encroach on God's dominion.

The more you inculcate the messiahship, that much you detract from God and his attributes.

Monotheists oppose all inspiration of peculiar faith, and monotheism is the only system of religion that admits the providence of God universal on principles, and accountability of mind for the immortality of the soul through its spirit, by its moral free agency.

The mercy of Providence bespeaks pardon for transgression on repentance, and future rewards for practice of good deeds. This is all in the course of secure results, through conservative principles.

What especial revelations have been made to mind, but by or through reason that renders it rational? What rational mind of respectable weight can seize on any other, but through reason?

Where, then, is peculiar inspiration? Is it at last the sole creature of peculiar faith, ready to do its bidding, abased by all its peculiar corruptions?

The world cannot be governed by all such peculiar institutions, that are necessarily the works of man and corrupt at that, when the universe has a claim on it as a sphere subject to its universal, not peculiar laws. Sectarianism cuts down the possibility of its being right Inspiration of bible writers! The first commenced in fraud and deception; and the last ended in imposition and blasphemy. Who endorses the endorsers, but impostors?

We cannot commit more heinous sins of iniquity, than to blaspheme God with such infamous superstitions.

PROPHECY.

The veil that obscures the future can only be lifted by an Almighty, who has placed it over the same for the best good of all, to prevent all the incidents identified with such a position, otherwise, suicide, murder, and misery, might be a part of the result. Let any man know his destiny that it might terminate here, and that he was the more miserable, the longer he lived.

He might seek to end the existence of himself, and all that caused his misery.

Hence, all are impostors, that pretend to prophecy by authority of the Creator.

None but the wise can appreciate the future by the past, from analogy by analysis with the aid of reason. There is no inspiration but of mind and reason that must be enlightened, to appreciate the ways of general Providence.

The idea of peculiar providence has begotten the most peculiar outrages on the whole world.

All peculiar faith advocates have sought to monopolize, pervert, and coerce mind, and have degraded all things by their peculiar pretences.

Inspiration and revelation came, it is said, by the ministry of angels. Now that we hold impossible, to supersede conservative principles.

All peculiar faith is defunct, for there can be no especial revelation or inspiration.

But the authors of miracle, prophecy, and mystery doctrine, affected them, some think to carry the day. Corruptly and basely, rational minds must say.

Moses affected to meet God at Mount Sinai; Mahomet sought Gabriel, and so did Numa Pompilius seek Egeria, the goddess so called, as if the people were to be told the truth about religion, by having the utmost false pretences of miracles and prophecies advanced for their belief.

Who but the base and vulgar ignorant, can believe them essential to religion?

Who but the same can believe peculiar faith anything else, than the deepest curse of the world.

Who cannot see the difference, while reason and truth regulate religion, sophistry and falsehood intrigue for peculiar faith?

The bible of tradition speaks of particular prophecies; do we actually know the lineage of the nations of the world, by any such authority? Who will endorse it as worth the reading?

A few cities are spoken of, but where are the cities of the world? Real prophecy would have embraced cities, buried for thousands of years under their rubbish. Are there not several ancient cities, that have been traceless as to their ruins? Did not general causes operate on them?

What is there of Egypt, that is uncommon to most of the countries of antiquity? It is no worse than might be expected of uncivilized countries, however the Jews might have inveighed against it and eastern cities, by feelings of intense enmity for past captivities.

Is it still tributary and subject to strangers? Is that true?

It has its own sovereign, and that proves a high position for that country. What was such prophecy worth? To gratify the malignant feelings of the Jews? What have the moderns to do therewith?

But how much of the prophecy is left to conjecture and speculation of an ignorant posterity? What is all such worth? The affiliated have to help out the pretences.

There is prophecy, as supposed, against the Roman church. What is there against the Greek church, that is equally guilty? Against Grand Lamaism, their prototypes?

All such tends to beget a curious and restless spirit of superstition, to carry out by Millerism, and other absurd notions, the fulfilment of pretences all false. Is mind so weak, as to be imposed upon forever by written superstitious legends, when the original pagan oracles have passed off the stage of action?

All bibles of tradition, the work of false pretences forever by the necessity of their nature, are run into the pretended mystery and power of a peculiar God, to escape the conviction that natural phenomena do not admit of miracles. The sophistry is to make the vulgar wonder, responsible for miracles. The veracity of the God is affected to be disputed, if the lies of the tradition are exposed! What degradation. The veracity of the God of the universe is proclaimed by its organization, never to be contradicted by sound minds. Assuredly He has no need of such paltriness as miracles. Their calibre is too small for him.

Science lifts the veil of wonder from phenomena, that miserable ignorance once proclaimed miracles, as a mere boy knows more now, than wise adults did anciently. Science in one department, enlightens the whole circle.

Mind has to appreciate all this rightly, or it fails in duty. Once it was a system by the pretence of divine rights of absolutism of kings, priests, and soldiers, to keep all in ignorance; now the divine right of the people proclaims its majesty, and makes science common stock.

None can learn too speedily and practically, for universal benefit.

In more ancient times, the people had but few books, and they were as silly as the bigoted minds of the authors were perverted. The vices of the times upheld abominable errors.

Much was submitted to tradition of self-conceited bigots, hence, errors, frauds, and ignorance prevailed, for centuries upon centuries, and without help, especially too, where conscience, the noblest faculty to nurture the principles of religion, was deficient, in her triumph of a just and enlightened mind.

Kings could not read, and the people had but little of the benefits of rational minds.

The priests had the learning, such as it was, dwarfed to the narrow precincts of bigoted minds, and of course they had the feeling to misuse it.

The gullibility of ignorant people is always counted on by bad men of all classes.

Of course, the priestocracy held to all the mysteries, miracles, and prophecies, all the jugglery of mind, all the secrets of psychology, to enslave the multitude.

The platform that superstition and despotism reared, was that of iniquity, and will finally sink itself, or finally sink all that reared it.

What shall we say of pestilences, that decimate the world?

What else than our iniquities either to the great principles and laws of nature directly, or to the Creator of the universe, could have occasioned such by means of natural causes?

Minds perverted have excluded Almighty God from his own universe, to which the creations of his own genius entitled him. Strange god-idols. man-worship, have been introduced, as an abomination, before his august and supreme power—dovetailing them into his essence and being, most absurdly and blasphemously. This was the most vulgar trick of polytheism. What worse was atheism?

How could he refrain from destroying the world, for its unholy actions, sins of blasphemy—the chief of sins—but for his mercy, that has prevailed, with his voluntary creation of mind, entrusted to its own free-agency, under the circumstances, the conservative principles of the universe? His immutability saved all, from the very counterfeits of priestocracy, miracles, &c.

Repent, men of superstition, idolators, and man-worshippers; turn to the living God, the only Creator and God. The light of rational mind scatters miracles and prophecies, as ignorance ceases.

Thus the world is wiser, therefore there is less imposition; and the world is better. The whole world, by the light of reason, is becoming utilitarian, and makes mind more rational.

What numbers are deluded to seek prophecy and miracles, and to interpret the unfulfilled prophecies and judgments? the problem never to be solved. The pursuit is as vain as that after the perpetual motion. And what fanaticism of Millerism, &c. follows! The devotees are willing to consign the minds of the people to a pervading superstition, and the world to destruction, that their foolish solutions may come to pass, as they told us so.

All peculiar faiths may have their fire and brimstone, that they get from volcanoes—all their devil-angel ministers of evil, that they get from Vulcan, who originated volcanoes, they pretend; but the exploded doctrines of the mythologists cannot stand before the modern analysis of natural phenomena.

The narrow prejudices of superstition and vulgar errors, the contracted faith of witchcraft, that murdered millions of citizens upon citizens with fanatical fury, and all the wretched machinery, arousing the fears of the world, must yield to science and philosophy, the true friends of mind, the lovely daughters of religion.

Prophecy adds to mind's misery and evil, hence it is not God's work, for time is his prophet.

Who, of the present day, ever saw the miracles? And none but peculiar faith ever claimed such false pretences, denied to all ages.

What sound mind is there, that is not satisfied, that they are all humbugs.

Pious frauds, however the capital, are not to give Moses—the priestocracy—weight with cultivated mind, about the oddest mixture of all animal creations blended in one house for months—the smallest peculiar insects crossing the deepest and widest oceans to escape the very thing they thus encountered, in getting to the ark.

The plainest sense and best philosophy contradict the idea, that all the waters should rise, by a general deluge, to flood the whole globe at once, however they acted on the four-cornered plane, their creation.

What will it profit that mind to pretend to belief of such absurdities, to gratify the morbid taste and false philosophy of a priestocracy, at the same time knowing all such to be false, and damning its own purity, to an unnecessary purification, for such abominable perdition? Let the world look to its duty, above all things, and not become contemptible by credulity.

God deals in reason, through rational minds. Man affects miracles, most stupidly, victim of superstition, ignorance, and error.

Where is the consistency, in right and justice?

God alone is our instructor, but modest alone must be principles that elicit his aid.

On what do you rest your faith?

On revelation, miracles, prophecies, and mysteries. But revelation can only be by tradition, that is absurd; the others, of course, must be false, as all other deductions therefrom claimed. And, as false, all good and true citizens would wish them exposed, and if true, to see them confirmed.

Miracles, prophecies, and mysteries, bespeak collusion on the part of operators and writers, and gross, vulgar ignorance on that of the believers.

God created all the universe, as natural phenomena in their current proper action; such has been and will be the order of things universal. If miracles were to exist, conservative principles would terminate.

Miracles reverse order, and produce disorder, which is unsafe and inconsistent with safety. Who believes that an all-wise Almighty reverses this order of nature, when his universe proceeds best when right; which fact not only convinces of supreme power, but creates the most exalted conception of the Creator? The very pretence that miracles have ceased, proves mutability, that is inconsistent with God's immutability. What necessity was there of miracles, to prove a God, who is universally and supremely proved? What pretence has a miracle in face of the whole universe, that is God's document? All the miracles in creation could not prove a mortal a God.

What proof of miracles, past or present, is there, in all creation? Such in this universe would disprove God. We have none that is worthy of enlightened mind. And yet the proof-marks would have been unmistakable, as God's works; hence, all is folly, untruth, and libelous, that God reverses the order of creation, to accomplish what he can better do otherwise, and what is not practicable, in fact, while he is God. All this is man's libel of Deity.

Volcanoes are mere safety-valves, and a correct appreciation of them and all the fearful phenomena of nature, renders a blessing of mind.

The leviathan is a fiction arising from the gross ignorance of vulgar minds, prepared to receive miracles, and not prepared to appreciate science, electricity, &c. With the Almighty, nothing in this universe is a miracle, where order and harmony universally reign. If they did not, chaos and confusion would arise, showing God imperfect and imbecile, the reversal of nature's laws, not miracles, that cannot exist with conservative principles. All this is the worst libel on the immutable perfection of God, and nature's laws. God can no more make a miracle, that destroys the consistent preservation of the universe, than he can act inconsistently, and maintain his character.

God is not the God of miracles, prophecies, and mysteries of priestocracies, nor the peculiar God of any chosen peculiar people, a mere machine of fable. A miracle is an inconsistency physical, and involves a moral inconsistency of God.

Nothing is impossible to the God of nature, within the sphere of his universe; but he is not the God of man's notions. We could no more expect of God a miracle, than wanton sin of a wise and good citizen, in his right senses and corporeal functions, who sought the greatest good of his world.

It is, then, all nonsense about miracles: worse, if anything, about prophecies and mysteries.

These are the designs of knavish, and the belief of credulous, people. The world must by this time see that there can be no miracles; the thing is in us, or the deception in those assuming rank imposition.

Astronomers agree on the order of the universe, and we might, on that order and system, affirm no God, as miracles. If there be a God, as the noblest systems of systems prove, then there can be no miracles; for his conservative principles totally prevent all such.

Miracles certainly impeach the Creator of the universe of imbecility. The polytheists, miracle-mongers, detailers of false pretences and small scandal, make themselves atheists the very moment they cut God out of his high estate, as his rule is then imperfect and imbecile. If miracles had been the means, they might have been too clear for mind to have mistaken them.

Proper sense impeaches all miracles, and all bibles of tradition for miracles, proving that systems of faith without reason, as miracles, are those without honesty.

Miracles are against the order of nature; then it is in us, not in miracles, that cannot exist thus. The God of the universe, would be actually unjust to himself, to entrust the power of divination and prophecy, fore-knowledge, to individuals, when he gives universal powers. He does not violate his own glorious attributes, functions or principles.

This inconsistency unmakes the God of the universe, and dwarfs him for the peculiar god of priestocracies, whom mind enlightened, cannot respect, revere or adore.

Such characters could usurp power as the priests sought, and be invested with extraordinary qualities and endowments of life. What rational mind analyzing its own defined position, can believe all this a moment?

All honest sense impeaches any work of man as divine revelation. It is all rant and cant, about the third heaven, improperly so-called. What is prophecy but the old plan of divination, by dreams, visions, oracles? such as pagan augurs and soothsayers' used. The adopters are as bad as these.

All the bible-miracles being impossibilities, need absolute confirmation for constant and current time.

They are all denied as positive falsehoods, and the proof is demanded or the assertors will be pronounced felons and perjurers. Miracles are not natural, but effects have been misinterpreted as supernatural, when they all had only adequate causes of nature, acting under the conservative principles of the universe. There can be no miracles, as all effects must have adequate causes. Miracles are unnatural. Now we see nothing, hear or read nothing that is unnatural. All else, is false history assuredly. If the perfect God of the universe had inspired about creation, he could not have been so unjust as to libel himself and creation. God cannot be inconsistent with himself. All purported miracle histories are libels of God.

The great objection to prophecy was, that so much was false. All was false clearly. How was it possible for prophecy, God's function, to exist?

We have been told of some prophecies—how can any usurp the functions of time? How many millions have proved false, but they were left untold. No doubt, many volumes of such stuff were written and destroyed. Take the chief of prophets, as an example of truth not told. Isaiah, ch. ix. v. 7, says, "of the increase of his government and peace, there shall be no end upon the Throne of David," &c. He was a false prophet, no matter of whom he wrote.

Who endorses lying prophets? Where is the prophecy that has the remotest bearing on the legitimate latitude of proper, not forced construction and comprehension, in the old testament on the new?

All the inspirations coming from God, a perfect being, must be perfect, have no possible antagonism with himself, truth, reason, and philosophical science, else they are the false pretences of false prophets and priests, of a peculiar god. What confessional of inspiration can be carried out? That is an impossibility. Every prophecy is a direct antagonism with God.

How many pretended prophets, as Isaiah, have the priests tortured, to elicit the prophetic signs about Christ; but all in vain, say honest, common sense, and the Jews, who, above all people, ought to understand their own peculiar doctrines.

They would feel bound to yield to supposed facts of their bible, as they are peculiarly interested. Now, instead of prophecy, it is all priestocracy, imposition and pretence, of the present day.

The vassal sides with the priestocracy, and is enraged against their vileness when his eyes are opened.

There is no prophecy to the point, and all the times are ambiguous. What guess-work. The christians build up their sect, and swear to it, as authorized by the old bible. The Mahometans build up their sect, and avow it from both, and from Mahomet. The Mormons erect their latter-day-faith, and prove that all are equal. They all fight, not like men, civilized, but barbarians, like degraded sectarians. Get out of the world, if ye cannot unite on one eternal principle of brotherhood, and one eternal standard, that of Almighty God, of the universe. You do not act like men. 'Religion makes men.

All inspirations and revelations, and all peculiarity, disclosed under that category, are necessarily most exact communications, and most accurate science tested on all the principles of philosophy, or they are the most outragous fraud and false pretences, whether poetry or history, there can be no license, as all must be true inspiration, or for ever to be discarded.

Church-men have said before us that they conceived all the bible inspiration to direct erring man. If the bible be taken as inspiration, none of its contents can be excluded.

It is very evident that such pretended inspiration, presents the worst antagonism with truth, justice, mind, and the God of mind.

The best revelation of God to mind, is by his works of the universe. No book revelation can compare with this.

Peculiar revelation makes known to us a peculiar god or gods. All book revelation does this, and destroys itself for ever. But you may affect to believe implicitly, the fathers of the church, as they are called. We have seen how one of the chief, Eusebius, was caught about Josephus, the historian, and now we may form good estimate of Irenæus, who says, "Miracles even from raising of the dead, down to the casting out of demons, were, in his time, frequently performed by Christians."

The word demons, must cast him out of the credence of any respectable mind. What can be worse than the legends of the fathers, except the bibles on which they are built? But the time for miracles is stopped. How do you know that? Because it never began!

Mind only knows, as mind enlightened by science and philosophy, reveals to it: all else is guess-work.

Physical causes prevent any reliance on man's position about miracles, granting that the bible was less suspicious than it is. Psychology explains much.

God's inspiration can only be to mind through his works, not by bibles, that present peculiar faith necessarily, which clashes with rational faith, a thing that betrays the error, as no two principles of God clash.

His works prove universal, not peculiar principles to any select few or nation, and therefore nullify the bibles of tradition. All that we can say of the phenomena of nature is, that however wonderful relatively to the state of science and mind, they are not miracles. But the world is not yet reformed by all the priestocracies' pretences about revelation.

It has to advance many more steps in mental elevation. Mind is God's, only of course best agent in general, for his revelation and inspiration.

God has no other, and does not make distinctions.

These were made by the oriental priestocracies.

The very action of mind proves that. Where, is even full and satisfactory proof of any, but mind-revelations? If God committed this peculiar power of miracles to individuals, then no peculiar proof will answer. It must be truth-proof. If miracles were ever performed, then the miracle testimony should be left not dependent on man's record, but God's record. God has left a fair and unmistakable record, which is his works of nature, but man's, is books.

God needs none but his works, as the main demonstration proves him to the confusion of all atheists or polytheists, that pretend to advance miracles, prophecies, mysteries and peculiarities, and decides by its paramount importance, the whole question for ever.

What are all miracles and prophecies but positive falsehoods from the very nature of things?

All miracles and peculiarities reveal superstition, not religion. No miracles are expedient, for God's works eminently prove his authorship, attributes, and conservative principles. All natural phenomena are universal, and cannot be appropriated by any peculiar sects, therefore, there can be no especial miracles.

All pretences to miracles, no matter what the occasion or the propagator, have in their very nature, the full proof of their falsity. Miracles are essential to all false systems, and take away the miracles which are necessarily false, and all the systems will topple.

Shame to the senseless propagators of all or any miracles, thereby teaching to mind no truth, reason, or God of the universe. As pretenders have not changed the nature of things, they must abide the analysis then, and the true miracles, that is, God's power, condemns them. No priestocracies' dramas can prove a miracle.

It is not rational that God would yield miracles to defeat his own exclusive empire, as these bibles of tradition involve themselves. Instead of one messiahship in the old, there were the priestocracy a whole. In the second or new, not only Christ, but all his priestocracy.

What are the miracles of the Romish church? Ridiculous falsehoods and pretences. Rational mind gives us the only, the best revelations of God. There can be no other. Peculiar faith gives us peculiar trifles. How accommodating it was. The prophecies would be nothing, if peculiar faith, urged on by peculiar interest, did not meet them. I Kings, c. xiii. v. 11, The "old prophet in Bethel" had to inquire, 12, "what way went he? (the man of God,) 14, and went after the man of God, and found him. 18, He said unto him, I am a prophet also as thou art; and an angel spake unto me by the word of the Lord—but he lied unto him. 19 v. So he (the man of God) went back with him," contrary to his orders, and did not know it! What prophets! These be they, O world, which are the truthful. The one a liar, the other ignorant! and the liar had prophecy after that! v. 20, "The word of the Lord came unto the prophet that brought him back." The first had healed the dried-up hand of Jeroboam. 33, "After this thing Jeroboam returned not from his evil way, but made again of the lowest of the people priests of the high places; whosoever would, he consecrated him." The highest were only of that class at best, could be no others. As bad as Israel, Judah was worse; c. xiv, v. 22, "Judah did evil in the sight of the Lord, above all that their fathers had done: 23, For they also built them high places and images and groves on every high hill, and under every green tree; 24, and there were also sodomites in the land. 25, The king of Egypt, Shishak, invaded Jerusalem successfully. 26, He took away the treasures of the house of the Lord, and all the treasures. 30, And there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all their days." Of course the priestocracy referred the corruption to the surrounding nations. And the speech of the prophet Ahijah to Jeroboam caused war between the people of Israel and Judah, and their several kings, for a long time. He excited him to revolt against his own king, Solomon, because the last subdivided the kingdom of the priestocracy; and another prophet, Shemaiah, promoted the success, in stopping Rehoboam from seeking his own. Thus these men of god made and unmade kings.

What a detestable degradation was the pretence of prophecy. See the bitter fruits of this barbarian sacrilege. And Baasha, the son of Ahijah, conspired against Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, and destroyed all the house of Jeroboam. And by bible acknowledgment, Baasha was as evil as Jeroboam.

Jehu the prophet proclaimed against Baasha and his house Elah, against whom conspired Zimri, who was successful. Were not the prophets fomenters of discord in the country?

Zimri destroyed the whole house, as the prophet spake. Then there was war between these two people of one family. Then Israel was divided into parts. One of the subsequent kings, Ahab, served Baal, and worshipped him.

False prophets, they were all false prophets.

Elijah was a humane prophet to tell Ahab that it should not rain for these years, but according to his word, as the Lord God of Israel liveth. Where were the people all this time, the innocent women and children, as well as men? Were they all to be sacrificed to the vanity of prophecy? Religion is an accompaniment and constituent of mind, as creation's birthright, uniformly and invariably from God, but peculiar faith is the mere contingency of peculiar education, varying with places, circumstances and people. The triumph of religion over superstition is the first law of God.

I Kings, ch. xvii. v. 1, Elijah said unto Ahab, "There shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word."

He was fed by ravens! He brought a dead child to life. These juggleries might be explained away, if the bible was not false. He slew hundreds of Baal's prophets, and those of the groves, I presume nearly a thousand in all; and here we see the crusades of the prophets, bad enough without involving the world. These prophets are strange beings—the priestocracy-jesuits. Strange to say, that he could not satisfy, but enraged Jezebel by so doing, and fled her wrath. What bitter animosities, persecutions and massacres prevailed among the prophets.

Ch. xix. v. 9, Elijah had to tell the Lord, who inquired of him "What doest thou here, Elijah?"—that is, the priestocracy involve themselves in their labyrinth—10 v. "and he said * * for the children of Israel have slain thy prophets with the sword, and I, even I only, am left"—and the poison worked both ways with the priestocracy, who were "very jealous for the Lord God of hosts." 16, Again the prophet is true to his functions, setting up other kings and another prophet.

He, Elijah, anointed Hazael to be king over Syria, Jehu king over Israel, and Elisha the prophet in his room. What a sprig of despotism. The unction of priestocracy was expedient for despotism; both are one and the same, republicans.

Though Ahab was evil, yet he whipped the Syrians twice dreadfully, but, ever true to their vocation, the prophets had a hand in it; and yet their bible only speaks of "the servants of the king of Syria," who were their pagan priests, advising about success untruthfully. Their casuistry is ever ready to make themselves the conspicuous actors. They were complete masters of the kings, as they write it. The whole key to this bible is, that it was written for the despotism of the priestocracy. Elijah humbled Ahab. C. xxii. v. 20, "And the Lord said, who shall persuade Ahab—21, and there came forth a spirit; 22, and the Lord said—and he said—and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he (the Lord) said, thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also: go forth, and do so. 23, Now, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets." This was what Micaiah the prophet said in part. The hand of the prophet was in the third battle, when Ahab was slain. When a person was saved, and no damage done after the false prophecy, it was because of repentance. What do priests differ in? They all lie outrageously. We may ask triumphantly in detail, as in all, what proof is given that "Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven"? Who saw all this? The bible speaks of witnesses: but who endorses these? No one. It is false.

2 Kings, c. iii. v. 14, Elisha said, "were it not that I regard the presence of Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, I would not look toward thee, (the king of Israel,) nor see thee." No wonder the popes put themselves over kings. What a mighty influence they wielded, the victory enured to their acts as coming from the Lord. What kept the priestocracy down, even as much as it was?

Because they were mortals, and committed themselves as mortals. Elisha had to inquire of the Shunamite what was the matter, as "the Lord hath hid it from me, and hath not told me." C. v. v. 15, And he (Naaman) said, now I know that there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel! and positively no such god elsewhere; hence mind cannot know him. Elisha made Gehazi a leper, as white as snow, from Naaman's leprosy. The prophets ought to have repelled the invasion of enemies, have civilized the world, possessed of such potent power. But this petty capital of theirs was of a different calibre altogether, existent in the atmosphere of bibles. How this false pretence defeats itself.

The juggle of the peculiar god who only lived in Israel, is a far different thing from the unappreciable dignity of the God of the universe. The priestocracy of course is correspondent. They only let this peculiar god, this Juggernaut, speak as they spoke. Thousands and thousands of men were engaged in this legend. Will the world ever thoroughly analyze this curious dynasty? Gehazi saw his master lie, and what else could he do but lie? That was his trade. But this is an episode, to give the boldest relief to the position of Elisha. How curiously this net-work is woven! Are you preparing for the ministry? You must be a sophist, positively. C. vi, 6, And the man of God said, where fell it? And he showed him the place; and he cut a stick, and cast it in thither; and the iron did swim.

This is only a small slip. Where is the necessity for the man of God to inquire? The writer only outdid himself; he was asleep when he wrote that small circumstance. C. ix, True to his vocation, Elisha had another prophet to have Jehu anointed king of Israel, to avenge on Ahab's house the blood of the prophets at the hands of Jezebel. It was dangerous for kings to resist prophets, who were not sophists for nothing. 14 v. So Jehu, the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi, conspired against Joram, for the whoredoms and witchcrafts of Jezebel; c. x, v. 16, and he (Jehu) said, see my zeal for the Lord. 17, He slew all that remained unto Ahab in Samaria, till he had destroyed him, according to the saying of the Lord, which he spake to Elijah. He caused seventy of Ahab's children to be beheaded, and excused the assassination by the prophecy of Elijah, "for the Lord hath done that which he spake by his servant Elijah." What a dangerous and ferocious union of church and state! Wo to the man that lifted up his countenance against the priestocracy. Is the world asleep? Is it so detestably corrupt as to be the perpetual tool of such ignoble myrmidons? Is the history of the Jews aught but one revolting and disgusting scene of conspiracy, through the priestocracy, against the rights of the people?

This same sneaking and cowardly Elijah, who could not face the living Jezebel, caused his tool Elisha to promote his tail to perpetrate the most vindictive revenge upon her descendants; and the excuse, ever sovereign, was, thus saith Israel's God! Jehu carried out the creature. He destroyed all the priests of Baal, between whom and the other priests there was war, and to prove it conclusively, he followed after the golden calves of Jeroboam in Bethel and Dan, preferring them to any other. Of course, miserably corrupt were the whole, without exception. Now, if these were true prophets, they had no function to select pure kings. C. x, v. 32, The old excuse is assigned, as "Hazael smote them (the people) in all the coasts of Israel," that "The Lord began to cut Israel short." Ch. xi, v. 9, Jehoida the priest commanded, v. 12, and they made him (the king's son) king, and anointed him, and they clapped their hands, and said,

"God save the king." Jehoida, the priest, had the Jew usurper killed, and destroyed all Baal's house, &c., by the Lord's people—that is, the priestocracy's people, full proof that the Jews belonged to the priests. Jehoash was the priest-advised king. Let the pretended prophets hide themselves behind mysteries; let them tell their own curious tale, mix the probable with the improbable and the miracle, and the system is complete for verdant people, to enjoy the peculiar God of the Jews and all such machinery, all the Elijahs to sustain him, but then they horribly neglect the God of the universe, who needs no more than that which is enough to prove himself. This pure Being does not change. He is immutable. He does to-day, what he did alway at first. He is perfectly immutable. If he be not, if he ever offered miracles, he is obliged to give them now, to be consistent. But this perfect Being acts the very reverse to miracles, to prove his exalted character.

Did not the kings retain prophets in their cabinet of councillors? They appear to have acted as the dictators, the secretaries of state. There should be perpetual mementoes of miracles to be for every generation surely, as all generations were the beneficiaries, and had the absolute right to demand these miracles. After all the tinkering and botching of the world's priestocracy, they had not the sagacity to see, or the honesty of truth to acknowledge, that it was mind through which God of mind has maintained his conservative action through the universe.

But how came the priestocracy not to make more miracles, and better, at least less liable to detection and exposure, as they had the universe to draw on? They never could have originated them at all at first had science been exact, and mind honest. It proves conclusively that mind and science were in a miserable fix at the first stages of existence, by perversions that took all advantages of that ignorance, and that none on God's earth have ever been baser than the priestocracy. None can be worse.

That sophisticated state now prevails over much of the world; and instead of honest patriots seeking to put it down, most are actually nurturing it!

Let any gypsey be brought forward, and now crowds flock in some places to see her prodigies. False pretences are advanced, and the wonder-loving, sight-seeing, superstitious people feed and fatten their own fictions.

Only to think of a pig drawing crowds of people to hear their fortunes told in 1850. The pig separated its master's tales, separated even married people, and was sacrificed to their fury. What should have been done with the master, the most guilty wretch? But is nobody else amenable to censure? Who are the aiders and abettors, that give comfort and aid to all this stupid senselessness, this bullion of imposition?

What senseless fury of the people, and what nonsensical faith or credulity! There are no limits to foolish faith. The people should at least analyze all that pertains to this point, and know that if they did not furnish the vitality that all such humbugs would necessarily die of themselves. What malignancy attends prophecy. What a spirit it engenders among the wise-acres.—I told you so.

What was that of Ishmael, with "his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him." That is a caricature of human nature, and the basest libel of its author, God. To this day the Arab is libeled under this prophecy and peculiar-hating faith.

There is nothing in the prophecies, that we can see, beyond what may be expected from those savage times. What horrid sin of the prophets? One superstition is put for another superstition, one pagan idolatry is substituted for another. As to the prophecies, if there had been any, it was too easy to establish by them most conclusively.

The truth was not spoken by the priestocracy, who lie always.

All the bible dramas among the people are jesuitical throughout. What do you want with prophecy? Can anything make mankind more miserable and corrupt? The government of universal providence repels the idea.

Does God create misery or evil? The priestocracy does that too much already, with its calibre for ruin.

But you wish by all means to cultivate the wonderful. It is you that make miracles, that is, wonder at what are merely common phenomena on the solution of science on adequate analysis.

The most that can be said in favor of prophecy is, that it is the clairvoyance of somnambulism, a diseased state of mind. How far can that go? Is that in reality, after all said, anything?

It is asserted of some, that they could tell important events then transpiring at distant places. But could they foretell the future, the deeds of other spheres? That looks impossible. We have no authentic accounts, and believe that much imposition of this character has been practised.

When we are told of heaven, it is the detail of men's dreamy thoughts, amounting to nothing after all.

The prophets assume because they speak by their writings.

The world has been ambitious of the marvellous, the miraculous, of prophecy. All wisdom can point out analogy, wise foresight, but not insight, as all pretence thereto is imposture. Be the advantage of ventriloquism, voice and hand jugglery, what they may, but mind-jugglery covers the whole ground of false pretences.

There is no effect without a cause, and though we cannot account for it, yet this principle is universal to God. Every ancient nation has had its gods. The system that describes some of them is a bible. To make them most impressive, legends of miracles, prophecies, and mysteries are common. Now, does it follow that such are right? How do you know that they are wrong? Try them by the only potential jury, mind and reason, and they can give this only righteous verdict against such. You deem them right, because your education has been peculiar, you have been taught to believe implicitly in them by a blind faith. Now, all the education and faith were false, the pretended miracles were false. You did not question the first position, that your duty to mind absolutely required. You sacrificed your mind's rights at the altar of the priestocracy of superstition. You have been wofully deceived, and that by mind and self-delusion.

The question of mind is paramount to all others, and should hold them in abeyance. How, then, can you resign yourself to such subtle and designing impostors as those who fabricated such unprincipled plans?

The question of mind and reason is not advanced as a rational one, but by sophistry, in defence of superstition. It has ever been so with the priestocracy. Are they more truthful now than previously, except so far as science compels them? Be not their blind victim, to be fleeced and derided by them and posterity.

You appreciate augurs and soothsayers; they are the priestocracy, all analogous. Magicians and astrologers of the world in the days of ignorance prevailed, as humbug is the creature of ignorance. When we cannot account for miracles, or any wondrous events in the universe, the difficulty of solution is in us, and it is not in existence as to the miracles which cannot possibly have a being in this creation. Miracle, prophecy, and mystery are the creatures of ignorance, that has a prolific brood of humbugs, let off in every age of the world to the present day. Of course, then, none such are of God. Who endorses the miracles. When people speak of a miracle, it is their direct admission of ignorance of nature's laws and phenomena. The science of all natural laws destroys all miracles, prophecies, and mysteries.

Miracle is a thing to be wondered at, that cannot be defined as to its nature and character, though a natural phenomenon that exceeds the knowledge of science in the philosophy of the miracle-maker. It is the ignorance of the audience that makes the miracle, not the man pretending to operate.

Revealed religion! who revealed it but mind?

What is more, is false pretences. Where, now, are your prophecies? This is a test question. A great attempt has been made about God's mysteries. All that are priests' mysteries do not enlighten the world. The world is none the wiser whether they be God's or not, by all the bibles of tradition, nay, farther removed from them. As to prophecy, all that is practicable is by the inspirations of mind through sound sense and philosophical science, can be thus only consummated. What does somnambulism add to the proof? Where mystery prevails, there the bible false pretences prevail. The world is after making something by abuse of man.

There are even now the omens of birds, from which auguries are drawn! Of what avail is the mind without rational education? The mind that has instilled into it superstition, can rarely eradicate the evil of peculiar faith or credulity in such things. The idea of ghosts, not the ghost, haunts the mind of the credulous vulgar. The world, in the folds of peculiar faith, speaks of miracles, and there never was one; even the great creation of the universe, and the mighty creation of mind, if you are sincere in miracles, must be only a paramount problem; and this has proved the authenticity of the Creator's bible, whose volumes are its mighty solar systems, that your soul has to read to appreciate the divine author, and realize the divine presence, the Holy Centre.

It is clear that mind is supreme of creation, and therefore must be the particular centre of due honor that can never be paid short of immortality.

Rational mind needs no prophecy of man's black letter peculiar bible, when the most illustrious document is in bold relief most patent.

The only seeming prophecy is entrusted to the function of time, the measure of motion of each orb.

When the immortal soul has read through in eternity, then the universe-problem will be solved.

It is impious to ask of man miracles and prophecies, when the problem is elsewhere in proper course of solution. Were the pretenders crazy, or those that believe them prophets?

Prophecies and miracles should not close at all, but should continue, as they are as necessary now as ever, for the influence is to be on mind that cannot take cognizance thereof unless submitted to all the proper tests of the senses. That is the nature of honorable testimony, of truth and honesty. The priestocracy pretend to the assertion, and they first originated the whole legends. Was it because they had no legitimate offspring of religion, that they were reckless of the effects of their falsehoods on posterity? It was their profession, that was enough.

Of what use are the pretended prophecies, their bible and patriarchs as they were called; all that, when none can be or are proved? Why this best of proofs omitted? Who endorses all such? The affiliated. What the interested sophists? Can a sworn sophist tell the truth? That would be a miracle indeed. This bible will not stand the test of morals much less of religion. What was Noah's prophecy against Canaan for? Surely he never made such but by subsequent operators. Much stress is laid upon the position of Canaan, and enough to have fragments of hostility thereby in the human family.

Now if I understand his story rightly, as far as presented, the children of Shem were in the worst bondage to Ham's descendants in Egypt, for four hundred years, if we allow that statement of the bible, which clearly proves prophecy futile; and when it states, too, the same people were in subjection to the Canaanites for years.

Could morals be worse, than credulity in such a book-curse to the world? The writers were the most pitiful pettifoggers in the drama of human events, and confined their bigoted contraction to their little circle, not even of facts, but of their miserable fiction. In the so miscalled universal empires, those of Shem and Japheth, the pretended bible first stock, after its deluge, alternately were the subjects, and are yet, so far as that implies. Now what has been worse than the vassalage of the Jews, for centuries since then? That was a theme for a statesman. I do not believe that any such tradition is correct, any more the prophecy, all one, and the same. The bible ancient lineage is as false as the balance pretended. It bears the ear-marks of the priestocracy, and in no part of the world, and in no age, did they ever rise to the dignity of men, but sunk far below the rights of mind, ever. What, then, is all biblical prophecy worth? Before we can be assured of the first prophecy of Noah. that reflects on the justice of God for punishing Canaan for his father, Ham, who had other sons, we should have it proved that the whole earth was known to the writers at that day, which is clearly disproved by their making it a plane, instead of a globe. It is even improbable, since a great portion of it has been long since their time discovered to the moderns, the discovery of which enabled them to pronounce its rotundity. Was there ever such a man as Noah? What mortals can endorse it?

Now what sort of justice was there in condemning a race of people to perpetual servitude, on account of a drunkard's nakedness being seen by his son?

Did the God of the universe have any hand in that? Is this inspiration? Was vision itself so unpardonable? Was it any personal action done to Noah? Had it been a parricide, the curse could not have been greater.

Is this bible-morals; certainly not religion?

It seems that one of its patriarchs, Noah, got so drunk that he stripped off his clothes and exposed his nakedness to his sons, and not content with all that, he cursed about, and worse than all, like a stupid beast, he cursed his innocent grandson!

How could Noah be a just man and perfect in his generation, walking with God, if he cursed the Canaanites in his drunkenness? But he did it from divine impulse! That adds impiety to blasphemy. It brings down the character of God to degraded man, and causes him to perpetrate an irrational deed.

The nearest version is, that because fanatics sought Canaan's land, the last were pronounced accursed to justify land piracy, murder by the wholesale, and all the accursed abominations of barbarism.

Is this the loveliest attitude of prophecy, that brutalizes man, and libels his maker? When one superstition was only to be superseded by another, a prolific crop of paganism to the remotest times. What was in such? There is no excuse, much less justification, because the priestocracy fabricated this impious felony.

True is such prophecy? Man of mind, republican, can you be so far lost to your rights to believe such?

Having disposed of one of the patriarchs, let us try another. What can be more untrue than the prophecy of Abraham, a prophet as called by the bible, respecting the Israelites, Gen. xiii., 14, and the Lord said unto Abraham, ch. xiii., v. 15., "For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever."

But, say the affiliated, this Abramic prophecy was subsequently modified. Agreed, says liberal monotheism, to all the legitimate extent, and then all modifications are still stronger against it, the afterthoughts of the priestocracy.

What shall be said of Moses, the dictator of the priestocracy? His prophecy is not proved though: Deu. xxxiv. 10, "There arose not a prophet since in Israel, like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face." We will try him by Joshua, his prime minister, who assuredly will do him justice: Josh. ch. xiv., v. 9, "And Moses sware on that day, saying, surely the land whereon thy feet have trodden, shall be thine inheritance, and thy children's forever, because thou hast wholly followed the Lord my God." Was Moses the world-maker, or the Creator?

What can be not only falser than all the preceding affected prophecies, but more abominable blasphemies?

Where the Turk rules, is that the undisputed possession of the land of Canaan forever, by the Jews?

These prophecies were the purest and most unadulterated of any; why not fulfilled? Because it was utterly impossible for God to have ever made any such. No—never.

The God of the universe is not like man's creation's gods. What can be more untrue than all this? The pretended prophecies of Noah are equally futile. Who can endorse a universal deluge of this globe, in the face of impossibilities? None of these pretences can be modified without blasphemy, as the God of the universe is the God of foresight. Any other category makes him a god of afterthought, peculiar and imbecile, clearly a priestocracy's work.

Those who prophecy of the final restoration of the Jews are Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, &c. How comes the prophecy already quoted of the grand patriarch Abraham not fulfilled? That cuts all these subsequent prophets down at one blow, from which all Jewry and its bibles cannot recover. That is all of a piece in the whole humbug.

What could have been of greater value than the lost tribes? Why were they not recovered and united to the nation? Does pretended prophecy represent any elevated character, of policy or statesmanship or world government? It seems that the last is supreme over it. It did not begin to render them or mankind susceptible of mental improvement, but debased it. When we duly estimate the false pretences, the balance is immeasurably against all such.

They all necessarily present falsehoods. The books of Moses from Genesis to Deuteronomy, contain several remarkable interpolations, the last of which proves particularly them written very many centuries after Moses is said to have died. Deuter. chap. xxxiv., v. 10.—"And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face."

This would not have been written in justice to truth till after all the prophets so called lived with whom the comparison is made. If written after all, they are forgeries, if before, they are false. What profit then, can they be to the world to whom even prophecy is a wholesale forgery and falsehood?

No matter by whom written, the books are anonymous, and unworthy of credit as vitiated by interpolations if not by legends originally.

That is too plain to miss, after what we have seen of Moses.

As to prophecies we see the oracles of the heathens claim them, the Philistines, Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Balaam, and even his ass.

The pretension to divination was a profession among the ancients. Now as to the prophecies of Moses about the Jews, all that had transpired up to the time of writing the last word in Deuteronomy must be embraced. Of course the story presented is like all priestocracy's work, after-thoughts. Can enlightened minds of the present day be entrapped by such scurvy tricks? They would laugh at the Roman, Greek or Egyptian mummeries of augury and soothsaying, yet can take in all that of the Jews, that of course is worse, by being knavishly fixed up.

Do not the moderns need the policy of prophecy which would be immutable, if the God of the universe had instituted it?

That such should become extinct proves a change only in character, with the Jew peculiar God.

It is worse than children's play, to talk about prophecies. In what a miserable dilemma and transgression does the admission place the moderns, who not only stultify their own exalted minds in taking and endorsing these false pretences of the priestocracy, but blaspheme their God?

What are the credentials of divine mission? Miracles. What honorable proof has the world of them? None, but false pretences.

Do they establish anything then, trustworthy?

All the miracles in the world as assumed, cannot repel for a moment any sectarianism ancient or modern, Christ's or Smith's; that invalidates and vitiates all titles claimed. All sectarianism thus declared is antagonistic to God's unity, that must not be violated, else creation is violated in its preservation. So of course prophecies are perfectly worthless, a dead letter, analogous to all its bibles.

I need not particularize how defective all this is about Christ, till I reach that particular; or of the false positions of a Paul, who reminds us of the astrologer who knew all about the distant stars, yet proved his utter ignorance by falling into a near pit.

What can be falser than John's revelation?

John that proclaimed to the seven churches of Asia, proclaimed the absurdities about the bible's heaven, which destroy the false pretences about Christ's greatest miracles. Thus they perpetrate murder on others, and suicide on themselves.

John only told too much, and in making a peculiar heaven for the peculiar gods, he put the last blow of destruction, and toppled it all over.

Are the prophecies of Daniel understood by the best minds? If they are, why do they differ so essentially? Those prophecies cannot be interpreted alike, by the moderns. Of what use are they to the world, that looks at truth and not oracles, that are all analogous from those of the pythoness to those of this monomaniac?

The genius of best minds is rendered impracticable in his quagmire about the accounting for the kingdoms, at the miserable guess-work, at the blasphemy of this trash, for Asia as well as Europe. Thus it is the most ludicrous, the most ridiculous position of the amateurs, that they now require a prophet, to unravel the prophecies of the past! These be thy gods, ye idol-worshippers. How could this prophecy be true, when "The fourth beast shall be fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces." Where was there a universal empire?

What can be falser than this, if the fourth empire, that is assumed to be universal, is assumed to be that of Rome the ancient? Her power, as imperial as it was, did not extend east beyond Babylon. How could it be a universal empire, to leave out a majority of the world's population, and one of two continents? The limits of that empire were fixed by Hadrian on the western side of the Euphrates, or on the very borders of Chaldea. How can this last part be true? Where was China, with her one-third of the world's population; India, with her eighth; Australia—when America was not even known? When was Arabia wholly subdued, that the bible defenders evince was subject to no empire?

Is this prophecy against prophecy, and that in the same bible, the modern Daniel against the ancient patriarch Abraham? But worse than that, there is a fatal collision between the last and Christ; for if Ishmael "will be a wild man, his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him," how will Christ have "the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession?" "To whom every knee should bow," and becoming united, they should "love the brethren." This kingdom of Rome was equalled, if not excelled by that of the Saracens, after it.

Consistency is a jewel, that such bibles cannot attain. The Millerites, who have had awful and fatal panics, in several of their corps, given to some of the timid, to causing their deaths, can now well appreciate the impracticable prophecies, and find the difficulty on the other side of the proposition; for assuredly, if they never reach their ultimate place of rest till the decyphering takes place, they will have to look on the other side of eternity.

The bible speaks of false prophets, as if all were not so that pretended to prophecy. If they are not so, the fault does not lie with them, but those that affect to think otherwise.

What else but the lying sort can prophets be; so far from knowing prophecy, they do not come up to the facts of creation, or of truth.

There are no prophecies but are all matters of a piece with the vitiated books of Moses.

There is nothing certain in the peculiar faith bibles, not even their heaven, whose very God changed and repented. All the conception of the priestocracy reflected, as a mirror, the utter insignificance of their peculiar faiths and bibles. Had not the Creator impressed on mind all the elements of its duties, all that man could do would be totally inefficient.

Peculiar faith and prophecies present a sad view of the earth's history. To estimate the earth's desolation, we have only to notice their ancient conflicts. Martial piracy was much identified with their persecution. Vandalism prevails throughout these scenes of violence. The priestocracy were universally after power, and all that could procure it. It is ever in this light that we must study them. When it is said that Genseric, the king of the Vandals, the most bigoted, persecuted the orthodox Christians, it was of a character in his overrunning and plundering Rome. The world presents an analogous condition of peculiar faiths suffering in turn from each other, unrestrained by the enlightened benefits of mental toleration.

Rational religionists desire to exclude the vandalism of all such faith, now too abundantly despotic.

Let not bible interpreters pretend to solve prophecies by any bible legends. They should attend to a better theme. Who does not recollect the savage Portius Cato's famous "Carthage must be destroyed."

When ready to become subjects, the citizens were excluded from the city, that it might be destroyed. The savage Romans burnt this city of seven hundred thousand people, razing it to its foundations. Even the Roman general wept over its ruins.

It is faithful history that embraces science and philosophy; that presents the right causes and effects—not oracle prophecies, a thing of no existence—that rational mind needs.

What do the Jew oracles say of the destruction of this, one of the most splendid cities of the world? This was a remarkable event in the world's history and time's annals, in which the pure priestocracy could have dilated for a world's benefit. But Jew, as well as Canaanite hands, were reeking with human sacrifices.

Did we see Jews coming forward to civilize the balance of mankind, in the arrest of such things, when other nations established it as a compact, and proved themselves longways ahead of Jewry in civilization?

What! the Jews not helping to humanize the world, when they boasted of having a peculiar God, that did all peculiarly for Jewry?

No; they sunk into the lowest barbarism themselves, by the effects of this very prophecy, and devoted their own proud city, Jerusalem, to be sacked by Titus, and sacrificed on the bloody altar of this same prophecy more than a million of their own fellow-citizens, immolated by the delusion of an oracle of their degraded priestocracy. What was prophecy and all the accompaniment for, but the best civilization of the world?

Has such mission ever been thus proved?

Not an iota, for the reverse has been established, in the fearful annals of humanity.

A mighty inspiration was that which left out of sight of the world, some of its best portions, one of its two continents! That ignored the form even of the globe, the philosophy of its position, the reasons, &c. Ah, but these things did not concern the Jews. Come Jew, christian, prophets should tell us, then, where were the lost ten tribes! This was a question of importance, for the proof of prophecy. Has it been answered? Better was it not expedient to have that loss prevented? If the Jews were selected for the world's benefit, assuredly all world questions are essential.

The only best way for the world prophets and all, to do best and right, is to act on principles of truth and independence. Has it been done? Very far from it.

God has not superseded mind by prophecies that require prophecies to interpret them, nor inspiration that requires science to correct and rectify it. God deals in the facts of creation, man deals in the fictions of fictions. God certainly would have protected his chosen peculiar people more particularly than he did, as they were overrun and captured by so many different nations. They were, of course, vindictive towards their captors, and painted them in their worst colors. If his power was peculiarly manifested about such things, protection was best.

Why was pretended prophecy so much behind the wants of the world, as not to have America preached to? All this, kills the doctrine of peculiar faith completely. Where were the cities of Central America so long depopulated, that their desolation could not have been prophecied about? Surely the Gospel should have preceded science in the discovery, if faith be superior to mind and reason, and the magnificent enjoyment awarded the Jews as something worth while. Prophecy should have been for the world.

Why did she not enlighten all Asia, as China? Why not prophecy to all? What desolation has come to the country of her protection? Such should not be desolation, but the noblest triumph of intellectual and moral greatness of all nations that we would expect to see realized. And has it come to this, that the potency of peculiar faith has ruined, instead of elevated the Jewish character? Yes, this is the proof, that the Jewish mind has been debased by its peculiar faith, Judaism. What a reflection of self-congratulation, for comprehensive rational religion! The world has to come to this decision, the sooner the better, that any peculiar faith is a despotism instead of mind's blessing.

If the pentateuch had been written after the Jewish captivity, then it was easy to describe the Chaldeans and Babylonians, that had birds' wings on their beasts. As to the straits and reductions of famine, they were not uncommon in those days of barbarity that was exercised to the conquered.

The height of agricultural cultivation was not so elevated as to preclude it, nor was commerce so extensive as to prevent it.

They were to be carried into Egypt and sold for slaves. What, a second time? What then becomes of Canaan's curse? Here is prophecy against prophecy again and again. Where is, then, Abram's perpetual possession of land? Sandys says, as to "The Holy Land, here be also some Jews; yet inherit they no part of the land, but in their own country do live as aliens."

But the Jews are a peculiar people—so are the gypsies, neither is a nation, but its remnant. What could we expect of the ancient cities that have decayed? We must analyze the facts of nature. They were dependent on commerce, that has changed abundantly in our days, and left nations most known for others, that have just entered into notice. America, then unknown, has the greatest commercial marine on the globe. What can be worse to the world of mind, than the errors, the vices, the crimes, of any pretended revelation? Its gain will furnish no profit. Says the thinking priest, I cannot reconcile the justice of predestination of the accursed part, destiny, with that of the saved. That proves itself all of man's folly, through the pretence of revelation.

The bible advocates skulk the question; so far from prophecies, they have not even science.

It is shameful that the world should be so meanly imposed upon by the base. The greatest was no miracle, nor is it right to call it so, and that must supersede all others, that is, the universe that was established and can be read in universal language, by men who might speak millions of different languages, and is forever to prove its illustrious Author, the test of its creator.

As to any miracles, they are spurious, all false pretences. Moses' miracles cannot exist, because they would violate and displace God's immutable laws of nature. God has recorded in the self same act all that mind could think of calling miracles.

I have selected the greatest principal prophets, and all have seen them prostrated by their own pretences.

Let us analyze all their positions, that if proved would be testimony. God, of course, is the essential witness. Does he affirm any such as the interpretations of Nebuchadnezzar's dream? Not a word of it. All this looks very clever if Daniel produced the proof. But what impious false pretence! We have that proof.

It is not prophecy, but rationality of mind that God deals in. The word of God was ratified in the sublime universal language of the creation, that people of all tongues, however diverse, can and do construe alike. Down, impious blasphemers, after this. Miracles by God will be miracles, if intended, no matter how long past. Had a miracle been ever performed by an apostle it had been enough to convert the whole.—This is all overlooked, as disproving all such pretences. When things ought to succeed, of course "God hardens their hearts," to defeat the very purpose.

Does the world believe in popish miracles? No. Yet, have not many books for such false pretences been multiplied and attested in past ages? Why are not they entitled to faith, as any bibles of faith? If Jesus had done a tenth of the miracles ascribed to him, he ought to have convinced the whole world. It would have flocked to him most certainly, particularly the Jew portion, as having such before its eyes.

What good did Christ's or others' miracles if they were not conclusive for final and complete success. The tale of his miracles kills itself. He performed miracles plentifully, yet they did not convince the Jews, who were to receive all the whole benefits. Of course such miracles were most abominably false.

What was this Messiah for? To do this very thing? Then if he did not do it his mission was an imposition, fraud, base false pretence. Out of their own statements the whole are condemned.

Miracles and prophecies interfere with God's arrangement of free agency of mind. Speak of prophecies, do they not need another series to explain the past? Commentators the most learned fail, as they differ much about revelations, not being able to agree among themselves about Paul, much less Daniel. Is not the whole world, Jew and Gentile, contending about such stuff? There are various interpretations given by several, varying with nearly every writer! Has not the world been tortured enough without keeping up this bible delusion to all time. It is not the prophecy, bible, or faith, that are all false, it is religion we need. Were not the Jews the chosen, pet people of God, the peculiar God? Of what benefit were the prophecies if the peculiar chosen people of God could not obtain, through them, the real benefit of the second dispensation? If mind be at fault about the prophecies, the prophecies are at fault. Of course the Jews have proved again and again their readiness to adopt all the blessings of such a dispensation, having adopted several messiahs to the death by tens of thousands of their people. The question well arises, was the first messiah ever announced, but by fiction? It seems too clear for refutation, even contradiction, after the manifestation of the spirit by the Jews, who were ever ready to do justice to their peculiar faith.

Of course, prophecies have proved a curse to God's own chosen people! What a senseless absurdity! The bible is so insidiously written as to split both sides of human events, by oracles that evince this double dealing. At first, with Abraham, the prophecy is, that the land of Canaan should be his and posterity's forever; in other instances, as time rolled on, time proved the necessity for reservations, and reservations were made. Covenants on covenants, new systems of faith are originated. The interpretation is left with the designing priestocracy. It is time that the world acted, as it has to act, in self-defence; it should put a correct end to all such false pretences.

God's magnificent attributes can be better manifested through the works of the universe than by pretended prophecies, that seem to stand therefor with the ignorant ancients, who had not mind-science enough to originate such an idea. The moderns ought not to seek to be sillier.

The expounders of the prophecies affect that we should wait on the fulfilment of the prophecies, that is, on the functions of time. That is, that an exposition of their failure must be overlooked.

All this belongs to time's functions, and was only abstracted therefrom by man's silly pretences.

Take up all the prophecy expositors, and what do they prove? Only that this subject is still mystified, and they cannot unravel it.

Time is not only usurped and monopolized, but lost by all this chicanery, in all such bibles.

What are considered prophecies are no prophecies at all. All expositors differ, and all agree only in this, that they know nothing about it. Even the greatest minds have been lost in the labyrinth of priestocracy, and its quagmire of sophistry.

What is very remarkable, the expositors, the affiliated, had to prophecy themselves, to help the book-prophets out; that has been overlooked prodigiously. To the overthrow of mind, they inquire exultingly, can the Ishmaelites ever be reclaimed from their wildness? I ask, has fraternizing ever been adopted? Have these people been properly educated at the best institutions of science of mind, in its noblest faculties of proper training? Some have proved themselves scholars.

Let not religion be sacrificed on the altar of prophecy. The ancients issued oracles; the moderns swear to them!

The ignorance of the ancients made miracles.

Miracles are the fictions of ignorance and superstition. The prophecies are obscure oracles.

Superstition was an accompaniment inseparable from the government of the ancients. Which of the moderns is exempt? It is true that a legal separation of church and state has been established in this Republic, but is there a genuine freedom from the undercurrents of superstition? See how easy the Mormon proselytes have been gulled?

Are prophecy and miracle for mind, as is pretended? Then they should be universal as mind. They cannot be, and there is an end to all such false pretences. If these facts are worthy of a free and sovereign people, let them circulate, and be honorably, honestly, and truthfully avowed and discussed.

Prophecies and priestocracies are ineffectual when science, teachers of mind, legislation founded on wisdom, and all the rational world-wide funds, are to instruct and enlighten. Prophets and priests, preachers and ministers might talk till doomsday if the minds of the people were enlightened; of what benefit can all such be to the world, but to mislead it on false pretences?

Facts triumph over interpretations of prophecies.

What was the object of miracles, but to correctly influence all mankind. We must so infer if they emanated from God. The Joshua miracle was enough to have Judaized the whole world at once. If you are interested in truth, analysis of the whole bible proves that so far from the Jews influencing the world, that they have been dispersed throughout it by the curse of their peculiar faith, in the very face of their pretended prophecies, that they should possess the land spoken of forever? Of what use were miracles? Can all such preserve the world's morals by falsehoods! Are the priestocracy so stupid as not to see that? The same efforts of miracles done for the whole world, as related in the bible of Judaism, would have been effectual if they were proper ones. God comprehends all by the fewest means at the same time.

The prophecies that established land piracies were libelously called the word of God, invented by the priestocracy to gull and deceive the people.

When was the prophecy of Noah made? At the time specified? Who can believe that? Why cannot we believe it? Because Noah was only a man, and debauched at that, exposing his physical and mental weakness.

Most all the ancients made emigrations, and did not stickle at conquests. To get hold of the land of Canaan, the priestocracy give just such a pretext as the priestocracy alone could invent. God, they assume, gave the revelation, but did he give it with such blood, murder, and iniquity, and partial corrupt language, that died out before the Jew nation; only think of that! When he had already given it to the whole universe of mind, located in billions of orbs, in a language universal, eternal, chaste, and unmistakable, in the most magnificent tablets, without blot or blemish, let alone blood or conception of injustice, partiality to one set of people, much less one globe, which was one of the whole, without the necessity or use of a second edition, which his omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience precluded.

Are the priestocracy worthy to appear before the books, much less the author.

John proves in what absurd relations the prophets involve themselves:—"And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken by a mighty wind." Again, "and the heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together." Chap. vii: "And after these things, I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth." Chap. xx. 11: "And a new heaven and a new earth succeeded in the place of the first heaven and the first earth, which passed away at the general judgment." Haggai ii. 6, 21: I will shake the heavens and the earth." An earthquake to shake the heavens!

Before you settle subsequents, premise preliminaries; before you leave particulars, settle principles.

The interpretation of Daniel's prophecy and John's pretended revelation give the protestants a fine chance to worry the Romanists. If Romanism has grown of christianity, the whore of Babylon, what must christianity be?

What confidence did the Jews put in their prophets?

How did they treat Jeremiah? Like a tory!

How many thousands of the prophecies were missed, now unknown? If America were to buy a whole lottery, as she often does, she gets all the prizes,—the large ones are heard of, like good fruit; the blanks, like withered fruit, are lost to knowledge.

These prophecies, as published, keep up a peculiar malevolence of feeling at this day, analogous to despicable proscription. Would it not gratify protestants, if not in malignancy of feelings, at least to the height of vanity, at this day, to see the speedy downfall of the Latin if not of the Greek churches? They have good authority, modern prophets assume, for the decision against Rome. If this be true, then the Romans should yield. What becomes of the protestants who are their offspring? The Christians in a body would prefer the downfall of Mahomedans, who, with the Mormons and Jews, would pay the Christians back in full measure.

Is this a proper correct feeling? Is it religion? And yet these sects have it, as a habit naturally so. Prophecy is at fault no where worse than in the most essential particulars of mind's loveliness, innocence and purity, and yet you adopt the bible, because of the fulfilment of the prophecies. Will you prefer man's bible to God's word, prophecy to religion? You are not able to analyze them, else you would see their fruitlessness and clashing. What demoralization prophecies inculcate and generate!—Would not the prognostication pretended affect much of the world's happiness for man's vanity, much less of his envy and malice? Would not the Christian to day sacrifice much of the world, to attain Christianity for the world? How many fanatics would not still plunge the whole world into another miscalled holy war, to attain such an object? Would not many a Christian gloat, to see Mahometans perish? Why should a miracle be enacted to derange the proper universe, when the proper order seems all expedient and designed? Must this world be deranged, for a deranged set of metaphysicians and priestocracy? It is not by miracles but mind, that governs. All such are the false pretences of the priestocracy. The very thing of a miracle proves superstition, not religion at all. This is a universe of cause and effect, that puts down atheists and polytheists, as it bespeaks the unity and supremacy of one God exclusively, and has no miracles or prophecies, else the God of the universe did not exist. Miracles, prophecies and messiahs are in antagonism to God. The proper analysis of the question comprehends this position, otherwise we are incompetent to its appreciation. Even now there are pretended miracles wrought in the Roman church, but who believes them? Miracles are all the coin of the priestocracy, the basest counterfeits of the whole world. As I believe in God's perfection, I cannot believe in miracles that affect all that position. Many believe the scriptures because they consider as they have been told by interpretations made by the priestocracy, that the prophecies are fulfilled. All that is the trick, of the trade, of the speculation. As regards miracles and prophecies, we cannot take the opinions and statements of interested priestocracies, their inventors, when God's document proves the contrary, exhibited in the principles of causation, which if we disbelieve or overlook, we divest ourselves of the only tangible proof of the God of the universe. The priestocracy mislead us from the true point at issue, to their trifling trash.

A miracle never could have so important an end, and worthy of its author, as the principles of creation in the universe. If an author speaks of a miracle, as he calls it, being seen by millions of people, does his statement prove anything? Have we those millions of people present to substantiate his statement? Are we possessed by their or his statement, of the truth or the false pretence about them? Of course the last. Is the ignorant world competent to decide on miracles? The ancients were as ignorant as superstitious, and under such circumstances are not competent witnesses of truth. The whole of the bible writers were as much affiliated as any of the oracle-mongers of polytheism in the gross.

When any bible says that "God said, let there be light, and there was light," four days in advance of the organs of light, the whole foundation of the principles of causation are broken up, and the whole document of bibles is self-impeached. The whole world has not credit enough to establish one miracle, and need not make itself a blockhead on that score any longer. I say this in the presence of God and mankind, that the whole universe is God's witness. All that the pretended revealed faith knows, it is indebted to mind and the evidences of the universe. It then acts ungratefully, like a parricide. The whole world would have rushed to Judaism, had its essence been the pure characteristic, but connected to its priestocracy, miracles and prophecies pretended, its peculiar God, its creation was a fabulous monster. The performance of miracles, carries a lie on its face. We ask not for solution in magic, but in the false pretences of the priestocracy. People are busy about accounting for the magic. The mystery, the art of the mystery, rather than the fiction, the painting of the legend. People, sensible people, overlook this, until they commit themselves, and then sorrowful to relate, feel too mortified to correct their false position. The world-masters declare for faith that is united to the government, and the mass obey. A false color is given to the whole, in the pomp and gorgeous splendor of the various orders, and the world is captivated by specious appearances, and most of all, by supposed self-interest.

I have written as if things of this kind were presented. The people may spare themselves much endless and useless trouble, thought and time, about all this matter. But how govern the people? Not by false pretences, for that is not morals, much less religion. Govern them by the consistency of truth. But miracles prove no consistency, as their publicity was equivalent to imposition. But God gave the proof, the whole proof, and nothing but the proof, in his universe. No better, no more proof, was wanting. Will the people read? This last age will be the best as evincing progressing refined civilization, through the contined triumphs of mind. It is not rational to suppose on the principles of causation, that God would impeach his own attributes by having the pretensions of prophecies, miracles and messiahships to rule out his supremacy, when he had already created all on conservative principles, and of course ought to have had the appropriate reputation. We might as well suppose that God had need of millions of angels, to hold up his orbs, as to convey messages of prophecies or aid in miracles. We must make all due allowances for the ignorant state of mankind, the wants of the ancient times, the moral atmosphere tainted by despotism and superstition, that prevented the egress of sovereign mind. A visit to the East to-day, would teach us the usurpation of peculiar faith in all its disguises, modified by oriental despotism.

An ignorance of natural causes betrays itself clearly in the whole bible, from the conception to the close, the priestocracy stick out all the time, in the worst kind of blasphemy and imposition. It is all pious frauds, a stereotyped edition of falsehoods as old as superstition, only advanced as far as mind was competent to burst the darkness. We must speak of things as they are.

It is impossible, with the principles of causation, that God should select a peculiar people to do what they plainly could not and did not do for themselves, much less for the world. Judaism and Jew christianity, as all paganism, are failures. All the machinery of prophecies, miracles, dispensations and covenants, rites and ceremonies, make the monster "whose light has been taken away," still more a monster. If their priestocracy deceived them, let them, cursed as they are, no longer deceive themselves nor the world, that if intelligent cannot be deceived. If we find out all these falsehoods in the bible, about the prophets in their own book, what could we not do with the whole priestocracy, if we had them, with all the historical facts that were suppressed, in the most honorable court of conscience.

In that court, only, can the world obtain enlightened justice. They would sink, with all their brassy impudence, into eternal insignificance! Many useless tubs are thrown to the whale, the people, to engage their attention, from the main, primary matter, as by the priestocracy, with a thousand pretences and pretexts, from their bibles of tradition. How absurd, though, to commit themselves, on what cannot be defended. How came Ahab to consult the four hundred prophets, as they were called? Their prophecy was false, for Ahab king of Judah, and the king of Israel, were discomfited by the Syrian king. Did not the party antagonistic to these prophets write the tale? Where are now your prophets? All are killed dead by the light of popular intelligence. It is because rational mind writes that history now. Where is all the attendant advantage that prophecy should bring? Why was not the world elevated to mind's rank? Because prophecy was not rational popular education, but was built on supposed popular ignorance. What an awful tale true history would tell of the ancients, could she speak to-day. She has been suppressed. Before the pretended prophecies are trusted, as worth anything, we are to consult the natural character of things. What had the Jews to teach other nations of prophecies, when they were not beneficial to their own people, now so humiliated before the whole world? Is not this enough to teach even the most Jesuitical priestocracy to withhold, ere they seek to injure the world, by such false pretences? Tyre and other old cities are done for. Well, what can make cities, if the countries be kept worthless, by a miserable set of sectarian, superstitious nations? Have not all these countries been ruined again and again, by all the hordes of barbarian bigots and fanatics? Wars, pestilence, and famine? Have not the Christians and Mahommedans helped to do it?

What part of God's earth can stand all the protracted perversions of mind? Has not the commerce of the world changed, and are not the mighty oceans now the highway of nations, instead of mere inland seas? All the causes that are now operating locally and generally, the cause and effect, are not disclosed by the prophecy-mongers. Why could they not tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, from Genesis to Revelation? That would kill their book, their profession, and them. The interpretation of prophecy by the Jews and gentiles prove at once, in regard to Christ, that the prophecies were perfectly worthless.

The Jews had a notion of Christ being a mighty temporal prince, that they were to possess the empire of the world, and that Jerusalem was to be the seat. The Christians assume that he was spiritual. Now of what value was the prophecy? Who had the best right to know? The peculiar people, or those excluded?

The very name of prophet or messiah implies false pretences, an imposition. It is self-impeached, the moment of annunciation. The very idea of inspiration bespeaks false pretences. Mahommed is said to have prophecied that his people would take Constantinople, which was done. Then the result of this prophecy ought to prove his doctrine as correct as any other dependent on prophecy. Is it so very difficult to introduce prophecy of some kind, about future events! Prophecy of the world's affairs might now produce some truthful events. Prophecy begets a ferocious spirit of speculation, that has not true benevolence from vanity. The prophets knew no more the true character of the Jews then they did of prophecy. The bible advocates affect prophecies, as if they had an existence, when the very foundation declares a horrid evil that God does not create. The most benevolent institutions of God's withhold prophecy from the world, as one of the best states for it, without which free moral agency would be wanting in its best proportions—to combat with unseen dangers and vicissitudes of life.

The spirit of bible prophecy is a horrid fiendish spirit.

Has the whole history of all these subjects pretended to be prophecies been elucidated? Have deserted maritime cities, whose harbors may have been filled up or ruined by the action of the sea, had their whole history laid open? Has not a world's commerce sought other channels, and does not a world-wide commerce now adorn the mightiest oceans that the ancients dared not encounter? Of all the niggardly commentators of true history, the miserable priestocracy are the worst. They dwarf every thing from the bible of the universe and world, to their petty conceits. Fie upon it, be men: let alone the gold that you sell the world, your souls, your only religion for! Have these men gone into the solution of cause and effect, that they always absurdly overlook for an accursed pretence of non-entity, prophecy they call it, and told us that the whole land of the east assumed to be in the category of their prophecies, has been cursed by a series of peculiar faiths, the followers of which have been ferociously vindictive to each other, and lost true sight of that invaluable jewel-mind, that would make all lovely as a garden?

Where now are the miracles? covered up by the peculiar bible sophistry. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, till Shiloh come." Was this ever intelligible to mind? Talk of miracles. All such is folly, legends, false pretences, as the universe is one of cause and effect. All are the legitimate province of science, not of the assuming ignorant priestocracy, who assumed all such for monopoly and usurpation, that would be ridiculous if it were not a serious fraud on the world, a felonious imposition on the people, a degraded swindling of the soul's rights, a miserable superseding religion by the petty larceny of peculiar faith. The whole universe is in constant motion: time, the act of universal motion, and their conservative principles, are the prophets.

The world has been governed, and sought to be governed by superstition, but another name for all the peculiar bible-machinery. Those who are of it, do not like to talk of it. Alexander sought too late among the Greeks, who were too civilized to think him a god, but he commanded the aid of the sycophantic priestocracy, who, in Africa, hailed him as the son of Jupiter, and this was immense capital for future conquests. Napoleon tried the priestocracy, it is said, in Egypt, by becoming a Mussulman. But what did it avail? Cromwell cherished superstition in his camp, and aroused the enthusiasm of his men, who signally aided him in his victories; while these military chieftains were men of policy, Washington was a man of principles; the one lives in the affections of his country, the world, mankind; the others will shrink into insignificance by the just awards of monotheism.

When church-faith resorts to tricks of miracles to uphold it, it is tottering. Is not the whole from first to last such a resort? Principles all the time for an honest policy, the world. Inspiration of what? To make men deceivers. How dangerous is pretended prophecy, as the result agreeing with I told you so, conspires with the wish and effort to have it so!

What are the prophets of the Jews worth to strangers, when their own people and kings disregarded them, according to the best pretended prophet's showing. How came Moses to portray the rebellion of so many, but for that very cause? Was not Christ put to death by disbelievers? Was Isaiah treated with decent respect by his own king, to whom he affected to deliver a sign? Jeremiah's scroll was thrown into the fire by Jehoiakim, his king, who had imprisoned the same. Can Americans be fooled, when those present scouted the pretenders? All the old oracle-mongers built their faith on prophecy, without which they could not have arisen; and all the present priestocracy built up their power on this basis. What were the augurs, soothsayers? Will the moderns know that they are all complete masters of the ancients in all their superstitions, if they will just use their honest truthful senses? But the tory priestocracy tell them not to read the very book that God has written, and that his own word, cause and effect, positively declares. All that the most virtuous and honorable monotheism can do, is to appreciate it to the very best of its intellectual abilities.

The God of the universe declares himself as all rational minds can read, but all the priestocracy, to have their peculiar profits, pretend another view, with most crazy sophistry. This is the result about miracles: Judges ii. 10. "And there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord, nor yet the works which he had done for Israel." That required peculiar education—were the bibles lost, or not yet written? 11 v. "And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalim." Did they not do this eternally? 17, "And yet they would not hearken unto their judges." The people had none to depend on, priests, prophets or judges, who they knew had deceived them. Ch. iv. v. 2. And the Lord sold them (the children of Israel) into the hand of Jabin, king of Canaan. Where was the slavery of Canaan? 3, "And twenty years he mightily oppressed the children of Israel. 4. Deborah, a prophetess, she judged Israel at that time." Another pythoness. God does not avail himself of angels, prophets, miracles nor mysteries. What a great age of the ancients! Their polytheism disproves that they had any notions of rational religion. The Israelites were fanatics against the citizens of Judea. Were not all of Palestine so? Ch. i. v. 19, "And the Lord was with Judah; and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountains; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron." Rather a poor war-god—not equal to Mars. 21, "And the children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem; but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day." Exodus, ch. xxxii. v. 2, "And I will send an angel before thee, and I will drive out the Canaanite * * and the Jebusite." x. v. 11, 'And the Lord said unto the children of Israel," v. 13 v. "yet ye have forsaken me, and served other gods; wherefore I will deliver you no more." Ch. xi. v. 29, "Then the spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah, 30, and Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord." 32, "So Jephthah passed over unto the children of Ammon to fight against them; and the Lord delivered them into his hands." And that vow was the sacrifice of his own daughter as a burnt offering to this peculiar God, who delivered the Israelites after all the priestocracies' false pretences!!!! Yes, this bloody and impious book of the Jews, desecrated with the name of bible, presents the horrid blasphemy of their peculiar god's bribery and perjury, with a human sacrifice! Then it was that the Jew Christians could tamper farther with him, in causing him to be a murderer and an adulterer—all such iniquities recoiling upon themselves, whom I this day impeach as the most nefarious of all nefarious priestocracies. Jephthah was one of the judges.

Of course, an intelligent God, immutable, could not perjure himself, much less permit a human sacrifice, knowing too what it would be. What savages!

The world will be cursed as bad as these human-sacrificing and God-blaspheming Jews, if they continue to adopt their nefarious books. It will be cursed till it becomes rational, and has rational religion and its sound principles. Ch. xxi. v. 25, "In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes." Was any nation more idolatrous, more degraded in morals, than this book presents of the Benjaminites? Were there ever worse barbarians in any land on earth? What do prayers avail when mind is lost to its own dignity and duty? It is not priestocracy, nor their pretended revelations; all such cheats will do no good, before the conservative principles of the universe.

Samuel, ch. viii. v. 3, "And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment." Now the people preferred a king to judges. A king, bad as he was portrayed by Samuel, was the least of evils compared with the priests. The priests monopolized the Lord's flesh. They desecrated the sacrifice, and the chastity of the women. The people could not stand them. Let not Americans stand all this bible profanation of the God of the universe. It is a Belial work. Every rational mind needs rational religion, that comprehends all that mind in the universe, to give the only passport, as all rational minds have the principles and elements, and only need their evolution. There are too many sacrifices to judicial and other bigotry. Give mind power, no matter priest or prophet, king or judge, and they will pervert, and make all the pretences that will hold the world in abeyance to sophistry. After all the efforts of the priestocracy, whether good, bad or indifferent, we see how deplorable was the state of morals of the Jews, practising their most unnatural, not to say ungodly sins that polite refined minds of the present day would blush to name in public. All this is worse, and in part arose from the priestocracy fixing on the world the most ungodly faith.

If the world had not been put back by such ungodly faith of Moses and Aaron, the world-priestocracy, the world, might have been far in advance of its present state. The priestocracy were the belials, with their ungodly wars. What is the best proof of the scriptures? Prophecy. Whose? Isaiah's. He was a libeler of God. Any person on earth, on the authority of God's word, cause and effect, and rational mind's supreme authority, stands self-declared and convicted as a dupe, or worse, to assert that there are, ever were or can be, miracles, prophecies, messiahs, mysteries, angels good or bad, hell, purgatory, any need of priestocracy or any such machinery.

Messiahs, so far from originating new principles, did not, could not, inculcate any of themselves, for their very position destroys all principle.

The universe-knowledge was lost to the priestocracy, on account of messiahship; they disregarded all creation-teaching then in existence, as long before, hence afterthoughts were in their minds, and they substituted them for those of God, who is basely misrepresented by libelous bibles.

It takes rational mind to give, as analyze, all facts of creation, hence no apostles of peculiar faith are honorable, worthy, creditable witnesses of universe-facts, when making them appear miracles, prophecies, mysteries. The whole truth turns not at all on mysteries, prophecies, miracles, bibles, but on the perverted versions of the degraded writers who act degradedly below mind's character, in aspiring to be of the priestocracy. Let religion flourish, but the world's nuisance and curse, peculiar faith, with all their froths, be ruled out of rational minds.

It will not do to speculate of the future, until we do the amplest justice to the present life, this world and its people. Let mind tower in the sublime greatness of its own inherent worth and use. Had the ancients had the knowledge of mind now of the moderns, they would have fixed up a different messiahship, if the honest, truthful ones had not adopted rational religion. If any doubt after all written, and only on prophecies, as they are pretended, let him see the touch-stone in the most pointed peculiarity, that of the messiah, who was the diamond before mind, and not to be mistaken, if pure. Yet truth discloses the false stone of no value. It was as usual about trifles. The spirit of pretended prophecy is an odious evil kept up in families, to reflect the supposed wisdom of those presuming on brief authority, but really the folly of their own badly trained minds.

If rational minds reject human sacrifices with horror and shuddering, the miserable delusion of perverted minds of degraded priestocracy, they must loathe with ineffable disgust, all the pretended immolations of Christs and messiahs, and contemn, despise the priestocracy concerned from first to last, as ineffably barbarous and iniquitously degraded, corrupt, vile, stupid, their own hell deserving as belials, all the time. How dare they invade the sacred rights of mind?

All bibles of peculiar faith are made up of dove-tailed, disjointed stuff, called prophecies, the greatest of all frauds, impositions and blasphemies.

The immutability of nature and nature's God, convicts all the priestocracy of the present times, in felonious falsehoods that miracles, prophecies and mysteries affected in the bible have ceased. Before the world they are this day fully and satisfactorily convicted, as they never were performed. If they ever existed, they would certainly now exist.

Miracles are the reversals of the order of nature, and of course could not exist in a universe that recognises all the time, cause and effect. Peculiar faith people forget that miracles reverse the order of the laws of nature, and convict themselves. The popular idea is, that there are spirits, ghosts, witches, &c. Why? Would a perfect God create all such stuff? An idle brain, or that of superstition, creates all such.

Prophecy is a part of the peculiar creed of peculiar faith, that with or without it, is nothing. Now prophecy is only essential to help make out the false pretences of peculiar faith, that is all. The performance is feigned, not perfected. This is where the world is deluded by such blasphemy. All such bibles have story and some history to sustain their story, this is by cunning and sophistry, that enlist all the affiliated priestocracy. The history is hard to find in the story. All the book, kills itself. The world has been afraid to handle it right—on account of the sophisticated bullying priestocracy, who were posted behind the world's bullying despots. Even in modern times this ferocious faith is portrayed. What was the course of republican France under Louis Napoleon's presidency, towards Rome? Was it any less by the vile dictation of polytheism, than under the vile rule of atheistical France? The names of things are nothing, it is the thing itself. What government can assume dominion by the grace of God, defender of the faith? The very position is self-impeached, as base fraud.

Could the world ever have found near as much ill, but for miserable false pretences of bibles, priestocracies, and prophets? What upholds peculiar doctrines and prophecies? Bibles. What upholds them? Faith, frost, fog, mist—to be dissolved by the light of truth. The peculiar machinery of bibles is miracles, prophecy, and mystery; all these are indispensable to such.

But all these have to be submitted to rational mind. To talk of receiving any message at all without recognising by mind, rationality, is foolish in the extreme, as much in faith as in all other things.

All the bible aspirants about miracles and things of their heaven affect much, when they could not tell rightly of earth. Let them now give honorable, high-minded proof, that such things are true. They cannot, for the immutable principles of God pronounce their miracles, mysteries, and all their peculiar bibles and people, all the priestocracy detestably, ignominiously, and degradingly false. They are not to give the priestocracy fixing up, on mere bible statements but documentary demonstration that all such is positively true, or be forever silent. A free and intelligent people should silence all pretenders and pretences forever. The least iota of detraction from God's perfection or immutability, renders him imperfect and that much no God. That is the inevitable result in moral, physical, intellectual, and religious position. Now, if there were miracles or prophecies at any time of creation, they are now in their full force and vigor. Are the stupid priestocracy and affiliated minions so far gone in iniquity and corruption, that they cannot see this? They had best stop, and seek, by repentance, to become honest and truthful people for the balance of their days. II. Chronicles ch. xxi. v. 7. "Howbeit the Lord would not destroy the house of David, because of the covenant that he had made with David, and as he promised to give a light to him and to his sons forever." Is this promise fulfilled an iota? This call prophecy? This was the priestocracy, speaking always to be understood for their peculiar Jew-god, made by priestocracy jugglery. Now the God of the universe before whom all such are impeached, made his covenant with the whole creation of mind in the universe at creation too, so far does the last incomparably exceed the first as God exceeds perverted mind. Why so much difficulty among the priests and prophets, as they were called? Because the people abundantly saw through their hypocrisy and false pretences.

Now the world does not investigate for itself in one of the most important of all matters, religion, that elevates it to its sublimest sphere. Well does it regard prophecies as the prop, but little does it investigate them. The pretended prophecies deceive many moderns, palmed on all, and after all the fixings up by the Jews were and are no more than the oracles of other nations as of the Romans. They are done with all the sophistry of the priestocracy, backed by false governments and their belial times. They have distorted the God of creation, by all the degraded investments of peculiar forgery and fraud. They are characterized by all that can pervert the truth, and degrade mind. Ch. 32 and 33 of Exodus clearly prove at once the whole imposture, besides many others. They affect to make belief of things that they did not ever know, and never could know, nor could possibly have seen. The world ought to be told the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth about the bible's pretended prophecies, which are all false pretences that would have died long ago, had the priestocracy not been false pretenders. The superstitious people idolize the bible and its idols, as if the world would come to an end if they were destroyed. The key of the death of the new testament is in 17 and 18 verses of 16th ch. of Mark, and what can all the pretended prophecies of all faiths avail their own suicide? and the same fact conclusively applies as the key of suicide to the old testament, in ch. 32 and 33 of Exodus, where the peculiar God kills off through the priestocracy, all the foolish prophecy foundation of all such bibles, that are thus blown sky high. A factitious importance is attached about some Jew oracles, respecting a few old cities, Babylon, Nineveh, and a few countries, as if the whole world's destiny was anything to be regulated thereby, when the Jews had lost at the seige of Jerusalem by their own pretended prophecies their million of people, and ruined their nation.

If ever there was a stupid and infatuated people, the Jews are they. Many still adhere to that degraded superstition, the most abominable because the most murderous to them. Are the priestocracy completely crazy, that they wish to ruin the world in the same way? All this iniquitous folly should be estopped by intelligent freemen. The world should not be sacrificed to such degradation. Jew oracles lied as all other oracles, and they that deny this, lie as endorsers. Oracles are nothing at all, but to gull and defraud the world.

Analyze the ancient world, and a pretty set of piratical barbarians they were indeed. One old city pirated upon another, one nation on another. Babylon grew out of Nineveh, that the Medes and Babylonians destroyed. Then Seleucia eat up Babylon, that its enemies ruined. The mighty problem that gives the solution, holds all the priestocracy and absolutists in abeyance. The mighty question that they could not solve overwhelms them in their pitiful ignorance. Tell us, world-philosophers of this age, how many cities have perished in that old country of Assyria? Who were the first aborigines of that country? How many countless generations existed before the priestocracy's Adam was ever heard of, nay, how many passed off the world's theatre. Yes, tell us how many Babylons and Ninevehs, and then the priestocracy will be scouted as impostors truly.

What was the case of the old country of Italy, where races had pre-existed unknown to all the ancients? Is not that the case in America? Tell us, priestocracy, of America's ancient cities without one inhabitant, and then you can claim to be more than you are now. Absolutists and priestocracies have played into each other's hands. They have stifled the truth, bullied the world in miserable falsehoods.

All bible prophecies and oracles are like the priestocracy, that have conspired to delude the world. What are Babylon and Nineveh to prove? Have we the facts of truth told us, as rational mind requires. How many thousand untruths have been told to fix up all such trash? Are they not reactions of cause and effect? Cyrus ruined Babylon by changing the river, flooding the country. What a mighty dead-list of ruined cities would the world's history present us, enacted by savage warfare. Have there not been thousands upon thousands destroyed? If the bible has been true the whole world could not be kept from believing it, for it would have presented mind the first principles of things, and the true history of pre-existing races, which it cannot do, as its writers, the priestocracy, did not know.—Ask for bible proof, and man speaks; ask for God's bible, and his universe responds with true sublimity. Where, bible prophets, are the ancient cities of Egypt? They are now in ruins. Are they prophecied of in the bible? The bible, if of God, had necessarily told us of the world, and nothing less, to comprehend a just revelation; but we have none of this. It does not do justice to the smallest part, much less mind, that it assails! But you bible advocates are bible worshippers, faith polytheists, believers in devils, angels, ghosts, wars in your heaven; but you dwarf the God of the universe; no, that cannot be. but you dwarf your own mind in blasphemous conception and description of him who needs no aid of his creation, priestocracy, or pretended prophets, who is blasphemed in the pretence down to the little peculiar overseer god of Jewry. Shame upon you, that you sacrifice the lights of the present age to all the false pretences of Jew idolatry and oracles.

Do you really sacrifice your religion to all the false pretences of slave Jew bibles and faiths? Shame, freemen of the world.

Where are the mighty ancient cities, races of the earth, anterior to all bibles? What shall the world do for that history, that bible pretences cannot reach? To disprove the absurdity of these bible pretences what veritably endorsed authority have we that Jeremiah prophecied against Babylon. It is expedient to give truth endorsements before prophecies. Bishop Newton says, "Jeremiah sent his prophecies concerning Babylon to Babylon by the hands of Seraiah," &c.—(Jer. li. 59.)—"There is, therefore, no room for skepticism."

What stuff! Thus are the people gulled by the modern priestocracy. See the vile imposition:—

63. "And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, that thou shalt bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates.

64. "And thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her: and they shall be weary: thus far are the words of Jeremiah."

Which was the biggest blockhead or mind-juggler, Jeremiah or Bishop Newton? Did not the last know that such false pretence to evidence would be laughed out of an honorable court of justice. Jeremiah also said, v. 43, "neither doth any son of man pass thereby." Capt. Keppel, in 1824, visited the ruins of Babylon. So much for Jeremiah. If all the facts of all peculiar faiths, bibles, and priestocracies were laid before the world, the most ridiculous of all impositions would appear with the most flagrant murderous outrages on mankind, of all the Belial-world outrages. The world with one united voice, the priestocracy and minions always excepted, would accurse this lowest blasphemy.

Instead of prophecies, read impositions. The moderns must not regard the few old obsolete cities, Babylon and Nineveh, &c., as if they were the world. They are dead; let them be buried; and let not their ashes be desecrated by the priestocracy, who are lower than they are. We should never have heard of them in any such light, but for the vindictive fury of the Jews in resentment of their national subjugation. That is not a laudable spirit, when these Jews butchered the world when they wanted its land.

They talk of prophecies, and all their category of deluge and fallen cities bespeak their stupid fall in science, ignorant of obvious natural causes; yet the moderns stupidly keep up the ignominious game, disgraceful to novices in truth, honesty, and science.

Now the subject of peculiar bibles, and all their peculiar machinery, is impracticable to their advocates. What did the bible give of the pyramids of Egypt? Of Thebes, famous for its hundred gates? It has ferociously exhumed the world's vices, and buried its virtues.

How many thousands of years before the bible Adam did the human race extend? How many races of mankind were extinct, and their very name lost in the distant vistas of past pre-existent ages? A bible of God's inspiration should have told of first principles, and of things before tradition, not of tradition, which is man's.

As to prophecies or oracles, what ancient nation did not have them? Rome and Greece luxuriated in them. Among the Greeks they were used in all important public matters. The name of the thing does not change the thing itself.

These Jew prophets were all impostors, who were ignorant of the most essential causes, that wrote their history on the deeds of the ancients. They sacrificed their nation.

Transfer, republicans, no such paganism to your blessed country.

The world should be able to tell by this time what is the worth of rational mind and religion; not of peculiar faith and all its accursed train, that has to be scouted from the face of this earth.

What do mankind need of any bible prophecy to give the highest glory to God, that requires the purest duty of mind to the world and God. Surely all the polluted Jew bible examples cannot begin to teach them. What is religion? The highest function of mind illustrated by action, the committal of the soul, mind, spirit, to God Almighty.

What does christianity embrace? What, western Bhuddism? Is that any better than the eastern?

All are fictions of the priestocracy, that sought to rule the people, No peculiar faith is any, unless mind has bestowed its portion of capital for civilization, then it is monotheism unacknowledged. True prophecy is it, when no ancient nation ever furnished us with a true history of itself.

It yet, at least, remains to be proved.

The Jew prophets, &c., poured out this hatred against Egypt and Babylon particularly, that conquered them. Not only Babylon is fallen, but Judea and Jerusalem.

Gen. ch. xvii. v. 1: "The Lord said unto Abraham 'I am the Almighty God;' 8. and I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God." As the Jews have not an everlasting possession therein, it was only the priestocracy God that spoke, that was all.

Alexander burnt Persepolis. Ancient countries were ravaged with fire and sword, the adverse parties doing themselves and their peculiar gods service in doing so. Think of that, ye blind devotees of Jew idolatry, peculiar bibles. What city of the ancients was not destroyed, at one time or another?

Athens was burnt by the Persians. Has true and authentic history detailed all the facts, about the utter destruction of all these cities? What were the natural causes? That the pitiful bible sophists could not tell, no more than the other oracle sophists of the day. Their trade was to detail available pretences, and have themselves screened from the exposure. The special providence of perverted minds has left a burden to that of rational mind to clear the world of.

Is the whole history of the world-facts laid open to us? if not, then all such peculiar bibles are peculiar nuisances. Now what did all the Jew prophecies amount to, admitting that they had any such character, which cannot be honorably proved in an honorable court of justice? After all said and pretended, all evaporates and discloses that the world is going on as God created it. They availed naught, and were worthless, and therefore to be disregarded, as flagitious and base. Some of the pretended prophets, that the bible presents, affect to treat others as lying prophets; now if we were to hear both and the true sides, all would be convicted as base, lying prophets.

The evil of prescience, in prophecy, outweighs the good—does not suit the functions of mind. What blockheads all oracle-mongers were, to leave their posterity at the mercy of such abominable vices and crimes. But God's immutability prevents miracles and prophecies, that if he required yesterday, as part of his conservative principles, he does to-day. But these are mysteries. No, that is the absurd answer of the bible bigot, who disgraces his own mind and God, as far as in him lies, by false pretences of false bibles, priestocracy, and their affiliated, duped, or dependent vassals. Now if God fore-knew he fore-ordained, but all that is abeyance to mind's free moral agency, under the circumstances of creation, that bespeak immortality of the soul as a part of eternal justice, and God's immutability on conservative principles. This question of religion is the highest inquiry of philosophical science, and bespeaks a sublimity too triumphant over all the pretensions of miracles and prophecies. Bible bigots have opposed the idea, because they were thereby ruled out. Who countenance and support the absurd miracles of the present day, of the world, but those who sustain the foolish bibles and churches built on their premises? Now if you do that by belief and presence, you are culpable and amenable. The ancients, in their comparative ignorance, resorted to miracles, to explain what they could not appreciate. The power of the press would have passed with them for such. Now the people perform what would be considered innumerable miracles, compared to which Moses was only a juggler.

All miracles are phenomena; however consistent with nature, were unknown to the ignorant barbarians, who did not know even whence the rain came, by their own bible, that, instead of being a perfect code of science and religion, is a stupid memento, recording the national degradation and vassalage.

Take the article of manna, of Moses, and let it compare with the billions of pounds of sugar evoked by the hand of the moderns, elicited by science, and the comparison places the last far above this necromancer's dream.

If he were to-day in this city of New York, he would affirm that he was a mere school-boy to modern savans, and that his advocates were blind fanatics.

What is pretended to be miracles and prophecies are in abeyance to the laws of evidence.

The very attributes of the great First Cause destroy all miracles and prophecies.

All religion is that of principles, cannot be that of miracles and prophecies, and must be submitted, on the nature of evidence, demanding the full recognition of what is rational.

In this plan of peculiar bibles, the pretended prophets played the knave; all followers, faithites, are desired to play the dupe.

The idea of prophecy, would embrace the whole category of full time. Where is proof of any such, but in the pretences of subsequent impostors?

All such is the vilest imposition. The people should not be throwing away a lifetime on trash, much less actually committing a sacrilege on the Creator, for which nothing can atone. Many affect presentiments, under improper appreciations of prophecy, and act disreputably to correct good sense.

The priestocracy bible, the word of God! What a libel. But stay, it is only the word of the priestocracy's God, that is, of the priestocracy.

These simpletons forgot that miracles were enough, expedient to force the faith of the people, when they resorted to church bullyings. The God of the Jew bible is the Jew idol god—of the priestocracy—not of the universe, universal, but of peculiar faith, peculiar. The peculiar one deals in miracles. The Author of the universe deals in principles, not miracles.

Do you believe in miracles? Then, you do not believe in the Creator of the universe, that cannot be made up of miracles, but cause and effect, the result of principles to which miracles are antagonistic. Of course you believe in the humbugs of Jew idolatry, that has their peculiar god. A peculiar god does not belong to our universe. Credulity or credulousness is heinous; it is mockery on the intellect of the world. Miracles belong to supernaturalism, an absurdity and sacrilege on mind.

All creeds of faith that admit messiahs, prophets, and miracle-mongers, necessarily exclude the God of the universe, for all such are the false pretences of the priestocracy.

When cornered, bible advocates refer to mysteries, faith, metaphor, miracles, and prophecies' fulfilment.

But none of these, as their trinity, are self-evident.

None, but the unity of God, who is consistent in the unity of design.

What destroyed Babylon? We might well ask, what destroyed all the ancient isolated countries? Was it not for want of principles in government and religion? Instead of the sacred protection of universal brotherhood, they all fell victims to the fragments of peculiar errors and faiths—Palestine as well as all—even the mighty conquerors in turn, were overthrown by universal vindication of principles.

The universe could not last unless it were based on conservative principles. God gave them equally to the world, but mind's perversions have stood in the way. To have full principles in the world's government, let it have all of religion of principles. Does any part of it, though blessed with the freest of governments, have? That is utterly impossible in the vagaries and crimes of polytheism. The mind must be perfectly rationalized, and the press—public opinion too much wedded to customs, must be free from malign influences of monopoly and usurpation. Publications, schools, discussions, associations, libraries, &c., should be liberally subservient to all the legitimate demands of the mind of the world.

Prophets and inspirations are impositions and frauds. But the christian, par excellence, demands faith, because of miracles and prophecies. Then he furnishes the best argument against himself, for Judaism claims priority and originality over him, the borrowings from sectarianism of predecessors—certainly of nobler views by corrupt, venial and mercenary priestocracy.

The Mahommedan claims a subsequent covenant, and that arouses up the Mormon, who vows, as the latter-day saints, that they have precedence, and thus the subsequent blasphemer is to win.

But the christian affecting a mock dignity from his familiarity with despotic power, that upholds him in strengthening itself, a custom time out of mind in the annals of nations, assumes to talk of learning and science, and thus he is completely triumphed over by reason, to whom the braggart appeals, for he, as all his compeers, have usurped in this all the rights of monotheism.

But as a last dying effort, he conceitedly tells the public that the world will go into the jaws of atheism, if it be not under his protection. This is always the case with consociates of illegal and collusive action.

How can the world be worse off than under all such despotic regime? Well, now for the atheist.

How prove a God? he asks. That is easily proved by reference to cause and effect, that lead us to the great first cause, in whom mortals, all that are rational, must confide in due humility.

What then? says the inquirer. That proves an Almighty, for we cannot go beyond the Almighty Creator of the Universe till out of it. What does all this knowledge avail? All intended. The religion of principles that produce all, that is the wisest purpose.

This protects the purest conscience, for its immortal happiness. As to the when and how of the universe and of its Author, those are all alien to our data and powers. Nature is in abeyance to principles, that are so to the God of nature; this suffices for mind's noblest aspirations and brightest, best and most beneficial actions.

Rational mind can comprehend enough of the attributes of God, the Creator, to carry out rational religion. The when and the how of the atheist in creation are absurd, as his denial of the Creator.

Prophecy and miracle are the machinery of man, maniacs, crazy fanatics, and more crazy menials, vassal followers, the counterfeit currency of unprincipled priestocracies. Which is the worse, the denial of a God of the universe, or the peculiar dwarfing him below his own attributes? From Deity the monotheist learns, appreciates that still higher is his purpose. Religion and priestocracy are incompatible. Cause and effect lead mind to the Great First Cause; and religion, the inevitable result of humility and rational confidence in him, confirms it.

It is not the when and the how, but the what is to be investigated in due adoration of the Author of perfection and happiness.

The Author of principles must be the immutable standard for a religious conscience. Mere matter and the universe are two very different things. If all were mere matter, then senseless as atheism, but it reflects its glorious Author. The atheist is bewildered about matter, the monotheist is enlightened and exalted about the universe.

The very idea of miracles and prophecies destroys all religion, as far as in them lies, being suicidal of principles. If the Jew priestocracy were capable of prophecy, why not proclaim the real substantial benefits of time to the whole world, as the discovery of continents then unknown, sciences then undeveloped, all the present and future means of civilization and its best blessings? These are the very things that prophecy could have done, a theme fit for the noblest statesmanship, patriotism and philanthropy, instead of the degraded tricks, not competent to dupe school-boys.

The Jew pretence to prophecy is the veriest humbug, and burlesque of humbug, the coin of knaves or fools. When you speak of prophecy, you speak of the suicidal curse to soul's happiness, mind's ease, quiet and earthly equanimity. If mind ever required direct revelation, it does it evermore, universally.

That difficulty annihilates the whole manufacture of miracles, prophecy, &c.

But the prophecies about cities are heralded by the affiliated moderns as if that was any thing, destitute too even of its proof! As to their decay, that is only the history of the world—often by notorious causes, abundant among the ancient barbarians, whose pride and glory it was to destroy them.

What part of the world is exempt?

Of course, if prophecy were any thing above the paltry tricks of the priestocracy, we should have heard of major not minor local points—all that would have civilized the world, not have stabbed and assassinated with peculiar faiths, that are as old as sin itself.

Monotheism will justly accord all the biblical modifications of varied and subsequent prophecies, from Genesis to Revelations; that, however, will not avail all the advocacy of peculiar faith, for that incontestably proves the revelations of the peculiar god, not of foreknowledge, but of after opinions, and thus of man and that of mind perverted conclusively and surely.

Thus she meets all the legitimate demands of her duty in silencing, with the most exact justice, all the fictious of faith, and giving the full benefits to rational mind of the purest religion.

THE PROPHETS, PRIESTS, &c.

Let the prophets declare the character of their brethren. Micah ch. iii. v. 6, "And the sun shall go down over the prophets, and the day shall be dark over them." Of course, they were found a useless machinery. V. 7, "For there is no answer of God." V. 11, "The priests teach for hire, and the prophets divine for money: yet they will lean upon the Lord." The prophets and priests, mere seers and diviners, did not set out to write anything but fictions and falsehoods all the time, with whom the tribe was in collusion. That was the very character of the undertaking. How much they borrowed, and changed with the advance of mind, whose rights they always usurped under their blasphemous false pretences of claiming their peculiar God for authority. The apotheosis of the Pagan Emperors as they called them, eventuated in the canonization of the Saints, all paganism.

Zephaniah ch. iii. v. 4, "Her prophets (Jerusalem) are light and treacherous persons; her priests have polluted the sanctuary, they have done violence to the law."

Zechariah ch. xiv. v. 17, "And it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain." 18, But as Egypt had no rain, "if it went not up it was to have the plague—also the heathen." O prophet, did you not dream in all your visions, that mind is the mighty means before the Lord of the universe? The universe! Let that name startle you more than when you were awakened out of your sleep. You Israelites, appropriated the God of the four-cornered earth, and the scroll heaven, and could prophecy as much as you chose. But your prophecy was after the event, or as little account as this which is false, and the best of you would have been the worst exposed, if all your dark pretences and falsifications had been written with the pen of truth. But your train-band in collusion, kept up the profession. Who of all was more zealous than you, for the priestocracy of Jerusalem? But out with the truth, and the same you say of others is applicable to all of all ages. But no, you are faithful to your household.

Malachi ch. i. v. 14, "For I am a great king, saith the Lord of hosts, and my name is dreadful among the heathen." And this peculiar God who was a great king, and whose name was dreadful among the heathen, is indebted to Malachi for the publication. Who endorses Malachi? But hear him, ch. iii. v. 8, "Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings." Malachi, thou wast a true priest, but a false man. This was priest robbing man, through his peculiar God. The very essence of the profession.

JONAH.

The whole of this, as all the balance of this Pagan bible, might have been anticipated by the fact, that no such mission was necessary, as God of creation does not change, for his attributes are immutable, and the principles of the universe are fixed. Of course, wily priestcraft tries to play the whole drama. No matter the absurdity, it makes a fish story for Jonah. It was easier for Jonah to have lived three days, after swallowing a fish himself. That is more truthful and rational, any physiologist would say. The bible violates all principles of physiology and religion. Jonah must have swallowed a fish and lived better three days, than in the other condition, for then a fish and not Jonah would have lived. The people swallowed the fish story.

Ch. iii., "And God repented of the evil that he had said that he would do unto them; and he did it not." What blasphemy—men said—God did not say. What a miserable character Jonah was, for a prophet, disobedient, refractory, and envious! He a pure being, through whom God spake? Very clear indeed. He was very angry. Now prophets should not get angry; much less God. But the peculiar bibles can draw any peculiar caricature. Jonah was nearly guilty of the crime of suicide, as he wished in himself to die! But his crime of all crimes, was his libel of God's veracity.

Daniel ch. iii. v. 25. If this miracle had occurred, the world could not have kept Nebuchadnezzar from adoption and adoration of God, him and his nation, and as a proof, the Jews would have obtained then and there, their freedom.

Ch. ii. If this dream had been such, then they also had been convinced of God. But all the peculiar God people forget that God should not have done generally, if he had acted by miracles, as they could have been universal. How much easier was it for the God of all, to have acted at once for all. This is the way the God of nature does act, but these butchers of honest truth affect otherwise, and damn themselves forever as the worst of men.

Ch. vii. v. 8, "But I kept the matter in my heart," says Daniel, a wise inspired man surely.

Ch. viii. v. 10, "And (the little horn) it cast down some of the host, and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them." What good did all these mysteries of this ignorant simpleton? Like the oracles, intended to deceive. By all these stupid characters, one general idea is conveyed, that of cunning.

Let us have all this nonsense stopped. Mind, had these fanatics ever listened to it, would have taught and enabled the Jews to have excluded all the pretended prophets, and an ignorant set of astrologers and jugglers. Let this fellow be tried by the laws of nature to entire conviction and condemnation, from respectable society.

Hosea ch. iv. v. 1, "Because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land." V. 6, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." V. 9, "And there shall be, like people, like priest; ch. v. v. 1, (God spake) O priests, ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor." Ch. vi. v. 9, "The company of priests murder in the way by consent: for they commit lewdness." The greatest piece of false pretence was, that the Jews were a peculiar people, thereby making their God a peculiar God, and causing their peculiar professions assuming to be prophets to eternally lie, a peculiar curse.

Ch. x. v. 13, "Ye have ploughed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity; ye have eaten the fruit of lies; because thou (the people) didst trust in thy way, in the multitude of thy mighty men." Give up all abominable peculiar faith, O people, to be safe.

Ch. xiii. v. 4, "Yet I am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt, and thou shalt know no God but me; for there is no Saviour besides me." Had the God of nature spoken, he would have said he was of the universe. But the peculiar God only spoke, as the oracle-mongers spake. What a God!

Ch. xiii. v. 16, "Samaria shall become desolate; for she hath rebelled against her God; they shall fall by the sword; their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up." Had not the Jews set the example to the original possessors of the soil?

This creed of prophecy, the indispensable result of Judaism, a peculiar faith, falls in with that faith. How abominable is any such, made by hypocrites and dissemblers!

This pretender was as rabid a fanatic, as blackguard could well rant. What nonsense, impiety, and blasphemy, for a mortal to pretend to inspiration for himself and others about divinity. The man that assumes that any such should be believed, is either deranged or unworthy of an honest fame. We can well see what was the character of all such, by reference to Josephus' translation about Archælaus, who sent for the divines in Judea, whose study was employed about dreams. And while some were of one opinion, and some of another, (for all their interpretations did not agree).

How many are made miserable yet in life, about dreams!

AMOS VII. 10.

Amaziah the priest, and Amos the prophet fell out.

Amos wrote his own book, and told his own tale.

Amaziah's is not here. This contention proves corruption, among these professed people of God. No, they had not a universal brotherhood, certainly not. Why? Because they knew not the pure God of the universe. They overlooked his mighty attributes, and disregarded most ignorantly an investigation into his principles, and substituted false pretences about prophecies, an impossibility. How easy was it in all the military dynasties, to foretell much of the fate of the world, of races, much less one nation. But how came they not to prophecy better? Because they were not only men, but wretchedly, stupidly ignorant of science. Ignorance was the state of the times. They were sadly deficient in all science. What good did all such prophecies? Did the people believe in them? Their authors abundantly prove, that they were discarded.

All prophecies are incompatible with the conservative principles of the God of the universe, and as the Jews only knew their peculiar God, they had to feign prophecies, to juggle the people's minds, that of course were most wofully corrupted by this source of evil. The prophecies only benefited the priestocracy, apparently, but they finally involved them in one general ruin.

No such short-sighted policy can benefit any in this world, much less in that to come.

EZEKIEL.

Ezekiel, as Ezekiel says, ch. xiii., "And the word of the Lord came unto me saying: 2. Son of man, prophecy against the prophets of Israel that prophecy, and say unto them that prophecy out of their own hearts: 3. Thus saith the Lord God, wo unto the foolish prophets that follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing!" And this very pretence of Ezekiel, is now turned against him. Out of his own mouth, he is positively, justly condemned. All the prophets enacted their pretences through their heart, how else could they? Rational mind revolts at the bare idea of such action. Before the highest tribunal of rational mind, rationality tries, rebukes and condemns them, properly consigning them and their followers to obloquy, as they have "followed their own spirit, and have seen nothing."

The worst of all, is that corrupt and designing moderns wish to make all the available capital out of all this obsolete paganism, for their nefarious and foolish purposes. Not being able to perpetrate their own, they appropriate the thunder of predecessors. If they have no blush of modesty, will they not spare their country, their posterity, their iniquity? They are not only wrong, but heinously so in all their pagan business, that is totally irrelevant to religion.

And the whole land is bigoted, ch. xliv. 9, thus saith the Lord God, "No stranger, uncircumcised in heart, nor uncircumcised in flesh, shall enter into my sanctuary," and the castes of priestocracy were horribly defined, as in all Asia. 24. "The priests in controversy shall stand in judgment. 29. The priests shall eat the meat offering, and the sin offering, and the trespass offering; and every dedicated thing in Israel shall be theirs. 30. And the first of all, the first fruits of all things," &c. Discuss this matter at all times for light, truth and satisfaction. Bigots are afraid to discuss, but hide themselves behind faith, as they call it, but as truth estimates it, credulity. These priestocra-cies paved the way at the earliest day, to mind's perversion and the world's corruption. What, layman, do you join in with the priestocracy, to help cheat yourself by peculiar faiths? Have you like an intellectual freeman, demanded of the priestocracy, proper proof of the authenticity of any bible of tradition? As they cannot give it, will you continue to endorse bible or gospel falsehoods? Will you give currency to counterfeits? Will you stand by and see the world cheated, and not lend a helping hand?

What must be the infamy of intrigues, to put down worthy citizens who use worthy means?

The writers have brought the pretended prophecies, but have left out the full proofs of their authenticity. Who endorses them? The Jews must have scorned the pretended prophecies, but what could they do? Freemen, now you can and should act.

Was ever there such a dynasty as that of priestocracy, on the face of the earth? Ezekiel, xiii. 4, "O Israel, thy prophets are like the foxes in the desert. 6. They have seen vanity and lying divination, saying, the Lord saith: and the Lord hath not sent them." All this is fixed up, collusion of priestocracy, an abomination to the world, mind, freedom. These are after-thoughts and after-prophecies: ch. xvi. 43, Jerusalem is said to be addressed by God, "Hast fretted me?" Ch. xviii. 31, "Make you a new heart and a new spirit." The Jews can appropriate this over the Christians. Ch. xxii. 25, Jerusalem, the bloody city is addressed, "There is a conspiracy of her prophets in the midst thereof, like a roaring lion ravening the prey; they have devoured souls; they have taken the treasure and precious things; they have made her many widows in the midst thereof." 26. "Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned mine holy things," &c. None but a corrupt government could have ever polluted the world by this abomination. 28. Her prophets, divining lies unto them, saying, Thus saith the Lord God, when the Lord hath not spoken." This is the true portraiture of the whole tribes of priests and prophets of superstition, ever, from that to this day, as long as such faith exists. 29. The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery, and vexed the poor and needy; yea, they have oppressed the stranger wrongfully. Ch. xxiii. 39, "For when they had slain their children to their idols, then they came the same day into my sanctuary to profane it." The Jews were savages. Ch. xxv. 14, "And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom, by the hand of my people, Israel: and they shall do in Edom according to mine anger, and according to my fury; and they shall know my vengeance, saith the Lord." This is all the fury of false prophet Ezekiel.

The Philistines, Moab and Edom, are threatened for their insolence against the Jews. Why are not the present world-nations, as there is as great a necessity? Ch. xxxiii. 26. Ye defile every one his neighbor's wife." A world of such priestocracy, would adulterate the world. Ch. xxxiv. 8, "But the shepherds fed themselves, and fed not my flock." Ch. xxxvii. 21, "Thus saith the Lord God, behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, and will bring them into their own land." 25. "And they shall dwell in the land forever." False prophecy, Ezekiel. Ch. xxxix. 21. "And I will set my glory among the heathen, and all the heathen shall see my judgment." The Jews spoke this, not God. The balance of the world did not appreciate the peculiar God of the Jews. The whole world appreciates the God of the universe, and cannot possibly desire such information as the Jewish priestocracy vouchsafed to it. It did no good, but all harm to the Jews, and would ruin the world, if participant therein. The priestocracy were aroused to the perception of their certain destruction, and desired to avert the odium, shame and ignominious reproach of their misdeeds and crimes, by criminating their people, but well has it been said, like priest, like people. The Jewish faith, all peculiar faith, is an abomination to refined mind, cultivated in the richness of rational education. Ch. i. 1, "The heavens were opened." Is that the abode of God, the ether, the heaved up?

Criticism that is just, must call all to a strict account, when the glorious light of mind is to be invaded by arch intriguers. If they did not understand the earth as clearly proved, how did they learn of God's residence? Ah! but that was only a prophet's license. Then let it have a prophet's infamy. Ch. ii. 3, "To the children of Israel, saith the Lord, to a rebellious nation that hath rebelled against me." The rebellion was against the spirit of the Jewish peculiar code, that no nation could abide and continue rational.

As they did transgress, they proved that they had the soul of monotheism, and the constituency of men's souls. If there was any other rebellion, it was that of Ezekiel against truth, for this national rebellion condemns him and all his ignoble tribes of false teachers and legislators, conspiring against popular rights, committing high treason against them and religion, against God himself. They are all conclusively condemned on their own arraignment, and must be consigned to condign obloquy the most absolute.

JEREMIAH.

JEREMIAH the prophet, the son of a priest. He has already been disposed of in regard to his prophecy of Babylon, but he shall have still more ample justice.

What good did the prophets? They of course were in collusion with the priests who were in collusion for themselves, against the people in that respect.

Did the people appreciate any real benefit? Never. Ch. i. v. 4, "Then the word of the Lord came unto me, saying"—Who endorses all this? The folly of superstition. Ch. ii. v. 7. "He tells the people they defiled their land, and made God's heritage an abomination." He does not include the main reason, that the people were not governed as rational beings but as brutes, that had no free agency of mind. 8. "The priests said not, where is the Lord? And they that handle the law knew me not; the pastors also transgressed against me, and the prophets prophecied by Baal, and walked after things that do not profit." That is, the whole priestocracy.

26. "As the thief is ashamed when he is found, so is the house of Israel ashamed; they, their kings, their princes, and their priests, and their prophets." Let the truth come, Jeremiah, though you convict yourself too certainly. 27. "Saying to a stock, thou art my very father, and to stone, thou hast brought me forth:" and to the priestocracy's book-idols, the very same—"For they have turned their back unto me." (God.)—28. "But where are thy gods that thou hast made thee?" God-making was the especial trade of ancient priestocracies; their endorsement that of moderns.

"For according to the number of thy cities are thy gods, O Judah." Hear that, ye weak imitators of Jewish idolatry of this day. 30. "Your own sword hath devoured your prophets." A terrible retribution, that their peculiar faith and sects with bigotry, fanaticism, and want of toleration, excited. Ch. iii. v. 8. "Yet her treacherous sister Judah feared not, but went and played the harlot also." Civilized moderns, do you need these ungodly teachings?

Ch. iv. v. 22. Saith the Lord—"for my people is foolish, they have not known me; they are sottish children, and they have none understanding: they are wise to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge." They were bad pupils or had miserable teachers, and a corrupt lesson. The last two abounded, I most conscientiously believe for the honor of God, of the universe, and the legitimate capacity of mind. Ch. v. "Run ye to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, and see now, and know, and seek in the broad places thereof, if ye can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment, that seeketh the truth:" v. 2, "surely they swear falsely." And is this the people that presents a bible, the base of the testament? If the first be a corrupter to the people, what must be the second? 9. "Shall I not visit for these things? (adultery), saith the Lord: and shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? 13. And the prophets shall become wind, and the word is not in them." All this was, because mind did not have the proper sway. Monotheism does not require prophets, for mind has to perform its constant functions.

No! God did not place the inhabitants on the earth for thousands of years, all the time in fact, without mind's protection. From all the statements of the so called prophets, they never could get it from them. 31. "The prophets prophecy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means; and my people love to have it so." This is the whole solution of superstition. All the world of priestocracy of the present day plays into the category of the ancients with all the best lights before them, having too much of mind vassalage.

Ch. vi. v. 13. "For from the least of them even unto the greatest of them every one is given to covetousness; and from the prophet unto the priest every one dealeth falsely." Well done, Jeremiah, that is consistent without any exception. As the son of a priest you speak officially, as you had seen all the drama behind the scenes. The world will get at all the truth expedient, without much difficulty.

Ch. vii. v. 18. "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women kneed their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto other gods, that they may provoke me to anger." Now this was only a change from one pagan worship to another. When the priestocracy presented their creation an imbecile peculiar god, who could not govern his chosen people by direct inspiration then, as mind governs the world now, who can wonder that these pagans should worship the moon, Diana, as the Greeks, Romans and Egyptians, who were as enlightened as they and more so, clearly proved by science, arts, and philosophy.

V. 35. "Since the day that your fathers came forth out of the land of Egypt, unto this day, I have even sent unto you all my servants the prophets, daily rising up early and sending them: 26, yet they hearkened not unto me, &c."

Now we have the official declaration from the peculiar god himself, that both he and his prophets were of no account, that is, they are both analogous.

What the prophets were, so was their God; it was like priests, like people, like god.

This is the climax of ridiculousness. If a priest ever saw that, he should then stop. After all the early rising of the Jews' peculiar god, he could not rule them.

Why did not this god come in person, as he labored so hard to rule them, and they hearkened not?

As the proxy did not avail, why did not the principal act?

It was the safest, easiest, and most effectual way. To him of any potency there could be no denial.

And here is the official document that there was something wrong, either in the peculiar god or in the prophets. If it were in either, the facts are proved that they were of man, as the facts declare them so to be. The mind of the people was then where it was purposed, and still all the special acts could not do. It is clear, that the universal action was not in it. The vitality of the living Creator never sanctioned all such stuff.

Where is the world's sense—its liberty—its mind?

The bible is full of iniquity and blasphemy against the God of the universe.

This was not the Jews, but the god of the priestocracy. The last never invoked after this fashion the God Creator of the Jews, but dealt treacherously and deceitfully with him always. "28. Truth is perished, and is cut off from their mouth (the nation's.) 31. (The children of Judah) to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire." Will that do for you, mothers? Is that the kind of faith that your refined sensibility adopts? You must choose this day one of two things, the proper rational use of your minds, or the implicit espousal of that bible that portrays its tuition in what the Jews did. You cannot escape the dilemma of the last.

Ch. ix. v. 2: "for they, my people, be all adulterers, an assembly of treacherous men." And this the people that had all the especial care of their bible, priestocracy, and above all, their peculiar god, who got up early in the morning, in fact, "daily rising up early." That did not permit himself to sleep after a certain time, for the mighty correction was needed as,—"5. and they will deceive every one his neighbor, and will not speak the truth." Then one of the greatest things in society was wanting. The people had plenty of priests and prophets, who were so abundant that they killed off each other by hundreds out of the way, and plainly could not establish social confidence. Then, in them the soul of society was wanting.

And this was the chosen people of God! Of a peculiar god most certainly. Who has ever yet appreciated rational religion? Who has yet ever duly estimated monotheism? The true belief of the unity and purity of the God of nature, that which man calls nature, the elaborated cabinet of God's universe.

The world has to come to it, in all its beauty and loveliness, its exactness and fullness. It should not delay, for the excellency of its character is supreme. All peculiar faith is false, and makes its followers false to their God.

Ch. x. v. 10: "At his (God's) wrath the earth shall tremble, and the nations shall not be able to abide his indignation." Jeremiah, you libel the Creator, for his perfect Godship is ever in equilibrium. With all the lights of their prophets and priests, the Jews, ch. xi. v. 10, "refused to hear (Moses' God's) my words; and they went after other gods, to serve them." It is very clear that all the platforms of all the priestocracies that ever were and to be in existence, cannot begin to fulfil the requisitions of a rational mind. Inquisitions and despotism have tried it in all ways that torture could invent, backed by all the proscriptions of society, then, as now, without availing.

V. 19. "And let us not cut him off from the land of the living," said the opponents of Jeremiah. Now, they would have reversed all this had the people been duly impressed with the truth; and how easy was it for all true prophets to have convinced them at once. Miracles could have been successfully invoked as part of the appurtenances. All the artists of this peculiar drama forget that they are estopped in the incapacity of its execution. To say that there are prophets, a miracle, and not have the effects, is to stultify the narrator's mind, and falsify his words. As to the hardening of hearts, that is all solecism.

Thus the scriptures commit clearly their own suicide.

To affirm that prophets were sent to perform miracles, and that God defeated the impression by such process, is too scandalous for mind, much less the Creator.

But the time-serving bigots pretend they do not understand them. Of course they do not wish to do but their way, and slavishly follow the devices of the reigning dynasty, be they what they may.

But here is their miserable error. They are accountable for all such decision at a higher tribunal than any they have chosen, one that cannot know them only through their adoption of the religion of principles.

It seems that the children of Israel had several gods, but never reached the true one, of course, as all were peculiar. Did they lose the true bible as well as the true God, and give mankind the spurious ones?

Ch. xiii. v. 13: "Then shalt thou say unto them, thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will fill all the inhabitants of this land, even the kings that sit upon David's throne, and the priests, and the prophets, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, with drunkenness."

What a peculiar god, that is, what peculiar prophets. Was Jeremiah drunk when he wrote this?

It will have to take a drunken man to receive and endorse it. Why did he and Isaiah —ch. ix. v. 7—come into collision? There is here prophecy against prophecy.

What is the testimony of Jeremiah respecting the priestocracy of Palestine.

Ch. xiv. v. 14: "Then the Lord said unto me, the prophets prophecy lies in my name, I sent them not, neither have I commanded them, neither spake unto them: they prophecy unto you a false vision and divination, and a thing of naught, and the deceit of their heart." Now, the monotheist asks, who of all the bible-prophets prophecied truth? Prove that, and the whole discussion ceases, for I yield the question then.

Ch. xviii. v. 18: "Then said they, come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah; for the law shall not perish from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophet; let us not give heed to any of his words."

Ch. xx: "Pashur, the son of the priest, smote Jeremiah the prophet, and put him in the stocks." V. 6. Jeremiah accuses Pashur of having prophecied lies.—Jeremiah would be put to it to prove himself the pure one. V. 7. Jeremiah said, "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I am deceived; I am in derision daily, every one mocketh me." Here is impiety for the world. This man affects to have told the world of events beforehand, an impossibility, becoming outrageously blasphemous, in asserting and palming off his pretences for prophecy, and then out-blasphemes blasphemy in palming off his false pretences for those of his god! Was there ever such an outrage on God?

And this comes of tampering with false pretences, that were blasphemy. Now, what could have been the conscience of all such, short of vulgar perjury, to address his own God thus? He was evidently in the category of a false prophet as all, only badly caught, detected, and exposed, so that the people could not believe him, else why did they mock and blame him in the very face of such peculiar endowments? Had he been successful, he had been honored by the applause of a convinced people, who could not shut their eyes and ears to omnipotent facts, expressly delegated to them.

No, it is all an imposition, deducible on its very face.

I will by no means conclude that had not the Babylonians been victorious we should have heard no more of Jeremiah, but I am fain to believe, on the best facts of this and all such cases, that had the correct history been written, that all such would have shared the fate of the balance, their brethren, the augurs and soothsayers of the world.

Cannot the people be suffered to die in peace on their death-bed, without disturbance of priest-faith?

Ch. xxiii. v. 13: "And I have seen folly in the prophets of Samaria; they prophecied in Baal, and caused my people Israel to err." One prophet against another. They recognised deceivers in each other, and wrote the true history, nothing less.

14. "I have seen also in the prophets of Jerusalem an horrible thing; they commit adultery, and walk in lies: they strengthen also the hands of evil-doers, that none doth return from his wickedness:"

This was stronger than I bargained for, really.

Here is enough indeed. The anti-prophets truly could not have known, as none knew till the events transpired. All these writings clearly prove that the whole of the prophecies were the most degraded of impostures.

I have already adverted to his Babylonian philippics. The spirit of revenge spoke there. I animadvert only because I do see such evil peculiarly obnoxious to religion. All such is history antedated.

When a prophet pretended to prophecy against the people, and the Lord did not destroy them, it was a part of the prophet's machinery to say that they repented. Ch. xxvii. v. 8: "And it shall come to pass, that the nation and kingdom that will not serve the same Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, and that will not put their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon, that nation will I punish, saith the Lord, with the sword, and with famine, and with the pestilence, until I have consumed them by his hand." What danger was there in prophecy? Was this treachery? Did not his subsequent treatment from the Jews result from this opinion of him.

9 v. "Therefore, hearken not ye to your prophets, nor to your diviners, nor to your dreamers, nor to your enchanters, nor to your sorcerers, which speak unto you, saying, Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon:" Was Jeremiah less than these, and a traitor at that? He was of course not a prophet. He was as a prophet means, a falsifier of history. Who endorses such?

Ch. xxviii. Hannaniah prophecies differently from Jeremiah. There are but two sides to every question, and he that is talent-endowed, and studies with the closest observation of nature and science, will be oftenest right, that is all; but all those devoted to such an ignoble profession, were necessarily of small calibre. All that has been protective from universal exposure, has been by, and through the collusion and conspiracy of the priestocracy, who wrote, and kept the books.

Ch. xxix., v. 23. Jeremiah defines the false prophets, villains, and adulterers. And what else can be the condition of the world, when hypocrites affect to believe them? A revised false statute edition, is all that the world has of bibles of prophecies.

Ch. xxxiii., v. 5. "Whom I have slain in mine anger, and in my fury." Less than the fury of the critics, that raged high, when the storm of the inquisition came, and the mighty mind was crushed under the power and weight of the church and kingly despotism. V. 21. Jeremiah threatens the Levites, the priests, the ministers. The people paid no attention to Jeremiah's prophecy. What a burlesque.

Ch. xliv., v. 16. "As for the word that thou hast spoken unto us in the name of the Lord, we will not hearken unto thee." Prophecy is the veriest abomination to mind, uniting humbug with blasphemy.

Ch. l., v. 34. "Their Redeemer is strong; the Lord of hosts is his name." Vindictiveness is proclaimed upon all nations that had conquered the Jews. This is very politic indeed, as if other nations did not know as much of that matter. But their peculiar god was a priest-mind image, mind-idol. This was a theme for all the clique to expend all their small thunder. Let an example be given for all bibles of tradition to yield all the mockeries of superstition. Religion will triumph on her modest merits. Mind would have profited the ancient Jews more than priestocracies. Hear him. Ch. li., v. 37. "And Babylon shall become heaps, a dwelling-place for dragons." Will you be bigot still? Will you cry faith, when it is only credulity? Will you call a dragon prophecy when it is a nonentity?

Lamentations, ch. ii., v. 11. "My liver is poured upon the earth." Jeremiah was as conversant with physiology as he was with natural history, and knew as much of both as the world knew of religion.

Did the Jews then have any religion when they knew not the true God? Hear him. Ch. iv., v. 11. Fury and fierce anger of God are spoken of; that will decide, v. 13, for the sins of her prophets, and the iniquities of her priests. To ask for all the subsequent modifications of prophecy in its advocacy, is to commit suicide on its self-contradictions, not to mention all the defenceless category. Integrity acts on principles. Choosing peculiar faith, and its prophecy the adjunct, you cannot take principles that uphold not only you, but the universe. You are only between them, and cannot take both. One of the best evidences of the superiority of the Greeks and Romans to the Jews, besides the facts of civilization, mentioned in this work is, that all their peculiar faiths only pass for what they all honestly were, all auguries and soothsayings. The Jews can form no exception.

But the worst of all is, that most of the moderns that affect to be so learned and pious, that they have the pure faith, none of your pagan, are most stultified.

What would all the Jew prophecies be but one mass of contradictions, most suicidal and futile, but for the elaborate interpreting prophecies of the affiliated, who are determined to keep up the miserable fallacy as long as popular mind will permit them?

The moderns may affect this position, but they cannot do it with integrity and good faith, however they may pretend to it in their faith.

To uphold the spirit of prophecy, by the spirit of sophistry, is very questionable morals, to say the very least of it. To establish the frame-works of society on such basis, carries out the corruption of mind in its worst features, and saps the vitals, when advanced for spurious speculation. The Jews were overrun by the most powerful and successful conquerors, but to apologise and avail themselves of apparent pretences, the priestocracy seized hold of the sins of the people as the cause. What charlatans! The prophets assumed all their peculiar God's sense. With all the supposed aids of the Jews, they were a miserable nation of hypocrites, and all that done by their priestocracy, that overrode the whole people. It takes them, however, to tell their own tale. Let Isaiah denounce the result of what his clique enacted.

Isaiah, ch. x. v. 6. "An hypocritical nation" is the Jews. With all their aids, this people did not prosper, because they violated the first principles of rational mind. xi. 7. "And the lion shall eat straw like the ox." Is this inspiration? It is that of stupidity. Strange, that the people should have had the mighty prophecies, but yet had not the true teachings of mind. Now natural history will never permit such a metamorphosis of nature. What ignorant pretenders, what an ignorant, stupid set of listeners; what a degraded set of followers! xiii. 10. "For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light. v. 21. And satyrs shall dance there. 22. And dragons in their pleasant palaces. xiv. 29. A fiery flying serpent." What did the prophecies amount to, with such stupid effrontery on all truth of natural history and natural laws?

The mind has a particular mission in life, honorably pledged to social and religious existence. But these prophets were not competent to comprehend that mission, as they sought by their own false pretences to solve the universe-problem. The modern priestocracy are just as stupid, and more shameless.

The world should rule them out affecting to be masters, where they should not be slaves. These are they that assume the peculiar province to interpret. What peculiar vices have peculiar faiths, all of them without an iota of an exception.

It is their dictators that assume peculiar prerogatives, to indite and interpret all such peculiar nonsense.

Isaiah, ch. xxx. v. 9. "That this is a rebellious people, lying children, children that will not hear the law of the Lord. xxxiii. 20. Look upon Zion—thine eyes shall see Jerusalem—a tabernacle that shall not be taken down. xxxiv. 2. For the indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and his fury upon all their armies." What ranting! What truth about Jerusalem! What faith! 4. "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down!" Where shall they fall? Of course on the earth! Wonderful astronomers, if not wise naturalists. How contingent is prophecy! xxxviii. 8. "So the sun returned ten degrees!" No, the sun of God did not certainly—the prophet varied so many degrees from truth—as a sign that Hezekiah should live fifteen years longer, after Isaiah's God had said he should die. Did God or Isaiah say so? Isaiah said it. xl. 22. "(God) that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in." How wisely described. 28. "The Creator of the ends of the earth"—created as a peculiar God, many peculiar creations, among them were prophets, peculiar animals. Isaiah, ch. xliii. v. 10. "Before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me." The God of the universe rules out all peculiar gods, Christs, and Christmakers. 11. "I, even I, am the Lord; and besides me there is no saviour. 12. I am God. 14. Thus saith the Lord, your redeemer, the holy one of Israel: 15. I am the Lord, your holy one." Had God spoken, he would have said, I am God of the universe, and of course he would not have said, 21. "This people have I formed for myself." It is all false. God spoke only through the universe and mind, not through the miserable priestocracy, nor their abominable books. The universe declareth its Creator's speech and work.

Isaiah, ch. xliii.—Much less did God say—v. 23. "Thou (Israel) hast not brought me the small cattle of the burnt offering, neither hast thou honored me with thy sacrifices." All this was too small a capital for the God of the universe. I tell you plainly and candidly, nations of the earth, assuredly this was the peculiar God of the priestocracy, that spake the oracles through his priestocracy. xliv. 6. "Thus saith the Lord, the king of Israel, and his redeemer the Lord of hosts; I am the first, and I am the last; and besides me there is no God." God is no king of Israel, however kings and priestcrafts dictated this. This does not authorize any Christ, I presume. Then the old and new testaments are positively in conflict. The priestocracies must have thought the whole world fools, or have made much of it so, to think that it would believe them. 8. "Is there a God besides me? Yea, there is no God; I know not any." The God that priests invoke, that is God! But how far below the God of the universe! They give lies to the people! 24. "Thus saith the Lord, thy redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the Lord, that maketh all things; that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself; 25. That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad; that turneth wise men backward, and maketh their knowledge foolish." Hear that, ye priestocracy—God will confute you. xlv. 1. "Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus." Cyrus is too small. What folly on earth; to falsify history for prophecy, maketh prophecy positively falsified history. 4. "Israel mine elect." That makes a peculiar God, certainly and conclusively. 5. "I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God besides me. 18. I am the Lord, and there is none else." How often is this repeated in Isaiah. We mention this for the benefit of conscience, priest-stricken people. Why should there ever have been any enmity between the Jew and Christian? Are the felonious priestocracy and bibles between them? What simpletons! 21. "And there is no God else besides me; a just God and a saviour; there is none beside me. 23. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear." England, as other countries that have union of church and state, advances her prelates of that church to the peerage, over and above all other denominations. She creates civil disabilities, even over those for whose forefathers these words were said to have been written. The civil disabilities of the Jews should be removed ere there is freedom. What would become of the world were it not for laws and legislation? It might be overrun by despotic bibles and minions, but for mind. xlix. 26. "I, the Lord, am thy saviour, and thy redeemer, the mighty one of Jacob." Take one, take all. What other than universal dispensations can be made? lx. 3. "And the gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." What condescension in the church, and how much the world owes Isaiah for the declaration. lxv. 17. "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. 25. The lion shall eat straw like the bullock—saith the Lord. lxvi. 19. And they shall declare my glory among the gentiles. 20. And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord, out of all nations—to my holy mountain, Jerusalem." Which is most to be looked at, the presumption of this priest-prophet or his vulgar ignorance? The last always begets the first. But will the people of this day let such a low character make fools of them? 21 and 23, what priest-jockeying! Was all this the bribery, to such gross, licentious babbling?

If there be an honorable man among the priestocracy, can he honorably maintain his profession before the light of the present day? The longer he holds on to his berth, the longer he justly exposes himself to the world's tribunal of rational mind, and the penalties of future retribution.

If mind receive this pretence as prophecy, then it yields its proper function of rationality.

If the sophists pretend to explain that such is only typical, figurative, metaphorical, they then are the first to desert their own assumed platform. Both positions are not tenable. When they advocate all such, they have a mountain of straw, that increases and leaves no room for the grain. The moderns are not to let the Jew fables be palmed on them, nor their own fabulists get the advantage over them, as augury and soothsaying endorsers. What are all the miracles of a peculiar God of the Jews worth, in the universe of a God, who is not peculiar, whose immutable principles preclude miracles? God does not change them for miracles.

FAITH-DOGMAS, PECULIAR AND SPECIOUS.

These are all insufficient if they furnish an absurdity of belief or creed, for all will and must be a faithless salvation, if sincerity and truth, that ever sustain themselves in all things by conservative reason, are not the foundation as well, even better, in religion than in all things else.

How and where can these be secured, that ever accompany religion, short of the full attributes of Deity, in his omnipotence, purity and perfection, that require a strict interpretation by language, the correct sign of our ideas, that owe their origin to mind?

Neither church membership, nor the mind inadequately balanced by defective education in essential duties and habits, are enough to arouse man to his proper sphere.

Mind must be civilized in all the best comprehension of reason, and must have its intrinsic fund to reach its noblest destiny.

If any faith could have answered, then the dark ages for centuries were the best theatre to prove the fact, but mind had to work out in the lapse of time its own bright merit and true glory, triumph in science, and above all, over superstition and idolatry, the very constituents of all peculiar faith.

Such elements of the injury of mind prostrated, overcome by correct mental cultivation, that incontestibly vindicates itself as part of religion that saves, prove mind to be paramount.

The history of faith, as expressed in various creeds, evinces correct mirrors of the time, and the degree of refinement, and proves that such creeds, not being on the broad platform of God's principles, are stumbling blocks and hindrances if they be not of the right kind, to the just attainment of mind's rightful position.

In the faith professed, the great and independent question arises, does the faith advocated advance religion of the Supreme Being in all essential characteristics?

If it fall short of any essential particular, then assuredly that faith is wrong in principles, and must inevitably be in the result.

Nothing can supply the radical defect and deformity. No pleasing pliancy, no subordinate compliance can rectify material and fundamental errors, and the only way of correction is to renounce all such at once. The Creator requires his own exclusively, and any peculiar faith that withholds irreverently the least iota, and does not pay the Creator, is unworthy of his smiles, favors or blessings, and must incur his displeasure.

The payment must be made to the genuine creditor. The payment and homage to a created being, instead of the Supreme Creator, are a mockery.

What honest and intelligent judge can say the debt is paid?

The mind when enlightened revolts at such pretences. What could the holy and just God vouchsafe to those that fought in the wars pretended to be holy for ages on both sides, but death to most in slaughter, that they madly provoked for peculiar faith or conquest, lust, ambition and rapine? What was the pretended sepulchre of some impostor at Jerusalem, Mecca or in Hindostan, to avail the good of mankind?

Was that the disguise to unholy ambition, to general conquest of the world?

What was the system of peculiar faith to be built up, affecting to be the blessing, but the curse of the world?

Was it plunging that world into deeper darkness by such wars for centuries, or deeper misery by all the machinery of proscription by the fiendish inquisition, to torture the body, to coerce and enslave, debauch and darken the mind? Was that the best of all faiths that elicited the greatest ingenuity in such sports of degrading tyranny, to be best entitled to the holiest position of happy and immortal fruition?

And as the deadly wars of races and of creeds for centuries were not enough to glut the horrid morbid appetites of the priesthood, civil wars of more ruthless vindictiveness were aroused to perpetrate general carnage and slaughter, to excommunicate the people from earth and the Holy Centre, and confiscate their property to their own uses amid the general wreck.

Can faithful history, that portrays the thousand horrors and crimes of the degraded times, be placed in the hands of ingenuous youth, without enkindling the deepest curses upon that degraded body of human depravity?

What has not the priesthood done in every government that its insidious wiles could influence? See it in the oracles and soothsayings of Rome, ever faithful to its own selfish interest.

Are there not thousands of acts of cruelty and tyranny that disgrace all the lights and blessings of mind?

But for the mastery of mind, enlightened mind, the human race would be at the humblest and most degraded point of vassalage, to the curses of superstition that has assumed religious livery. Where can any such lumber and rubbish be placed but out of sight of mind, as weak traditions commended by no proper virtue of mind, but misdirected by perverted minds deceived by vain authority, or misled by the bribes of lucre and profit of the same profession, that present many delusions to the people, who, in such matters of momentous importance, are unable to rise in their majesty and assert freemen's rights?

The followers of a more presumptuous sect affect to scorn the pagan on the standard of reason, and yet all such flinch from their own tribunal!

For the lights before them, are the modern as good as the ancient pagan faiths? What, the christian-pagan? Does the advocate put that faith below paganism? Is it more than equal?

Vain mortals, clergy or laymen—nothing but principles can be consistent; therefore peculiar faiths are all pagan.

All the counterfeits have the elements of their own destruction, and the christian as all others.

This very tribunal is self-impeached, self-condemned, and its sceptre has been passed by its own decree. Stupidity only prevents the correct vision, and the record of the right judgment and verdict.

Mind may collect all the systems of peculiar faith that have been in existence for thousands of years, hallowed by customs of revered ancestors, sealed with the blood of the miscalled martyrs, except as far as they go for the imprescriptible rights of conscience, and testified to by all the false saints of earth, yet they all promulgate the elements of contradiction, that cannot be reconciled by all the benevolence and justice of mind.

To what point can mind turn of the five grand divisions of God's globe for its inherent rights?

The ardent devotees of Asia, the prolific mother of peculiar faiths, may refer mind to her rites and customs of worship, hallowed by time from the remotest antiquity, and received by their most eminent priests, of whom the learned Brahmin points to his vedas, the mufti to his koran, many of the Chinese to the books of Confucius, and other Asiatics to pagan worship, and to the other faiths of tradition.

Alas! mind revolts at all such faiths, that engage the attention of half the human race, five hundred millions, as soon as mentioned.

The rest of the four parts of the world are mostly beset by the conflicts of speculative peculiar faith, superstition and pagan idolatry! Alas for the condition of mind, that the best of all such has a miserable tenure by miracles, prophecies, mysteries and enigmas, all non-existent!

SUPERSTITION AND IDOLATRY.

Peculiar faith is identified with these monstrosities of mind, influenced by the worst of passions. Superstition battling for assumed claims, resorts to arts of stratagem, and invokes her hand-maiden, sophistry, for a thousand expedients.

Baffled in the bland arts of flattery, she uses all the forces of tyranny, into which so many of her outrages run. Superstition is ever inseparable from tyranny of mind, and the worst is that self-imposed.

Peculiar faith is upset by reason in all the assumed mysteries, all of which, when translated by a cultivated mind, mean, that belief in religion, a plain constant duty, is beyond the people's comprehension, and that therefore the priests, though it is a plain duty, are the only ones competent to decide and solve these questions!

But all intellectual minds do see that self-interest, power and influence, do always decide in the priests' favor, not the peoples'.

When we come to the last strong hold, and ask why the after-thought of messiahship so many thousands of years subsequent to creation, since God's fore-thoughts decide his character as a perfect God, his immutability and omniscience necessarily presenting unity and his perfection, preventing any after-thought thousands of years after creation of mankind, millions and millions of whom have sunk down in death without any but the only true aid from their Creator, always sufficient, to doubt which, is sacrilege, save when official priesthoods assumed by diverse peculiar faith, his prerogatives; we are told that Christ was the Lamb whose blood was shed from the foundation of the world, that is, from creation!

We ask for the proof conclusive, not assertion of that pretence. Words alone are given us, but words alone will not do here. The only proof that is necessarily furnished us in the conservation of creation, is by God's unity that such is untrue. The organization of the universe clearly disproves it, and that is the highest authority. No expost facto creation belongs to a perfect God.

If there were ever such a being as a fallen angel, then that evil genius invented peculiar faith, engendered in superstition. But mind perverted, is the only corrupt evil genius.

Superstition reaches her lowest state by sophistry, then such is an evil genius in the business of after-thoughts to after-thoughts. The whole system of peculiar faith, thus ever falls. Had it been let alone for free discussion of mind and rational toleration, all peculiar systems would now have been in abeyance to reason and mind, enlightened.

All systems of peculiar faith are compelled to perish, as false. All such have gone, or are going to the dust to be remembered no more, but for their iniquities, above all, for their hateful and vile blasphemies to God.

Great as was Diana of the Ephesians, yet all her greatness is buried, and few so poor, that is if men to-day, as to do her reverence. All such will be with Diana. Other gods and goddesses, and other such machinery of crude mind's conception, had passed on mind's stage time after time, before, in the long lapse of ages, and had passed off the stage with those nations, evincing sufficient proof of deplorable imbecility and perversion of mind.

Superstition, idolatry and man-worship have done their utmost, and in their expiring moments, before the progressive light of mind, have enacted many a fearful tragedy for human nature, that recoils now aghast, at the miserable picture of such horrid deformities.

This will ever be the case with all such works of mortal stamp. But man's tyranny with bigoted self-interest, enacted all these over the globe.

The blood of human victims is shed without compunction, by the fiendish priests of barbarians, and that rite is only superseded by the blood and flesh of animals, while this folly only yields to the light of mind itself, ever finally triumphant, but ere that, most awfully sacrificed, victimized, at the feet of superstition, by the oppression of unholy power of theocracy, diversified in form and polity all over the world.

Why delay, men of mind, the hour for the complete triumph of truth by one universal accord and concert of action? Has not superstition in her various forms insatiate with sacrifice, been not enough filled with human blood for thousands of years, not only shed at the altar of the priests, but at the altars of the country's despots?

Shall a deeper and bloodier sacrifice, a deeper and deeper atonement of the world, for outrageous blasphemies to the pure God of the universe, be necessary for the crimes and stupidity of past and present generations?

If God proclaim his recognition, it must be to condemn. That condemnation must be proclaimed by punishment. The duty then is yours, patriots of the world.

Spare, mind, not your energies, in this mighty and most laudable effort, to rescue mind from the deeper error of its ways of self-delusion, and aid in giving mind its worthy tributes, and let reason assume her legitimate character.

Fanaticism has swept over the earth time after time, and has overwhelmed mind's best sources of instruction, and despoiled the world of its fairest fruits. In their ruthless vindictiveness, fanaticism and superstition sacrificed the brightest stars of philosophy, and the noblest religious advocates for the times, in the persons of many true martyrs to mind's rights and freedom. What such fanaticism and superstition can be, the worst oppressors of man and man's mind, under all the lurid wiles and disguises practicable, too many centuries of time bitterly felt.

What they have been with the sword, inquisition, with mind's torture and proscription, they have been again by the bayonet, brute force and insidious wiles of sophistry and credulity for true faith, and will forever be, if we give tyrants of mind the power, and suffer its rights and lights to be perverted and corrupted.

No blind creed should be ever adopted, that separates man, the equal in character, from his fellow citizens, and advances that view untenable, because impracticable. The question with the world is to be settled for the peace of all, their ease of mind and vital enjoyment.

Who wishes to see mind ever harassed by mysteries, mere idle, if not cruel pretences, involving no good, but ever a fund for uneasiness?

The philosophy of life decides certainly, for what is only available for the Creator's paramount claims.

All intelligent good citizens will finally know this, without any faith of a peculiar character, but what the pure reason of liberalized mind gives.

This causes the globe to smile in loveliness, and repel the foul waves of superstition.

Take away the self-interests of absolutism, and the degrading corruption will cease.

The absurdities of peculiar faith are very palpable. Why did God, being no respector of persons, seek to destroy thousands of his subjects for one monarch, as David, an adulterer and murderer?

The solution shows incapacity of sophistry, to pretend to reason on the peculiar faith that includes any man-worship, as an inconsistency that commits suicide. When peculiar faith is adopted, reason exposes it. Nations are necessarily punished on this earth as individuals, as we see too often by their rise and downfall, from their own misdeeds or by the misdeeds of rulers that represent or ought to represent them. But then each individual is still amenable for proper retribution.

The military code of ethics adopted by the world, is too reckless of principle, and brings weaker nations at first under the dominion and injury of the stronger, and the last, finally, under its own traitorous factions.

Arms, the resort of barbarous nations, can never decide principles, that seek the forum of conscience, but other ingredients of the mixed cup of national vices, may elaborate the results of penalty.

The misfortune of subjection to absolutism, is the adoption of its follies, and the payment for its crimes. Here the one-man-power involves the mass in difficulties, and the nations of the world must risk the suffering sustained in the extrication, as a certain law of nature.

Is the condition of superstition, only chargeable upon past ages?

The main bulwark is faith so called, behind which, most professors throw themselves. That will not do.

All faith that is not rational, can be most easily demolished, as it is credulity. Superstition originated what priestcraft has continued.

When the minds of children are filled with superstition, we observe the effect of shameful deterioration of better morals. The highest patriotism prompts to the correction of superstition, that is, sectarianism of rationality.

One's own vices produce fears, that play into the hands of superstition. Fear and superstition have played into the hands of peculiar faith, which reason and science came after to correct for the dignity of religion.

Superstition has paid court to ancient heroes as worthy of worship, very far inferior to our own Washington.

It is ignorance of the people and much of it corruption, that make demi-gods of mortals.

What degradation of the apotheosis of emperors, canonization of saints, the sooth-sayings of augurs.

The herd, the vulgar prejudices of the rabble, enrage and stultify the people.

What superstition about days, especially Friday!

Sailors, above all, have a horror about this day, and the transportation of corpse. What superficial views!

But for fear and superstition, the sword and bibles of tradition never would have progressed.

Advantage has been taken of the world, through its superstition. The sword and power of Constantine as of a Mahomet, have forced peculiar faith on the world, and vassal minds ignorantly retain it.

Why do the adherents of peculiar faith and superstition lay themselves open to assaults, on their motives or their mind! All church membership is not done for effect, mere capital for influence.

Would that it could be said to be from pure reason, sense, justice and religion.

But mind under the noble influence of philosophical science, will not continue vassal. Neither military conquests, empires, nor peculiar faith, have been or can be effectual.

Mind that is mind revolts at the blood of victims, or the senseless messiahships. Philosophical science cuts down all miracles, prophecies, mysteries and enigmas; does not leave plausible belief of one.

By the blessing of mind, enriched by previous benefits of science, children know more science now, than the ancient philosophers or Pauls, who trusted to dogmas,—not science. This is all through mind cultivated in the truths of science, and then not a particle of bigoted sectarianism can prevail, as that detracts from mind's worth.

But as philosophy and science cut down all prophecies and miracles without any exception, therefore those bible advocates seek to cut them down, but most outrageously for truth and the God of truth.

But all this will not do, as none properly raised can permit false gods imposed on the world or mind.

The first impressions are important in the noblest gift of mind, that no false steps be taken, no false impressions be made, no false pretences be propagated. It is one of the most arduous enterprises of patriotism, to extricate from the clutches of superstition.

The combination and collusion of despotic government with superstition, have prevailed from the remotest times of power to the present, and fastened the most usurpations. Every rational being can plainly see that religion asks no union with government, much less with absolutism that ever presides with superstition and peculiar faith. Every age, and nearly all countries, have seen and felt the awful consequences of the last. It is a horrid state of affairs when the people of the country are not able to perceive the position of their rights, the actual existence of their wrongs, indifferent to the policy of political machines that move governments and the world.

Is mind to be kept in terror and thraldom, about abstract superstition; the idea of hell feloniously got up to rule it by fear? Some may deem it expedient to have such ideas still supported.

All partisans go for their profession in clanship, as long as profitable. Omens, apparitions, visions and dreams, are a part of her fixtures.

One of the superstitions of the world is presentiment of death by forebodings, &c. All delusion.

I have seen a patient who affirmed that he must die of his fever at a certain hour—so also a friend, both from forebodings, the last having a remarkable dream, but both survived clear of all such most certainly. We eternally hear of the winning, but most rarely of the losing side.

Another thing is spirits or ghosts, a part of the machinery of pious frauds. Who sees spirits in the day time? We are familiarized to many peculiar faith absurdities, and find it most difficult to be extricated from the darkness of superstition.

Monotheism alone, can free us from superstition. But then renunciation is said to take place on the death-bed. Of what? True religion! Was there ever such a deed in mind that was sound?

Pious frauds may affect some pretension or assertion entirely worthless, for how can renunciation ensue on a sound basis? Where is any proper proof?

False pretences however affecting piety, prove nothing. The greatest astonishment may arise, to see intelligent freemen worshipping with superstition and bound to those that follow in her footsteps.

There should be no fast days, or partial fast days—that is absurd unless decreed by nature. Physiology decides against them. No terror of superstition in any way devised is to induce mind to decide most vital questions, by policies that go beyond reason. When people get scared, then they rush to messiahships and all such false pretences. The creation of such a being as the devil arose in the darkest ages, when particular messengers were put into the place of God's principles, giving too much importance to such a being, and detracting from the attributes of God. Among the miseries of superstition, may be ranked the many witch murders. One butchery of this kind was perpetrated in the colony of Massachusetts, as related in "a concise account of North America, by Major Robert Rogers," who says "about this time a most shocking tragedy was acted in this province, several persons being accused, tried, condemned, and executed for witchcraft, and others imprisoned; but the next year they celebrated a public fast to beg forgiveness of the Almighty for having murdered the innocent the year before." Where did they get this idea from, but the bible of peculiar faith?

The ignorant ancients could be easily gulled and directed by vicious superstition, but does it become the American people to be humbugged by such pretence? The world has been governed by superstition long enough. Where superstition in peculiar faith prevails, the most absurd credulity abides in many things, as the mind has not its power of analysis. This cholera may be considered the cause of witchcraft, as said to have been in Russia. Now what better could be expected of a people, whose mind is held in the lowest allegiance to peculiar faith superstition? Away with all false faith of churches and the priestocracy, and all the arch-heads with them. The spell of witchcraft in Africa causes extensive murders, in the form of trial, by poisonous wood. All such proves that mind has not begun to reach the first main principles of rationality. Asia has her various degrees of peculiar influence; and embraces among them the Hindoo Thug assassination, a most extensive code execution of wholesale robbery and murder. But the captain of an hundred freebooters was a robber, while Alexander who commanded one hundred thousand, was a mighty conqueror. The Thugs are assassins, but England, who has subjected her 140 millions of Hindoos, is the moral ruler, defender of the faith, by the grace of God.

Some of the world are so superstitious, that their ideas refer to the age and state of the moon and stars, particularly sirius, whose days are very ominous indeed. All had their star-astrology, the trick of priestocracies and absolutists. The age is hardly past that heard this idle false pretence, from one of the world's aspirants. They believe in enchantments. The collusion of the world has been great in upholding all degrees of this pretension.

Among the means, the royal touch of kings has been maintained by men of letters, who ought to have known better. Superstition and ignorance in the first ages of the world, misguided the most, who were alarmed at the natural elements! Now, many are the conspirators against philosophy, that sets the world right in this whole subject. Bigots get caught in their false position. No such habit of lying so offensive and so perverted, that when telling the truth the functionaries cannot obtain rational credit, passes with impunity.

What nation is there in its rude state but has superstition?

Government, instead of suppressing all the incentives of superstition, actually support much of its nonsense, and especially the pretences of the prophets. Such act knavishly, to take advantage to tyrannize.

The ignorant, superstitious man, hath said, that there are more gods than one; there is the trinity. This thing of trinity, keeps up the old exploded notions of polytheism, under a disgraceful and ignominious sophistry.

It is the basest blasphemy on God, and has been the vilest imposition on man. The bible is one of the frame-works of this superstition. Most, the greatest sophistries in the world are propagated through superstition. Why? Because power is connected therewith, and premium is appropriated therefor by the world. If the superstitious were to think, they would not adopt, could not tolerate their absurd conclusions. With them, how many things become mysterious, as the recent knockings, the most arrant humbuggery. Visions of ghosts were commonly believed in by the ancients. The mass of the people is a peculiar monster, some liking show, popularity.

The most are bound to the car of superstition, and though convinced of errors of peculiar education, yet cannot see the honest dictates of rational religon.

PECULIAR FAITH—PAGANISM.

Absolutism has bound the world to its iron chains in temporal and sacred things, and has thereby invaded its most precious rights. None but senseless fanaticism can fail to see or be ignorant of its ruthless injury.

All good citizens must seek by all earnestness to be independent of all the wiles of hierarchy, as hostile to all the best interests of social and religious duties.

The world is obliged to consider by its sufferings its collusion in its diversified forms of power, wealth, and influence.

In their absolutism, the priestocracy have given no reason in the absence of all documents, proofs and vouchers, for all the miracles, and prophecies claimed, but imperiously advance credulity, that they most absurdly claim to be faith upon the consciences of mankind.

Though God's works, that speak for him to all eternity, deny all this as flagrantly obnoxious to sense, virtue, and decency of mind, still "clothed in their little brief authority" of mind's despotism, they fruitlessly usurp time in persisting.

What wise man can adopt that which cannot reach the court of conscience with any protection?

What authority of mind has the result, emanating from the fabrication of the cunning and the credulity of a mass, extremely and grossly ignorant, being well adapted for such materials, by which shrewd and unprincipled ambition operated?

Have not nations felt enough of this cruel drama, in blood freely drawn in every age by varied tyranny?

If we analyze these facts, we must be forced to reason on them by the present state of worldly faiths.

What interminable disputations, controversies, quarrels, and equal intolerance of sects, and vices of clergy, peculiar faith-persecutions, and bloodshed, about the non-essentials of religion, but the road of ambition to power.

The lights in all professions have to be corrected as originated at the true fount of wisdom, the mind.

The right nature of mind must be studied to be cherished, then we find that all, except the true faith, that is in the keeping of mind, not of priests, (wolves cannot protect the sheep,) is deformed by iniquity of insidious members, of all sects, all over the world, acting with subterfuges, prevaricating and equivocating, addicted to private, if not public vices, in face of their absurd pretences and protestations.

It is their immediate interest in the circle of peculiar membership, to secure some petty and puny object over the mighty benefits of universal brotherhood.

All this faith, without exception, is degraded by vassal character before this light of day, requiring ignoble vicegerents to do what mind, the functionary of all mankind, was purposed to execute by its Almighty Creator, not unlike to having mental midwives from the chief to the subaltern, proving corruption and imbecility, one or both in man. God did not create mind to be thus miserably prostituted and abused.

Rouse up, soul, and honor thyself, by honoring thy God. All this discussion is not for derision, but amendment, that is profitable for the universe.

Not to deprive of peculiar faith, delusive as it is, and leave a blank, and desert inextricable, but to ask proper investigation of all sound minds into the character of their immortal life-funds, and those, the only ones, to be considered by intelligent freemen.

But what is it that absolutism, aided by self-interest, that fosters ambition, that prompts or promotes, fanaticism that enrages, and passions that encourage it, will not do in the controllable crowd?

But mind that is played upon, is made to feel all these elements, till the spell masters it, as in all ages, mind seeks the best way, but is too often misled most ignorantly or designedly, as the multitude go with their immediate interest in union of sacred matters with civil government no matter how absolute, all such union made the stronger, cunningly designed for its increase and sustenance of power, over those adopting holier purposes, but doing as taught, to lisp from infancy, and revere by infantile custom various names and characters, in place of God's one authority.

What chance has there been for the world under her worst circumstances?

Yet all could not do under the inspiration of mind, receiving its holy light from Deity, for mind revolted, and burst the bars of superstition and idolatry.

In her pure analysis she does wonders to her ignorant self, not miracles, a thing that cannot exist, but in the false notions and position of priests' stupid language.

Thinking is a function of mind that ever secures truth, when it secures reason, the highest proof of that function and attribute, the ability to separate truth from falsehood.

Thinking mind could not believe in monstrosity, that defied mortals and degraded God, that outraged modesty and revolutionized reason and facts.

Thinking, enlightened rational mind, sincerely rejected all such imposition.

The testimony of truth which is rational faith, the exact position of true, the only faith, that mind and religion, its highest function, can recognise in its existence, what mind has to believe, was adequately established from the foundation of creation, by the Creator's works.

The Creator is not entitled to his supreme functions, if this were not so in the universal fitness of all things.

If false peculiar faith was adopted, it was not the fault of the works, but of perverted mind, that misconstrued those works. Mind, as free, moral, rational agent, must correct its own perversion by the universal functions and faculties. It must begin anew or again, that is practical availability.

Peculiar faith leads to all absurdities and crimes of false doctrines and systems, that produce as the result of false faith, all the iniquities of superstition, that misrepresents and counterfeits religion.

False or peculiar faith, under her various colors, produces many crimes, that history takes cognizance of. False doctrines come in for their share. The result of false doctrines in part, is natural conflict and direct hostility in creeds and their practice, instead of the unanimity of purpose of rational religion.

Fortunately for itself, mind has counteracted this injury of superstition by toleration of opinion, that does away with much of barbarous outrages on its rights. But a deep under current, most prejudicial, still prevails.

The torch of superstition is still lighted. Short-sighted adherents still affect that the best system of peculiar faith is theirs, which they modestly ask of the world to adopt, at the expense of mind's vassalage, and the world's ruin.

This is all self-delusion, a monomania, a one idea, for the basis being all wrong, the foundation unsound, the building however diversified and embellished, must fall. The world, full of messiahships, does not alter the truth.

'Tis needless to speculate in face of facts.

God, as Creator, is alone to be adored.

All other doctrines will clash, and break each other to pieces and fragments.

There is no peculiar faith to truly represent religion for any chosen people, the idea is absurd and monomaniacal of some despot priest, as the God of the universe has a universal religion, since he has a universal people, under the conservation of universal principles, by reason of his Almighty unity and perfection.

Man has made the world contracted, illiberal and clannish, while God's world has the circumference of the globe, with liberal and just proportions, and life to the people.

The god of peculiar and select chosen people, can be absurdly moulded, as has been the god of Judaism to the ignorant, false pretences of priests, who managed their men of straw, Moses and Aaron, as necessary.

The christian's god is the example of whoredom and seduction, that gave the wife's imposition on the husband, the blasphemy of her son, that caused him his life, and death error, and many crimes to the people of the world, miserably affected by such horrid superstition, the end of which cannot be told by wise men, much less by prophets.

But the God of the universe sublimely towers in his own Holy Centre, too pure for peculiar faith, the adherents of which, as Moses and Aaron, never dreamed of in all their pretences, much less approached the confines with their odious and noisome sacrifices of the blood and flesh of victims.

The God of nature rules out all the dwarfed little gods of peculiar faith, not jealous of them, no matter where worshipped, in groves or altars, because he is the approved God of mind, the God of conscience, purity and all the attributes of supremacy, eternal and unapproachable.

Where he exists, there can be existence for none other, as his seal is on mind, rational and religious, excluding all else, as mind is the concentration and reflection of divine inspirations by the attributes of God.

Vast and unlimited have been and are peculiar faith doctrines of the world, but they are distracted by divisions from the nature of their elements.

One faith only is right and that is not peculiar, for it is built on the solid foundation of eternal conservative principles. Had any other been right, there could have been no division at all. Any division assumed of the true one, is that of a counterfeit surely and certainly.

God cannot be divided, for he has a perfect unity.

Man, the botch, has made his gods, and fights the world to compel its worship.

Man's god is one of blood always, deformed by passions. The God of the universe is distinguished by the intrinsic characteristics of equanimity, impressed on mind the beneficiary, that realizes all due it by the sublimity of peace and justice.

Where all peculiar faiths' are essentially and radically wrong, is it worth while to question which division of the mighty host is right?

What are the test and standard, seeing that reason is abjured and rejected by all the founders who assume credulity for faith?

Conscience is invoked, but she can only appeal to truth, honesty and principle.

These constitute the only aristocracy of religion, and place faith in abeyance, subject to her betters, reason and truth.

All professors of religion must seek to meet this only honorable basis, which none can avoid at all.

If any avoid these, then indeed is sinful man bereft of his only true friends that are authorized to introduce him to his God.

In this ocean chaos, the compass of reason alone guides in safety. First came all the rough drafts of superstition, with her horrid human sacrifices and disgusting multiplicity of idol, animal, man and hero worships; finally mind with obscure views of the directing agencies of the universe.

Myths and fables, legends and fictions, danced attendance in the mighty drama of priests, who supervised the whole. In all these, mind and reason in their weakest state, were stilted, and with truth played a subordinate part to peculiar faith, no matter how monstrous, iniquitous and degraded, provided that the priests manufactured correspondent oracles of their pretended deities. Any thing with them was especial and peculiar providence, without conservative principles. They were the judges and kings of kings, for their oracles manufactured for the occasion decided the fate of man and empire. They were and have been dangerous parts of government. In some countries the deepest feuds and wars were the result of their antagonism, till victory of the one annihilated the others, and cowed if not crushed the empire and people. Mind of course in competition at home, and among other nations, all espousing a reigning priestcraft in some form or other, improved under all these malign circumstances. Successive ages obliterated the worst of the preceding. The main features, the desire for power were never lost, never relaxed, but grew stronger, while the defects of the previous administration of priests were lessons of experience to increase that department. Among myriads such, comes first in priest character and strength, Judaism, with her god of miracles, prophecies, mysteries and enigmas—all imperfect of course. Nothing could be done without the priests, the judges of the people, intermediates between them and the god of Judaism. This peculiar faith paved the way for others. In process of time, there came many messiahs, with after-thoughts to better man's deceptions, delusions and imperfections.

The Christs, Mahomets, Smiths and Tinkers, all seeking to supersede the prevailing faith, on the basis of speculation that condemns the whole unequivocally, in the face of monotheism, that is upheld by principles.

As mind rules the world, so rule they, bible or no bible. In successive ages, not many hundreds of years hence, the mormons may supersede the christian by their peculiar faith.

Where is all this vile imposition to end? How long shall insatiate superstition bathe the world in iniquity and blood, and outrage the high Holy Centre of the gracious Creator of the universe? Her empire will be as long as ignorance rules with her iron hand and corruption of bigotry, as long as mind, forgetful of its rights, duty and mission, will permit them overstep the modesty of innocence, negligent of the worth of high-mindedness and exalted sensibility.

All this is seen well enough, but absolutism subsidizes corruption of the public faith! Perverted mind acts tory to rational mind and religion.

Much of mind is bought off in promotion to church livings, and all the emoluments of importance. The benefited portion will hardly directly impeach itself.

All other than rational faith is from man, and therefore cannot stand on the immortal principles of consistency.

The world is deeply interested in being done with all peculiar faith forever, as dangerous and demoralizing, never safe or trustworthy, speedily and in time ere it be too late. Down must go all but God-adoration, if raised be man's dignity to repair, by a just reverence of God, all that can be done by rational mortals for a wise advocacy of his attributes. A false faith will ever create false views of religion, nothing better than superstition.

It has been claimed that some at least of these systems of peculiar faith, as Christianity and Judaism, go along with science, and remove the system, and the last or science perishes.

If this pretence were so, the fact that established it would fix and prove its innate principle.

This position, if true, would undeniably prove its imperative claims to conservative principles, and would link it forever in the league of creation's best and perfect gifts to man. It would have been ever identified at mind's creation, whereas as subsequents, it is all impeached as illegitimate.

Surely, all matters established since the creation are undeniably excluded from the genuine character of innate principles, and are imperfect excrescences offered for such.

This, among innumerable reasons, decides God's perfect exclusive prerogatives. Being excluded by reason, it is irrational and excluded from science. It is alien to science.

This is no fancy sketch, but the most serious facts.

The peculiar faith dreams and visions of the ancients must be superseded on the analysis of science, by the facts of modern rational religion.

The light of science was best held by the Greeks and Romans, pagans though called, even over the Hebrews in their palmiest days, and that light was handed from them to the Christians, who established the Roman and Greek churches.

The priests were the keepers of the records called sacred, and were also the authors, by authority of the nation.

They ought to have been the most learned, if not the wisest of the world, having peculiar power. But alas for any peculiar faith, science was obscured with a decreasing flame, and though the orthodox of that peculiar faith burned out in popular enthusiasm for crusades, science had to hang her head, for her friend and patron were disgraced at the court of truth. Strange to say, in the war of conquest, the sword yielded to the cimeter, and the Christians were behind the Saracens or Mahommedans who mostly had the best of science in the dark ages of the world, when the light of Christianity and Judaism shone dimly, and the whole world was more or less obscured in science and perverted in miracles.

Where, now, is the superior light of the Saracens and Mahommedans, of any peculiar faith, apart from the advancement of mind and reason?

If christianity were pre-eminent for her gifts of learning, and her refinement and courtesy had been equal to expectation, then she would have a high claim to mind's regard, if even her legitimacy had failed.

But silence for this arrogant claim, is preferable to history of many misdeeds and foul acts.

Who would not wish the veil of silence drawn over church or peculiar faith history of the world?

Fanaticism, that discloses the action of bigotry on unprincipled ignorance and vindictiveness, foul passions influencing a darkened, lowering, and beclouded state of mind, presided over much of that ignoble part of the world.

At the time of its ascendancy to its defeat, it ruled, the tyrant of the human race, and made its influence tell most potently; also, most malign were the effects that darkened the ages much more.

But now the jesuitical casuist tells us, in his sophistry, that all that was false faith.

If so, the question is yielded by them, for we know no other responsibility of the doctrines involved than through those assuming to be their professors, to the practicable limit of those doctrines.

If that involves not the question, that peculiar faith had no existence, as none such can have, it trades on capital of mind never acknowledged.

Incidental to the war of conquests, rapine and pillage, comes the deepest corruption of the people by sale of indulgences to maintain those bloody love-feasts.

Never after this can we expect the learned scholar of truth to pretend to speak of the light of the world being due to the darkness of peculiar faith.

When science arouses her head, and speaks through the mind of a Galileo, peculiar faith tyrannizes by his imprisonment, to arrest the mental and popular light, and the truth of science is held in abeyance to the errors of bible despotism.

A few hundred years after the bloody crusades, that involved the best part of the world in deadly strife for fanaticism, miscalled religion, the lovely and amiable christianity is employed in the tortures of the inquisition, and all the blights of real worth are caused by this unholy faith, affecting claims to science.

Mind at last partly rescued itself by revolutions, partial, but tending to a mighty crisis in the world's benefit.

This very faith was bettered by this light of mind, the only lever of the world, that she wishes to obscure and deceive by her varied sophistry.

Despite of peculiar faith, under the most arrogant pretensions of christianity, or any sect, mind is working its way to a purer triumph; the watch-fires are blazing over the wide expanse of space. Where can we find ignorance? Where mind has not been duly and liberally cultivated?

Countries now, with their millions to-day sounding one mighty peculiar faith, as that of the state, that ostracises all others by intoleration, an intolerable evil to all, though claiming to have the light of liberty, however freed from that of the pure conscience, show populations whose majority is uneducated.

And what country that nurtures as a social blessing any peculiar faith, but is cursed by the proscription of bigotry and affected piety?

Where intoleration by the laws dares not show its odious head, a proscriptive unpopularity stalks by favor of church dogmas in regard to peculiar faith, that holds the supreme rights of mind and mind's God in abeyance! Such a state needs correction, not argument, that yields to omnipotent facts.

Are not peculiar faith and its church aristocracy an ostracism of the world, that cannot subscribe to its doctrines?

No individual, if honest, can deny principles, that govern peculiar faiths.

A conservative revolution for the better must come; deferred it may be, but cannot be prevented in the progress of mind.

Patriots and statesmen, good and true, of both sexes, are invoked for this holy enterprise, in which the good of the world, of society in general, is at stake.

For general peace, never otherwise affected; for reason, that is legitimate, the virtues of mind, that needs it; true religion of God the Creator, that commands it; arouse, citizens of the world, and lay aside your lethargy.

Paganism, idolatry, superstition, and man-worship, more or less over every land, have to be supplanted by rational religion, introduced by the purest precepts of mind cultivated.

The true faith that asks for the freest discussion of her own sacred rights, to appreciate her correct principles, should be established for success and conscience.

None other can succeed, if we take analogy, the test of experience, for the balance.

The time is now, for there are millions asserting to no dogma of tradition of peculiar faith, not submitted to reason, in every country where the best prevails.

With the minds of freemen they are candid to hold aloof, satisfied in their conscientiousness that they have a better state than the adoption of any notion that they cannot faithfully support, or reasonably and justly recognise.

If reason do not supersede peculiar tradition, the light is in darkness forever with too many already, ignorant to appreciate, or corrupt to amend.

What legend tradition, then, under the sanctity of age, may not be adopted, if the test of reason be excluded?

Ask the uninitiated if they believe in these traditions? Some will affirm to a partial, others to a peculiar faith in such.

Do they faithfully practice their precepts as believers?

The position of the last contradicts their faith at once. What is such faith worth? Ask them for the reasons of their peculiar faith? Can such peculiar faith give mind's honest reasons?

The first disclose the true character of the work, as a mixture of legends, fables, connected, of course, to a part that is probable.

If all fiction had been used, the whole object of the designers had been defeated, as none could have believed it.

But there can be no peculiar faith short of superstition, consequently there can be none short of false faith.

All that come not under the banner of rational religion are necessarily the adherents of superstition and peculiar faith.

They can know now whether others do know their whole position. Many have been sincerely deceived.

The present state of the world is one of vast consideration, vast responsibility resting it seems with none more than with each individual, self-independent of all advisers except enlightened conscience, but the effects of that responsibility fearfully telling on man and his habitation, the world.

Then, a system of rational faith is needed, that candid man can in the clearest conscience acquiesce in, and do full and strict justice to. He needs only read the documents of creation, by the light of reason, which is aided by truth.

Fundamental errors have been overlooked too long, creating the whole family of evils, warring upon the best interests of mankind, where a correct faith would engender perpetual sunshine and peace.

It is not to be expected that the doctors should lay aside their doctrines; not at all, however erroneous.

Their vital interest, profession, living, pride of consistency, all are at stake.

Some are consistent and sincere, if their minds be partially informed and capable; while others are more or less constantly identified in these errors.

Where is the limit?

The bigoted generation must pass off the stage of action.

Gross as those errors, still that generation will embrace them by inextricable custom and habit.

Many a battle for conservative religious revolution has been already fought, but the duty and light have not been embraced.

Mind must see its way clear by reason and principles, after its affections had been previously enlisted another way, for successful revolution, and above all, with many, the persuasion must be for vital self-interest.

All analysts will see, that choose, that it does not make an honest difference about faith in absurd notions and religion, for the sake of the world's benefit, and man's dignity and peace. Sophists in religion or science assume faith, but philosophers require truth, reason, and facts.

Faiths, as governments, that have warred or do war on man, in body or mind, for lands, money, or church power, are false, and the propagators are fiend-minds.

The pure God of Monotheism permits no such obligations. It is bad enough to have the false opinions of peculiar faith, but horrible to have its tyranny in the world.

What better can we ever expect, constituted as human nature is, and perverted as it can be, than such tyranny, when the opinions of faith or credulity mature into actions? The only correction is in mind's precaution; the fault is in mind's vassal and abject submission, from blind faith, after the chains are rusted and the spell broken.

At the bidding of peculiar faith, how convenient is it to reject reason, when it emphatically condemns the whole, and yet all are bound to use it in all things of mind and principle, for universal safety.

Shortsightedness adopts reason, when profitable, in part. Wisdom forever clings to it, as universally necessary. When is it ever to be rejected in this life, in anything? What creed is not self-impeached forever, unless its reason rest on the platform of immortal principles?

All creeds condemn each other, where principle is needed; then we need travel no further than to upset the whole foundation, of which all such constitute a part.

The military chieftains, who assert faith of any kind on their brute force, are unworthy of the countenance of good and true men.

All civilians that assert peculiar faith of any kind by sophistry, are degraded and debased to the dust. These misdeeds are a lasting injury to the world, most difficult to be rectified, and the sooner abandoned the better. The world has to be guarded against all such ministers of peculiar faith, as those of peculiar power, military chieftains and all. The world or they to perdition must go, by the great law of self-preservation.

All professions of civil chieftains who affect to be religionists, spiritual or any other, but adopting any but the true God of the universe, are condemned already by their own basis.

But who pursues doctrines that terminate in false positions, absurdities, and crimes, with satisfaction, much less safety. Rational beings have immortal souls, that must not be debauched by false faith or doctrines.

Grapple to man and his notions, destitute of principles, and all such will come to the dust, principal and followers. Co-equal are all peculiar faiths, and they contend with each other on the veriest trifles.

What is all such faith worth, but to deceive and humbug the people, and promote impostors over their rights? The practice cannot be superior to the faith.

All peculiar faiths are counterfeit, full of deceit and mockery, with the elements of their own destruction.

Away with the gods of such faiths, and all their priest-machinery, but give us forever the God of the universe, with his universal attributes.

Thanks, at the same time, to all honest and truthful men, no matter who they are, that aid and direct properly mind to its correct duty.

Alienated from all improper influences, such are to be respected, whoever and wherever they may be.

False faith cannot corrupt them, nor despoil them of God's innate gifts, their only property at birth, and of which no absolutism, no priest pretences ever dispossessed them, in life or death.

They have been found in the battle-field of American liberty, advocates eloquent, and brave defenders of freedom.

Adorned by her light of mind, they have sought to diffuse her amplest blessings among the races of man.

Many absurdities of peculiar faith have been noticed already, but this is proof conclusive enough to stop, were it not necessary to elucidate the subject in various lights, to suit the minds of the world.

This peculiar faith, but another name for false faith, puts itself down effectually, by its own irremediable antagonism. More than six hundred kinds of dissensions have already prevailed under one branch of messiahship, with no prospects of its limits or universal reconciliation, as it is diffused instead of contracted.

Coercion by proscription and bloody massacres, has been attempted in vain.

False faith engenders false doctrines, and false positions lead to false modes of reconciliation of particulars, that never can be effected except on the platform of principles, that peculiar faith, no matter how imposing, has not got.

What a commentary for religion, that the God of religion cannot approve!

The fundamental error rests not personally with many professors, who, for aught that the world knows, are as good individually as the best, and as liberal minded, but the whole issue turns, without exception, in contravening God's proper and exclusive attributes, functions and principles.

Rectify all this preliminary man's blunder, gross and bloody, and then the system is bound to be right in all essentials, and then if there be difficulty, it will be by misrepresentation.

Worst of all we have society cut up into clans, with bad feelings and pent-up ill will, the banding of cliques of peculiar faith, contracting the world's interests and benefits to their narrow circles.

Mind has been too confined to narrow, small circles, to the limits of puerile creeds, instead of taking the whole globe for its theatre, the whole universe for its circumference, to do its whole duty and mission.

Upwards and onwards its progress in time must be, to properly reach eternity and mature happiness.

Yes, all the subdivisions of peculiar faith, and all its grand divisions, can and must yield to a universal faith.

But the priests, preachers, prophets, and messiahs, all its peculiar machinery for peculiar advantages, must be merged in the universal interest of that universal faith. The crescent and the cross, the Brahmin and the pagan, the Jew and mormon, the bhudhists and those of Confucius, can be in one moment converted into the only true faith, that must prevail forever, when all others and their founders are trampled in the dust, as vile, to be forgotten, and remembered no more.

They all can be reconciled to each other, if the intelligent people will decide, for what the whole world is bound indispensably to do, and let mind act that considers no creed venerable by time without truth, as Christianity is in the same category with mormonism, while the whole world, at the very name of the Eternal, forms a band of universal brotherhood, in the pure standard of indissoluble union, love, and the best fraternal feelings.

This sublime position, universal brotherhood. practicable above Utopian schemes, looks to God to seal it with his almighty principles of conservation.

The ignorant man is a presumptuous libeler, while the liberal mind of science only realizes the only practicable humility before an appreciated God of nature.

Universal brotherhood! What a millenium, the only one that can come! brought about by no local messiahs, who can never rise above locality or time, but by an Omnipresence, that commands time and space, and stamps its indelible character on mind worthy of it.

Let all the good and the wise adopt the necessary measures to speed and welcome its glorious triumph, and guidance to all nations of the five great portions of the globe, with all their appurtenant islands, adding also the blessings of constitutional government.

All are now contending about trifles of no moment or value, catching eternally at the shadows of peculiar faith, that disorganizes and demoralizes the world, but leaving the substance and universal blessings of rational faith. Let them not unite the cynic of the manger, too, to exclude a better state of things, and unable to do justice to a world-wide subject, let them, so far from impeding, aid the mightiest epoch of time, and the advent of the rightful and supreme only Lord of all.

The gorgeous splendors of man's towering temples of various peculiar faiths over continents, built with the wealth of many millions, have to decay and moulder in the dust.

Time will ere long point the world to the wrecks and fragments, and the lowliness of those suppliant for restoration by force, instead of what true principles inculcate by peace and the happiest aspirations.

Little can we expect a ready submission of men to rational principles in practice, when they affect to assert the correctness of their adopted professions in peculiar faith, dependent on a reckless credence in what is virtually non-entity.

No doubtful heresies nor spurious orthodoxies can avail, in any peculiar faith that is necessarily false.

There are various kinds of peculiar faith professions all over the world, but all are destitute of the one foundation, and cannot be true to God nor man, hence none such are rightly established yet among nations, who owe it to themselves and each individual, not only to seek the true, but secure it as soon as possible, and exclude all the false thereby.

Are we told not to investigate this subject? As well might we be told by the robber, not to investigate the rights to our property which he affects to claim. No freeman can be satisfied with such false pretences. Slaves of mind and simpletons, cannot even be passive any longer, after a manly feeling is excited.

The whole families of all peculiar faith, forever contend with one another in the most odious rivalry and degrading opposition, to rise on each others' ruins, thereby disproving forever their disinterestedness.

Even the mother of one tribe and a numerous family, has been quarrelling and fighting with her daughters for centuries, previously fighting for centuries unsuccessfully with those of a different master and faith, representative, as she assumed to be, of the principles of peace! Had she an element in her composition, of any such character? All this has been disgusting and nauseating, to the true advocates of proper principles. But what could they do? The human mind has been fettered in science and faith, by usurpers who assumed to monopolize the whole to themselves.

Have not false faiths caused more blood to flow than all other causes in the world?

And the conflicts of the daughters with each other, a very large and noisy family, by-the-by, are no less endless and unpleasant to the feelings of a brotherhood, much less of an amicable sisterhood.

And will all these lessons of awful experience be lost upon a free and intelligent people, whose glory and honor are in their own hands as far as their interest directs? Will such a people take up the miserable fragments, instead of seeking their own glorious and sumptuous repast, the most salutary viands by the true host?

Shall the mighty teachers of the world in true government, not finish the munificent crown of glory by dispensing also a true system of rational religion? Better never had we any pretensions to this momentous subject, as then the evil results would cease from cessation of false faiths. The practice of the necessary demands of civil society, would be essentially a vast constituent of religion. But creation of a supreme innate faculty, requires a fuller policy in the advance of civilization, as a necessary and indispensable constituent of the whole existence.

Eternal wisdom has decreed a full and exclusive adoration, and eternal power must be reverenced by mind, whose humility advances with appreciation of the Almighty.

Every mind has religion from the smallest element of light, to the brightest rays of effulgence.

No dogma of peculiar faith can satisfy such mind. Priests and monks, preachers and mountebanks may pretend to such, but the intelligent world will expose them as degraded false lights, unworthy of mind. But peculiar faith has grown with infancy, that was taught to consider it anything in life or death, and mind is too often precluded from its free investigation by the bigotry of social dynasty.

This most oppressive case must be met as the greatest difficulty. It is the slavery of infant mind, and exclusion of the habituated mind of man from due appreciation of the foundation of the faith.

Revolution, to stop half-way, is treason, and not cause the true estimation of names and position.

It must be bold and spirited to the full maintenance of mind's rights, to be hailed its worthy champion and avenger.

Constituted as all false faith is, all sectarian creeds are the sport and opposition of each other, of the philosophical facts of creation which they violate, and all the insidious injury accrues to the world for its conceited superstition.

The conceit of man, as bad as it is in common business social matters, is many fold worse than tolerable in his peculiar faith, that has so many peculiar notions and whims to uphold it, which above all, he is responsible to reason for.

The more untenable that peculiar position, the more sophistry and absolutism are needed to enforce it. This should not be on a sphere that must recognise man's mind supreme, to recognise through its cultivation and amendment, the immortal mind, the soul of creation between the creature and his Creator, the first rightly using, the last, generously bestowing the deed of gift.

All peculiar faith betrays the ignorance and darkness of past ages, the puny works of men.

In all such, an immortal soul will never be satisfied, as leading to contradictions ever absurd, teachings most gross, results ever dangerous, and consequences ultimately ruinous.

All creeds that pay higher reverence for masters than principles, run into man-worship, and are a species of idolatry, thus forming what has affected mind in all past ages, corrupting all sources, and poisoning all religious enjoyments.

Peculiar faith, however it clashes in its thousand vagaries over the wide world that it burns with its destructive torch of disunion, has unity in its evils, and among them is classed as one of the chief, fanaticism.

When mind runs riot in its wildest recklessness, it degenerates into fanaticism, truly a bloody tyrant, whose reign leaves a bloody progress, and its deeds of foul evil recorded in the agonies of society.

Millions of many nations have been corrupted at this poisoned fountain, to deal vindictive tortures on others, or its curses on themselves and posterity.

This fury has libeled reason at every step, and has debased mind in every age.

She has blasphemed God in hypocrisy, and has usurped man's prerogatives by her unhallowed devices.

She has misled youth by her deceitful sophistry, to their ruin, and revelled in all the seductions that overwhelmed youthful modesty and merit.

Cunning and fraud are her attributes, for when wisdom is present, she sneaketh with her siren breath.

Her ends have been selfish, the means deadly and fiendish.

She hateth innocence, and exchangeth the poison of vice for its destruction.

She is a companion of ignorance, and associates with her friend and relation, error, and doeth the bidding of superstition.

She buildeth bonfires for evil, the incendiary of mind's peace.

She deceitfully promiseth, but kills by the performance.

Her history is known by her injury ; her reward by anguish and crime. She knoweth not the circumference of brotherhood, but is well known to prevent it.

In the honesty and simplicity of their innocent nature, good citizens have not dreamed of the evils of deceit, that have been perpetrated more or less in every age.

Man can hardly realize what he is subject to in this life.

The game played on his credulity, called faith, is that of absolutism, either in the small or large circle.

All that he has possibly to counteract, then, is the best cultivated mind and the right use of it, that scan motives and traditions, and severs the chaff from the essence-grain of mind. For his life and honor, his present and future happiness, he must not part with it the least ; if he do, he is so much weakened.

Let not those of peculiar faith flatter themselves that they will do much more ; their days are numbered in enlightened mind's tribunal.

Much of the world may resort to their churches from fashion, convenience, motive, and a host of other peculiar reasons, the prime cause of all, but the true faith in one God.

All the rational part of mankind sees too plainly that the other various believers throughout the world conflict with each other's creeds, faiths, bibles, and persuasions, most reasonably, and only from reason, that can be the only chief and decisive cause for this difference. A rational position can only unite all. God has mocked all such in the face of reason and mind.

If the rational religionist could see no possible relief, better should he leave each such persuasion to think its crystal a diamond ; but as he sees but one genuine diamond, and all else he knows certainly are crystals ; it is impossible to mistake the false jewels compared with the genuine, and wrong to be silent under the momentous circumstances of the whole world.

The question is not that each is silently progressing in humble faith, and performing its vows of devotion in peace and general benefit to all mankind ; very far from it, indeed.

Observe the power of the state that is dangerously and insidiously united with most of such persuasions, to crush or deceive the best and purest freedom of mind.

The mind of history recoils at the sight of the iniquity.

See the past power of the clergy, one of whose professed corner stones was humility ; yet, when their absolutism was to obtain mastery, kings were their servants, people their abject menials, who secretly and fearfully submitted to their sway, glad of the honor of permission to crawl or kiss themselves into the august presence of mortals as degraded as themselves, the one in wishing their feet to be kissed, the other doing it. Did any but the most contemptible idolatry and superstition ever have a foothold in this? Such men gave away, under false pretences, temporal as spiritual continents, and submitted the fate of their population to unmitigated cruelties for their false faith, ruling the so called civilized world with relentless tyranny, doing their peculiar gods service in their dispensations.

The petty despotism of confession of faith, arousing the marvel of the vulgar multitude by petty miracles of tunics, liquefying blood, blood flowing from pictures of messiahs, of building sacred fires, of whipping the people about by priests, may serve the petty tools of superstition for their season.

But let the present age atone for all such past blindness, that would be wilful if now adopted with its present lights.

The candid belief in the one Almighty unmistakable, can only reconcile the innumerable conflicts of peculiar faith-parties, and that at once.

What a step in refined enlightened civilization! Such would heal all fundamental world-errors, and give the only elements of perpetual union of one universal brotherhood.

It is thus necessary and obligatory, apart from the paramount duty to the Creator, as false faith engenders false views and practices of superstition, that diffuses the worst morals and results to the whole world.

Citizens of the world, be not of any multitude that does not avow God's innate principles, that can defend society.

The proper social principles, will ever carry the world through in safety, and their right avowal, if rightly adopted and practiced, will redound to the greatest good of all. But proselytes to peculiar faith will affirm that the greatest question with the world is, what shall we do for faith evangelical?

Evangelical refers to angels, and there are none such on earth, if the God of nature, a perfect Creator, uses as he has instituted, conservative principles.

Any faith that is true, must preserve its supreme unity, and we must refer to truthful testimony therefor, to render it respectable and worthy of mind. We must ask to be introduced to reason, the favorite of God, who looks upon it equal to truth passing through mind. Mortals can never decide faith any other way. But never was there a nation yet, but that had some system of religion? Never did any have such system, when analyzed. They all have had a system of superstition, a peculiar faith, that is antagonistic to God and his attributes, his conservative principles, all producing sectarianism, and cutting out one of the noblest results, universal brotherhood, for which defect secret societies are instituted.

The present state of sectarian faith is, that it is cut up into many little sects and factions, many of them continuing to divide and subdivide with rancorous hate and trifling controversies, perpetuating elements of disunion among the social circles, with no confidence in each other, and impressing the whole community with less or least, for themselves.

How long shall mind, the God-endowed, be subject to the injurious fallacies of peculiar faith?

For two centuries, the sword of the Christian was turned so unsuccessfully against the professors of the Mahomedan faith, that believed in the cimeter, that the faith and action of the last triumphed. And the ordeal of battles decided justice to the successful faith against the Christian. And yet after all, neither was orthodox. Cimeters or swords could never solve this universe problem. The beauty of it was that the power of mind arrested or diminished at last the fanaticism of both, running into piracy, butchery and conquest, and stopped the ungodly and irreligious wars. Still both are infallible, if you hear them tell it, and yet both tried on principle, are utterly condemned.

When will stupid peculiar faith ever learn wisdom? She has no reason, no propriety of thought.

She affects in her mad ambition and lust, the empire of the world, and deserts the only true empire, that of mind, that should rightly represent the Creator.

She has tried the sword in vain, to decide world-wide questions that belong to mind. She never will know her incapacity for good.

She has used all the petty tyranny of puny perverted minds, but their base inquisition has not been able to drive man to the confession. Bribery, corruption, all tyranny failed.

This question rests with the world's committee, that will pronounce the facts slowly, but surely.

Already she disavows past crimes, but clings to iniquitous errors of the present day. What have we left to-day, of all peculiar faiths, with all their priestocracy machinery and messiahships, but sects and factions, and fragments that are to be scattered before the luminary of God, mind asserting its rights.

At the present day, the sectaries of the world can make no excuse of not having a better faith.

Those that make such pretence, are anti-God.

Humanity, the true friend of man, scouts at them.

In subjects on religion, we hear too much that is superficial, that does not comprehend the subject.

Feeling or sympathy, custom of forefathers, mere opinions or force of absolutism, except the true principles of mind, cannot decide the question of religion.

It is not a question of faith, but of truth, and to be heard on such testimony as truth forever decides on.

Faith, however peculiar, and peculiarly represented inconsistent with reason, is so with truth, and is surely a falsehood.

What is grace of peculiar faith, but a fallacy?

Grace of peculiar views is defined, favor for sins pardoned. What mortal knows that? What test is there if reason be excluded?

This tale is often told by the thousand and one, who go back to the world in their sins. The whole solution, that which can only be true is, that all minds sin more or less when reaching a state of rational accountability, and that being the only best state that presents the least sins.

This is all the grace that can abound, in the conscience most void of culpable offences, and most abounding in its richest fruits of self-approbation arising from the best consciousness of innocence and good actions.

If sinners entertain notions of grace, it can be only graduated, otherwise from the character of human nature it is self-delusion, if not worse, going into public deception.

What other than this view arises on the analysis of the subject, and what more correct version of it can be adduced?

A mind that is conscious of rectifying itself by the inspirations of mind through God, must feel most satisfied.

That mind may consider in its enthusiasm this the favor, the best state of mind, when conscious of rectitude as old as the pagan Romans so called.

Falling from grace, is founded essentially on the character of mind, that has to fortify itself against all invasions, as it is liable to sinful conflict every moment, in thought, word, and deed, and has to be defended from falling below the level of its own inherent and essential dignity.

Here again is another interminable conflict between churches, some affirming that it is demoralizing to preach the doctrine, while others truly affirm that such doctrine is founded on our nature.

The whole difficulty can be resolved into this position, that mind possessed of the intrinsic elements of religion, is ever dependent on its proper inherent capacity for light and the proper exercise of that light.

Does it not argue weakness in the God of peculiar faith, to have a select few, the elect, and of those in the church, none of the best are presented?

Here is a war, fortunately for the age, only of words, but the feelings are bitter, and reason is in conflict.

We see clearly, now, that the world has been regulated by fanatical pretences among all nations.

All are false to themselves, to withhold their only standard of protection under innumerable errors.

What standard but that of the one Holy Being can regulate mind, and whose lights can shine in every soul, till true teachings expel the darkness.

All things that oppose and affect rational religion, have the elements of disunion and antagonism. Peculiar faithites not only renounce reason, but the God of reason in his purity.

Do not perjury and deceitful action, as hypocrisy, short comings of truth, as well as its abundant violation, and constant sophistry, presented in a state of society cherishing peculiar faith-worship, made the standard of actions and words utterly at variance with reason, necessarily arise?

Now, those in the world not seeking the true and sincere salvation, are liable to all this evil, in or out of the churches.

The good part of mankind are morally exempt, until they persevere knowingly in all such dangerous errors.

With the best of good will and patriotism, as comprehensive as the world, and a phi-lanthrophy as expansive as its duties, they should see the bearing and correction of this important topic.

Can any sectarian faith furnish universal benevolence?

The language that decides the position of the first, decides against that of the last as an impossibility.

Where are the acts, the only proper proof?

The world's history decides conclusively against all sectarian faith, as impracticable and pernicious for the good of all.

Peculiar faith is then not the good faith of the world.

In this matter no assertions on its part, no sophistry can repel these serious facts, as all such are unavailable.

No flippant criticism can supersede the high-toned greatness of soul-speaking wisdom.

Some may feel the highest impulse of enthusiasm, and seek spiritualization, sanctity, and holiness, but how can any sectarian faith rightly impart any such?

Deeds of gifts from spurious proprietors may cause momentary excitements, but they all are worth nothing at all. They must refer directly to the purest object, God, who is in the purest position.

What then remains to be done in the world-waste for man's good and mind's ease, as the thousand-and-one dogmas and creeds about all kinds of peculiar faith, all fall short of satisfying the very wants of the mind, that it begs, implores, and entreats to meet?

Know the God of the Universe and his functions, principles and attributes, through mind, that will rectify itself through his inspirations of wisdom.

Terror is presented the mind, as it is threatened with eternal damnation if it adopt any rational faith no matter how superior, but that faith, that mind, if rational, does not inherently in good faith adopt.

The sectarian, that is the professed follower of peculiar faith without disguise, readily inquires, on whom do you rely? There can be but one correct answer to all such error forever.

On the one wise and all-powerful Author of the universe and all its conservative principles, that from the creation embraced all subjects of preservation, especially man in all his different positions of being from time to eternity, from life to death, all the time of mind's existence.

But all other reliances are impositions on their face, with counterfeit the rankest and titles most defective, for in place of being universal from the creation in time and place, both are limited very long after creation, embracing in reality but a small portion of each, and that on the capital of religion counterfeited.

Out of these evils of antagonism of false faiths, creating civil and general wars that blot so many pages of the world's history, has arisen much universal good by the countervailing influence of all these governing principles.

What supposed evil is there, that God of supreme intelligence and might, does not cause to redound to universal good.

A general superintending Providence is essential and important to the universe, but the especial acts of mind are most essential and important to decide the world's good. What nation or individual ever yet perpetrated crime with impunity? It is the same as the violation of principles, that from their very nature vindicate their Creator.

Impunity stimulates the criminal, that rouses up avengers even on principles.

Felons consider themselves most intelligent by enacting crimes with temporary impunity, when too late they too often find that the path of wisdom was better than the path of cunning, as honesty is the path of safety.

Throughout, all sectarian systems are defective, antagonistic to each other, and all opposed to the universal harmony of creative elements, at war forever with the just relation of things.

No wonder the principles of philosophy and reason were opposed, when science showed all spurious faith revealed by bibles of tradition.

Whoever heard a sermon, but was necessarily made up of sophistry in part, in any faith that did not look to God exclusively and his pure, unsullied attributes?

How much daily sophistry is employed in the world, to uphold corrupt systems?

All such vital questions must be left to reason's mind.

In peculiar faith is centred all the species of idolatry of man and hero-worship, what every such faith this day pays with disgusting misconception of mind's dignity and independence.

The miserable result is, that if cannibalism does devour, or brutal superstition does slay the victim directly on the altar at once, that man-worship of all these grades in antagonism only prolongs the slaughter more indirectly, and slays when let loose in mad fury and ambition with bloody fanaticism, her millions in wars, miscalled holy, inquisitions, crush of minds and tyranny over freedom of conscience.

Usurpation of peculiar faith is seen in the world's injury for orthodoxy of power, whereas God alone decides at his tribunal, who is worthy.

False faith, when in power, that it always usurps over reason, which she will not yield to, assumes the spoils of the earth for its possession, directly or indirectly, and returns the poisoned cup to the lips of those whose hands transacted for its temporal promotion. Where is an exception?

What a concentration of iniquity, corruption, and disgusting cruelty, in the papacy, to give away unknown countries of the world, though peopled, if those inhabitants did not possess the Christian faith?

Where did this complication of felonious crime end?

What an amount of perfidy to the nations of the world, to give dispensation for the most licentious tyranny, as far as physical and mental weakness permitted?

Where did the sale of indulgences, perquisites of state powers, licenses for crimes, and iniquity, end?

What must be the pitiful condition of those hacks' minds, with degraded spirit, that have to uphold with party sophistry all this, as religion?

If this be religion, God help the world out of the quagmire.

What generous spirit does not pity the poor, ignorant wretches, that have to do their part, for their bread?

But is there a menial so pauperized, that would not scorn such, if possessed of the right views?

Where is the spirit of patriotism in the mind of man, that will not scorn to see his country so prostituted?

What can prevent all the secret vices, degraded crimes, assassinations, corruptions of female chastity, perjury, and all such consequences of prostituted moral power, that should forever take precedence over all other, in the right performance of indispensable duty?

The moral power of the world must be kept sacred. Perish at once, and forever, all peculiar faiths before it.

The insincerity of belief must characterize the public mind. How can it escape such iniquitous contamination?

All false faiths being insufficient to arouse the world's unity, or to command its proper respect, it is the duty of patriotism, and philanthropy, an enlarged duty, that man owes his fellow-citizens of the globe, to stop or arrest the malign influence, if nothing else was elicited thereby, of the spirit of insincerity, that mars, blots and blurs the purity and excellence of mind, ever kept thereby in the most degrading feudal vandalism and vassalage, indecorous for reason.

We should get rid of a reckless faith, inconsistent with reason, and productive of the worst consequences, from the fell spirit of insincerity of belief.

Freemen owe to themselves this justice, to see that an amendment is effected in proper time, way, and spirit. Benevolence, enlarged and liberal, that honors home and all its virtues, in all the pleasures of duty, and the fruition of affectionate regard for household benefits, and then radiates from home the happy sum of its wise operations to the circumference of this world, compels the full allowance for mortal's frailties and weakness, and therefore premises their best correction.

Bigotry is a horrible incident in the character of man, and impeaches, as it is not an attribute of a mind elightened by true faith, that is rational religion, the character of the faith, and decides its blighting curse on the mind darkened by it, and all the circle affected thereby, to the latest malign influence.

What justice or truth is there, in the circle of bigotry? But the bible faith, that is the supreme idea!

What faith can there be in the whole universe, the Supreme particularly, no matter how peculiar, that is not subject to the proper investigation of reason and truth, with their best aids, analysis and analogy? If any faith could be supreme over these, then that faith is supreme over God, assuredly.

But we must take the Trinity. What is peculiar in that?

Three Beings, but all in one! What language is that?

Three beings distinct in location at times, and all one!

Is language understood right? Is the foulest sophistry to dethrone rational mind?

All questions are addressed to mind and its understanding, and must be answered by the understanding, which is reason. Then no understanding that is honest can affirm to this absurdity or monster, neither on mathematical principles, a part of the conservatism that governs the universe, nor by the language of mind.

Whose mind is so peculiarly constituted as to receive this rightly?

We are in the thorny and stormy paths of life, a direct way is to surmount its various difficulties, and to do this, mind with its completest understanding and wisdom is the agent, and reason the pilot that directs.

If we forsake these, our position is below the slave's—our mind vassal.

The followers of peculiar faiths are mistrusted in foreign lands, while if they were true, they had been universal. The followers of Judaism are mistrusted in most countries where prevail the Christian or Mahomedan faiths, though all these have referred to Judaism originating theirs. As there is a conflict of feeling and interest not only among all those, but among their seceders, and the world full of peculiar faiths, that assail and restrict each other in their privileges, all are necessarily hostile more or less. This is not religion, but the curse of peculiar faith. Man is in this, not God.

The sooner they all get out of these conflicting faiths, they will become united in one brotherhood and not before. Such advocates have to learn what religion is. They will have to abjure and unlearn all that they profess peculiarly, and the sooner done the better for the parties and the whole world.

There is no need to have had the Nestors sadly butchered, nor should there be any enmity however laid up for future miserable ambition in Saladin's country. All will forget the deplorable evils of the past of peculiar faiths, in the blessings of monotheism.

Times have their peculiar vices, and in ancient feudal times, men did look up to civil and military chieftains almost universally, and dearly did they. Noble mind was betrayed. It was the iron law of custom from apparent not inherent weakness, not of the helpless orphan who is now protected by the law of mind, but of the stalwart giant man that knew not his own mighty concealed strength, because he knew not the gift of his mind.

The partially civilized state of the world had him bound, when might oppressed right.

Self-government had advanced, mind has improved its powers, but has been misled in the quicksands of peculiar faith, that is deplorably and obstinately behind the advance of science, arts, civilization and commercial advantages of the world. Let intellectual truth mirror all that is visible for mind's correction.

While mind is advancing, the mystic notions and follies of peculiar faith are counting her beads and preserving her relics, contending for rites, forms and ceremonies, excrescences of a decayed mass, that belonged to times when millions of warring Christians contended against millions of Mahomedans for centuries, for seeming trifles, a spot of earth not worth a pauper's notice till his death; all to gratify the church's ambition, avarice, papal hierarchy, craftship ostensibly, as well for personal fame and the world's conquest.

No wonder the hostility and the enduring hate between the Mahomedan and the Christian, the best evidence of the fallacy and ignominy of both faiths.

How can they compare, with that which belonged to mind? They cannot be maintained in reason.

No wonder the Hindoos hate Mahomedans and Christians. No wonder the hate of the whole world of peculiar faiths. Which of any such would not tyrannize over the world, if not prevented?

What a barrier is mind, the enlightened mind of science and philosophy! These aid the supreme religious principle, the mighty moral force that truly represents the wishes and purposes of the Almighty.

Do not all count the profits of their professed faith?

In opening the door to peculiar faith resting on miracles, prophecies, mysteries and enigmas, the world is subject in process of time to an everlasting flood of similar faiths and traditions, that are only limited by the state of mind, whose ignorance and corruption alone originated them.

Various have been the attempts in all systems modified by the circumstances of mind's light for ever.

Mind alone guards its own holy citadel from superstition, but it has to be most rational to do that most successfully.

Mind is constituted for religion that can be counterfeited on the ignobly ignorant, only in part, however, as deeds tell.

It has been its history to suffer thus from its incapacity to distinguish the genuine from the spurious.

The adherents of true faith are modest and tolerant for truth, but those advocating the spurious are brazen and impudent tyrants of the world.

Under this banner, befouled with blood, all pretences are advanced, all clamorous for professions, that should be in perpetual abeyance to actions the best prayers.

The five grand divisions of the world are beset with them.

Among the latest, the Mormons recently arose, assuming to do so, on the miracles of the panacea faith, of visions, of miraculous gifts, and prophecies.

But what man can possibly believe them, unless incited by delusion of worldly feelings?

Certainly, neither the wise nor the honest, can be placed in this category.

Thousands, would not all of them, without hesitation, establish wonderful or miraculous belief about the death and resurrection of their prophets, by direct testimony, equal to any others' about miracles? Would they not forswear and perjure themselves for their peculiar faith? But the materials of mind are needed.

In process of time in future ages, who can affirm that this peculiar faith will not supersede others, especially if the sword be successfully wielded by the faithful followers of some fanatical warrior? Is not this the world's history of all such faith? Peculiar faith has no reason or truth.

Has peculiar faith any peculiar limits to her ambition, short of the complete vassalage of mind throughout the world?

How truly dangerous as demoralizing, to help keep up the bibles of peculiar faith. Are not you, citizen, somewhat culpable, for a part of the sum of all the false faiths of the world, and their horrid deleterious consequences. The veto of proper, sound, honest sense is invoked.

The infatuated will not listen to the voice of mind, but may fall by conflict with other peculiar faiths.

The faith of the creed may be carried out to the broadest extent of absolute faith, and tyrannize socially and religiously over the world.

Peculiar faith has no limit to its ambition.

Its days are limited by the force of science and cultivated mind. Where do you hear of faith, the loudest?

In the haunts of ignorance, and the wilds of error, where people have no schoolhouses, and cannot direct you the plain way of the country, much less even the analysis of mind.

The days of miracles are past, because the days of deplorable ignorance are past, one of the many proofs of the improvement of the age, that is the only reason to meet the views of contracted minds, while liberal minds feel as confident as in their existence, that no miracles ever existed, as miracles prove imbecility of ignorant minds, that wonder or admire in every sense whatever but the right one, at the ordinary natural phenomena of the God of nature.

Liberal minds truly see that the truly great deeds, the nearest to miracles, are the right creation, sublimely organized, and its regulated subsequent actions to endure for ever.

The only true sublime standards for admiration, belong to the Great Supreme, and their functions invoke and challenge, as they should, the highest adoration of the whole world in his unity.

Solve all the secrets of nature, then mysteries and miracles cease in the true acceptation of reason.

Where can we find any tyranny more awful than the tortures of body to operate on mind and conscience, in behalf of faith? What is that faith worth, but the worst engine of cruelty and fanaticism?

How careful then should all good citizens be in arousing up the fierce spirit of sectarian creeds, never to be sincerely and patriotically realized in a free country.

No true rational religion, but dark fanatical superstition, ever could arouse so many wars between sects of different leaders.

No one adopting the correct tenets of God-religion can fall out; it is impossible, as unity is union and agreement. God is never inconsistent. Man libels God, but is self-impeached if he dare the libel of such assertion.

What has peculiar faith ever yet done among the Indians of the world? The millions of Asia? The whole world bewails its sight, by blood and treasure untold and countless, sacrificed to the gods of its idolatry.

Such faith in our own America must have been shamed by the faith of the red men of the forest, who believe in the Great Spirit. Before the pretences of peculiar faith are urged, let the rights of rational mind be audited.

Not able to sustain themselves on the only foundation that the Creator ever gave to honest minds—reason—the advocates of the first turn to weak mind's folly and the slave's creed, and tell us in this century about a stupid and senseless non-entity of faith, that does not admit of analysis! Whenever the test and ordeal of reason are skulked by any minds, it is proof most positive that the position is not honest, or the intellect is miserably stupid.

Just like the charlatan doctor, who stupidly claims all medical practice for his ignorant and impostor tribe, and leaves unfilled a circle of most urgent and necessitous claims, and that too by the only rightful claimants, the sufferers in the first access of disease—the beneficiaries by their own scientific-directed exertion in points, that this pitiful herd never can see or correct.

Now, the majority of mankind is not in the pale of any made faith, while all minds bow down from innate principles, instilled for the wisest and noblest of purposes of creation, and necessarily to be filled.

All peculiar faiths are generally in the minority of the world.

One of the differences between peculiar and rational true faith is, that the first requires the world to look after her interest, whilst the other refers to the interest of God all the time.

Does peculiar faith depend on intrinsic virtues, or has she not for her life-time ever sought all the protection of brute force?

Never say, if you admit a polytheism, more than one God, that your age is better than the Greeks, for you have four gods, a trinity and an evil genius—they only had more. Who of you are better off? As to the improvements of the age, they belong to mind, which your faith discards.

It is wise that the whole world should understand its position, and mature its views—define by language what it affects to say.

But why not conform to the world's ways, and not encounter the antagonism of these peculiar faiths, but let them all ferment and work their own purification?

It is the supreme duty of good citizens to act well their part, as the highest specimen of rational religion, and counteract all false faith as base superstition and man-worship.

Can intelligent freemen cower to man-worship, and thus participate in the degraded blasphemy?

A due reverence of Deity cannot permit us, without sinister motives or influence, to suppose that his perfect attributes needed a vicegerent in this or any part of his universe; his omniscience must have foreseen and his omnipotence anticipated. All such is the vagary of peculiar faith.

There has been shed the blood of millions from false faith, that aroused the most damnable passions of human nature, and caused ambition and avarice to tyrannize over the human mind the worst of feudal despotism, exciting the worst penalties of the feelings here, and inflicting most poignant anticipations of a horrid future, at least in falling short of blissful rewards.

What picture is more horrid than this, philosopher?

No wonder the dealer in peculiar faith should avoid philosophy to decide on its merits; truth courts the light. What can wipe away these stains of peculiar faith, existent for so many ages? Nothing but its entire extinction. Of what sect or creed is your faith? The orthodox. Now we hear you. What is the orthodox? The right thinking.

If language mean any thing, orthodox must be the rational. What does the rational invoke to suppress all these difficulties but mind and reason, most comprehensively and philosophically? Orthodox can only be rational, and that impeaches peculiar faith forever.

If our belief be as good as God can make it, who can make it any better? What does that teach but a right use of a rightly educated mind? That is infallible orthodoxy.

The position of peculiar antagonism is from peculiar faith. Rational orthodoxy is legitimate, and treats antagonism with contempt.

Peculiar faith looks to messiahships, to which perverted tradition pretends. Can this be right?

She has four gods or more, and many demi-gods. As to polytheism, her creed is an abomination before the Great First Cause. Instead of her hideous peculiar favors, superior wisdom is shown by God in giving light, more or less, to all, in the beauty of simplicity and the strength of safety, if mind act as mind should before God.

Now where, mortal, would have been thy blessings had God been a peculiar god, giving peculiar favors? All greatness and goodness would have been in abeyance to contingency. The god of polytheism never could have been a creator; that is certain.

Trammel neither mind with peculiar notions nor God with peculiar libels. Peculiarity bespeaks the rankest absurdity, the most impotent imbecility.

Do ye of peculiar faith believe that all others of their peculiar faith will be saved, after worshipping God Almighty to the best of their lights of that faith?

Your answer, affirmative or negative, condemns you all.

If you say that they cannot be saved on account of that faith, then you are involved in that category, for no peculiar faith can be orthodox, infallible, honest, or true.

What saves you? Because you are Christian, Mahomedan, Brahmin, Mormon, Bhuddist, or Pagan?

Which of these, or any analogous peculiar faith, is orthodox? Apply the right and only truthful test, not peculiar faith opinion. Honest rational truth condemns all for ever.

Do you, or any of these, represent rational religion? If not, then none are orthodox, none correct.

Time was when God took the will for the deed, but this cannot now apply to those knowing better.

Peculiar faith winds itself up every way in innumerable times by its constant sophistry, untruth, absurdities, contradictions without end, its predestinations without justice, &c., in its bible of tradition.

Are not its professors of well raised character ashamed of all such?

With what impudent assurance and reckless effrontery can they knowingly face their God, who provided for all generations of mind prior to all messiahships.

If God did it as he has always surely done, and will forever, by what untruth will they persist in undoing his work, that condemns forever all arbitrary dynasties of messiahs, invented in books?

Is the untruth any more sacred in a book than in the mouth of men? Is it any more consequential because these legend-books add the crime of curses on mind for refusing them as false, and seeking the solemn truth elsewhere?

All this needs reformation; but no important reformation will do short of conservative revolution.

The god of peculiar faith is not the God of reason; that is clear.

Reason does not know any other than rational religion. She cannot know peculiar faith before God and man, as there can be no such religious faith.

All such is the faith of superstition.

The light of the age requires rational religion, as the only right and just religion of the universe.

If there be any other faith, it is unsound, and has unsound basis.

Whatever is deficient is erroneous. All peculiar faith is deficient, and must therefore be ruled out.

All sectarian creeds rest on the genius of some mortal, are carried out by the vassalage of his followers, who submit to his pretensions, that however connected to custom, must be finally all absorbed by general principles.

What myriads of immortal souls have not sought a faith worthy of them and their Immortal Creator for the best of a life-time, without attaining anything at all of all peculiar faiths known to them, or only the veriest trash, unworthy of a serious thought?

They have been wofully deceived as far as the preacher's statements went, as they could never attain anything worthy of God.

Such in the sincerest consciousness of the soul's dignity have had to conclude that God alone is the giver of every good, the author of all that is good, that elicits good out of apparent evil, by his principles that vindicate themselves, or right evil consequences.

But some may affect to think, that the system of peculiar creed had best be carried out in this wicked world, to keep the people rightly to the point, else there would be no living for most, therefore the idea of a hell, with all its potent machinery, must be held up in especial reserve. This is the worst of bad doctrine.

Man is a rational being and must believe in rational principles, therefore must have rational religion and nothing less, consequently must be truthful, honest, liberal, just, and ever seek to exercise the best construction of sound, honest, proper sense.

The rational being must certainly reflect on his obligation, though the preachers or expounders of gospel doctrines acknowledge this, yet when their peculiar faith is touched, they fly off this only position that justifies all professions of faith.

Now this clearly proves, that most men do not know their own minds about religion.

On this principle all the advocates, priests, and preachers, are entirely wound up and silenced.

All people of all peculiar faith do not know what they do believe in, and if they run out their doctrines they will find them and their bibles clash in their peculiarities from which particular sects arise, thus no peculiar faith can stand before God and his works, the highest evidence of things not seen, and the only material substance of things hoped for.

Despite of all peculiar systems of faith, false positions and gods, the world advances in improvement, thanks to the superintendence of a Providence universal, not peculiar.

All this is recognised by rational religion, that feels bound for the greatest amount of good on principles that must be advanced and taught, to save the majority of the world from gross errors and their penalties.

Where would be the conservative state of mind of mankind in general, if it had universally to depend on the belief, the faith of any one tradition? Ruined at once and forever. Be grateful that you have a God of the universe to adore, not several peculiar gods to contemn.

Peculiar faith is nowhere, religion is everywhere, and represents truly an Omnipresent God.

How vain is the effort to fix on creeds, that do not comprehend the subject of religion vast as the universe.

There can be no safe platform, on other than rational basis.

Creeds short of full comprehension, result in vain pretences.

The whole matter returns to duty and that, mind teaches as the most useful learning, the best to live and die by.

The small circle of eminent and conscientious preachers can estimate this, as an undeniable principle.

What delusions, terrible indeed, has fancy painted by her creation and fiction of hell, that premises predestination, and excludes responsibility!

Everything has to be reduced to the standard of reason in the universe, else Universalism would give us all kinds of mixed spirits in the holy abode of Deity, in the same company, as if God was not just to the best aspirations of the purest who could not associate rightly with all kinds of characters.

Universalism, when rational, is a part of rational religion, and will graduate penalties as rewards proportionately to individual merits. Purification will prepare all for final abodes of purity.

Wherever peculiar faith stands, sophistry upholds her, and wherever sophistry is studied, she misleads, and prevents all that fly from truth reaching substantial attainments.

Where fancy and ingenuity are studied for cunning, good sense is needed. Individuals, personally, may be respected, how much soever they may be deluded by peculiar faith; but intelligent freemen must condemn palpable errors, of all doctrines.

What wise mind will not perceive the false security under faith, when omnipotent reason is not left free to combat it?

All intelligent minds see that reason is proscribed by the whole clan of priestocracy, who have not the very thing they affect to respect—a liberal soul. Where is the end to all the stupid ignorance of peculiar faith? Among its monomaniacal notions, is the destruction of this world.

If its peculiar God, that made this the principal sphere, and the rest for its lights, was the God of our creation, then it would speedily perish; but the God of the universe made it.

How, then, can this world be destroyed? Libels will not affect its perpetuity. The question will be as wisely put, as to the destruction of the universe, therefore why not ask if the universe will not be destroyed? Can a wise mind believe such nonsense? This position of destruction is allied and identified with other fictions of world-governors, alias world-botchers. It may be put in the same category with hell, purgatory, devils, spirits, ghosts, witches, and other characters, communing with mortals as messenger angels. The sooner we get rid of all this abominable nonsense of mythology, the better.

It is worse than vulgar, it is demoralizing, to maintain all this machinery of superstition. All the worlds of such fictions will of course perish, with all their peculiar faith. Mind is slave enough, by self-delusion of ignorance, to be degraded by all the errors of false faiths, and have parts of the world tortured by fear, exciting by even present-day false prophecies of its destruction.

This is an age of science, and her legitimate functions, as God's noble inspiration of mind should be credited.

This, and many other follies are impiously kept up, to uphold past errors of ignorant writers.

Philosophy would get the better of superstition, if mind would do its duty, and lay aside the pretence of sophistry for the substance of truth. An enlightened philosophy and astronomy would tell us, that the earth could not be wholly covered by water at the same time.

There is a certain level of water at present; where, then, could there be water to deluge the world from the water-level to the extreme height of mountains?

All must see the absurdity of a universal deluge, if they see at all, or can reason at all, on the rotundity of the earth. To suppose it possible, we must take the ignorance of the ancients, who supposed it one vast plane. Of course this proves it a false position, for the rotundity of the globe, with a little variation, is well established. Bigot sophists will pretend that now the destruction of the earth is to be made by water or fire. We have considered the impossibility of the first, as the inherent earthly character cannot permit water to affect a universal deluge.

Water would have to come from some other sphere, but God's beautiful harmony of order does not permit that sphere to be so accommodating, as that would leave it in a state of injury most essential.

It is a wonder if those old writers ever appreciated God as the author, much less the providence of the universe. They could never have had a right conception of such God. Their god was a little god, of one world, and that the earth; and that earth belittled, as a plane, with the winds at the four corners. This god had heavens above, but no where else, when the bible of tradition was written; of course this peculiar god is the god of a hemisphere of heavens, for the sun moved round the earth to light it!

The God of the universe was thus dwarfed to the god of a hemisphere of heavens, and yet those who do know better, avow this infamous book to be right.

A worse libel never was conceived of God, except to rival him with the god of evil.

The mere school-boy of reason, would never have conseerated such a god, while his first thought could not miss the God of the universe under the lights of mind matured in philosophical astronomy.

The water may encroach on land, and land on water. but there can be no universal deluge under the present form of this spherical or spheroidal globe.

But as the ancients thought it flat, the bible-bigots would swear their thoughts were right, because the book says the deluge was universal, by waters on the whole earth. Water might easily, then it was thought, deluge a plane. But the spheroidal figure of the earth disproves then the bible, in the essential nature of Providence, who demonstrates himself the creative and preservative faculty. But after thousands of years of mind-torture about deluges, the fire is now to consume the earth, the botches think. Is this stable earth never to rest from the reckless nonsense of superstition? Must all its pleasures, it hopes and treasures, be all sacrificed to its insatiate appetite? Is that to devour by its jugglery, all that is fair of mind? All that is noble, of God the Creator?

Yet matter cannot be annihilated. nor fly out of the attraction of gravitation, one of mighty conservative principles. Did all the ignorant, stupid priestocracy, ever think of all this, once?

Why then should it be vitiated by the God that created it. Fire has constant sweep in volcanoes, that throw out melted lava, &c., and yet we have no consumption.

Who can say after seeing the action of fire in the earth solidifying and rendering it more compact, after driving off the water or moisture, that the earth can be consumed by fire in connection with its own oxygen? On what principle can the eternal fire of earth find existence without oxygen, the supporter of combustion, or why if existent at earth's creation, has it not already shown its action thus supported?

Shall man in his utter ignorance, add disgraceful error, and continue to libel God for his noblest principles of conservation, the very internal means so dreaded?

Let the ignorant hide their peculiar faith before man, nor dare vulgar libels before God.

Independent of all this, where is the balance equipoise of the earth, in regard to the rest of our solar system, and where are the conservative principles of the universe to be affected, when its equipoise is affected by derangement of solar systems?

But did these petty priests ever know, that a single world was in existence, but this earth?

And if this derangement take place in the physical, what must be the chaos in the moral universe, if its ruler only relax for the idle dreams of whimsical botches?

Who is worthy to uphold the sceptre of his Almighty hand, that commands the organs of light, before whom, darkness cannot dwell?

Monotheism could not exhaust this endless theme.

How unwise is the sectarian feeling of peculiar faith towards all sects not its own, in claiming to be orthodox or infallible, a position perfectly unattainable by it! Sectarianism on this special plea alone, excludes the idea of religion, and destroys all principle. But peculiar systems of faith engender hypocrisy, deceit and perjury, most assuredly, among too many of its votaries.

All its hierarchy and prelacy tend to corruption, by speculation, one of the worst of temptations, and individuals are only exempt therefrom by just inspirations of inherent elements of rational religion, that will display signally its noble spirit, unless too deeply silenced by complete treachery to conscience.

Where there is no chieftainship in peculiar faith speculation, there can be no serfdom for collusion and oppression in any form with state.

Let then mind in its purity extricate itself from vassalage to such things, that may otherwise govern it.

If peculiar faiths cannot respect each other, how can rational religion, which they have usurped respect them?

The Christian, Bhuddist, Mahomedan, Brahmin, Mormon and Pagan faith, is all peculiar, and all in this category.

Their own sects, of the same peculiar faith, hate, and have warred with each other, time after time, to the horror and ruin of the world, and their utter disgrace.

How long will all this superstition involve mankind in its difficulties and troubles, its permanent contests and conflicts?

Fatal wars, for hundreds of years, have prevailed for these faiths.

How many continental wars of the world have been surely aroused on the score of fanaticism and bigotry?

How much of the noblest, general good feeling, has been sacrificed the world over?

We have recently seen hierarchal absolutism affecting conservatism by the sword and bayonet, when popular conservation, governmental and religious, rest on principles, that peacefully vindicate themselves.

Shall force and tyranny overwhelm man's reason for ever on this account, that ought to bring eternal blessings instead of curses?

Better let all the forms of peculiar faith die the death of the felon, than have mankind cursed and crushed in this form.

What a pity it is, that superstition, under so many promising forms, should still affect man, by reason of those interested in upholding it for profits; that all chief actors in the faith-drama have alienated, usurped, and monopolized the proper rights due to the pure Deity alone.

Hierarchy or priestcraftship has existed more or less in all its craftiness and absolutism, in all ages of man known to us, in all the vile forms of superstition, terrible by its effusion of the blood of human victims, or disgusting by the sacrifice of animals, rapacious for spoils, and ferocious for murder.

Her tyranny, that malign passions could arouse, has enslaved and degraded the human mind under the falsest pretences, and the most assuming disguises.

Her impiety all over the world, whether Roman, Greek or Protestant, Christian or Bhuddist, Mahomedan or Brahmin, Judaism, Mormonism or Paganism, that dares assail the immaculate purity and attributes of Deity, and ignorantly or insidiously assumes doctrines to libel his government of the universe, should be indignantly rebuked and silenced before rational religion, that has been so vilely imposed upon.

Vile impostors all, of any peculiar faith, that pretend to this degraded impiety of libeling God.

Those who cannot analyze thoughts, as few of the world know what original thought is, or where it leads, much less what it comprehends, are not to be condemned as the conscience-hardened offenders, in this offensive position of peculiar faith.

But all are to be condemned if they will not trouble themselves to discover and retract the error of their ways. Enough is now before the world for rational mind to appreciate rational religion.

Where peculiar faith dwells, there is little reason, and where there is little rational religion, there is little honesty in the world. The social frame-work of the world needs the best regeneration of rationality.

What surety has the world on this basis from disturbance?

If disturbed by force, neither principle nor anything else, can reinstate its equilibrium. It must be revolutionized for the world to get right.

Peculiar faith leads to inextricable difficulties, duly estimated in the empire of reason.

In the empire of peculiar faith, the idea is that power domineers in its day, and reciprocity of the favor is right.

Infallibility belongs to her every claimant, but to none in fact, as religion cannot be seen for peculiar faith of the Hindoo, Pagan, the Mussulman, the Juggernaut, and all others who dispute the palm on their basis.

We are infallible but you are wrong, is said by nations. So say the Protestants and Romanists to each other.

The only millenium will be the union of all in one faith, through the God of mind.

Mind will conduct that affair better than armies, for it is God's decree.

Men will be thus, and never otherwise, united.

Universal faith depends on universal reason, and must be in a Being not mistakable, in whom all feel concerned, and this exalted faith will be for all a precedent.

We should have all nearest right in most matters at once, on that equitable and indispensable basis.

There is always the utmost necessity of strict integrity of honest and truthful religion, that can promote proper compliance with all the relations of life.

This is the base of a sound public opinion that should correct the world, as the best of all tribunals.

But piety is shocked if anything is advanced against peculiar faith! That is all the affectation of hypocrisy. Bigots of peculiar faith obstinately refuse the tuition of reason.

We advance nothing but the true piety and morality of God's rational institutions, for the good not only of our fellow citizens but of mankind. We demand that justice be done the subject, and that you prove all your positions, if you dissent. All must see eventually what deplorable injury all the systems of peculiar faith produce, but for God's light of mind that enlighteneth all the rational part of mankind.

As habit of thought is by education, surely that cannot be right by sectarian faith.

The different sects of faith-superstition contend all of them most passionately about creeds, that they if wise would care less about than for the power to be secured.

What profit can false faiths and messiahs do the world? All the sectarian views of all the creeds can never establish the proper principles of religion—never.

Their disagreement at once shows this the general error.

Any one that is trammeled in absolute rights by customs obsolete by false position, serving and watching the signs of the times, is no man, certainly no American.

Too many are misled by the false pretences of others, their crude opinions, designs and vicious leadings.

Such are some of the serious humbugs of the world. It takes proper independence of mind, to be obtained by a suitable education of science, free and unbiased by errors and unfettered by profits and emoluments to resist them.

How can you reconcile sectarians on their basis, that has no foundation of science and philosophy, the hands of the eternal God?

What wise and good citizen will feel an iota for peculiar faith, when the paramount question of mind's freedom is awaiting solution?

What is peculiar or church faith worth before the august tribunal of mind?

Peculiar faith relies on sophistry, and always comes short of God.

Mind may analyze this position in all its common treasury, and must, if sound, elicit this fact, but the human mind is so sophisticated now by peculiar faith that the truth cannot be got at it readily! and where does such faith throw the responsibility? Before the rightful tribunal of God.

Have its followers ever reached the dignity of faith in a God supreme, that rules the universe?

Have they ever mastered the greatest of wisdom, in the powers of analysis, or senselessly followed others? Peculiar faith cannot possibly be religion, but must be a great humbug where it is not a known treachery. Religion rests on eternal principles of an eternal God, confiding in no mortal or messiah individuality.

Sectarianism is the exponent of peculiar faith; that proves the hate of sects and denies the love that has been advanced as proof of religious feeling.

Be done with this murderous faith, that has such pretences as to the expulsion of the demoniacal possession, and give priestocracy the command over mind in its most delicate relations: that regards their altar as the place or part of the machinery for the mind, as important for conversion.

We object against the propagation and colonization of any doctrines of peculiar faith, of any church apologist of absolutism that spares neither age nor sex and renders partisans pensioners.

When peculiar faith rails at science and philosophy, it is a certainty that it has superseded them by sophistry.

Falsehood or sophistry is the gangrene of all society. What is worse? It is the agent of absolutism in its worst state.

Under cover of sophistry and casuistry, myriads are lost or rendered miserable about trifles of faith, that supersedes all the noblest traits and essence of rational religion.

Peculiar faith, as all church faith is, the counterfeit of rational religion, as messiahs, are the counterfeits of the God of the universe.

How difficult is it to remove the prejudices of bigotry. Descartes removed the canopy of the upper firmament, and disclosed to the vulgar gaze, the universe.

Thus it is that science and philosophy alone can remove bigotry, that keeps company with dotardism.

We have to learn their teaching in the various good schools of the world, and profit by all that is valuable.

All this time there is open or latent marked hostility of sects of peculiar faith, the under current of feeling being most malignant, only kept back by mind.

Can such rest on fundamental principles of right and justice in religion, that has no such mind-mark of sect at all, that knows no sect, no peculiarity in this world? If any faith has sect it proves to be the counterfeit, the spurious mark of religion.

However races differ in color, mind and body, they are all from God, who has no distinction of persons, but as distinguished on principles of honest and truthful deeds of life.

It is the mark that false faith for ever creates, that sect shall be against sect.

All over the world, race, kith and kindred differ about this thing of faith, that cannot be peculiar but universal from God.

They differ in non-essentials, in institutions of worship, of doctrine, whether of the week or the sabbath, because that may cause sectarianism which is the negative of rational religion, therefore a curse and an evil.

If language have its legitimate meaning that all candid minds must give it, then we have an odious system of polytheism in the world, and if the plurality of gods was confined to the invisible world, then all would be less objectionable, but an unholy alliance of man in all the shapes of power that self-interest could create, and self-delusion of the multitude would permit, has fastened its fangs upon the worthiest traits of society, and is perpetrating its odious and insidious poison in every breath.

An odious abstraction of just rights has perpetrated the inception, that misleads mind from giving due credit for its religion to God the governor of the universe.

It is the thing itself, not its name, that offends.

Man for his false systems of peculiar faith, must do rank injustice.

With sectarians God does all—that is of principle. What is wrong is theirs. Yet they acknowledge predestinarians as the most rigid are, that mind must work, and that the messiah works!

What absurd contradictions, to disorganize the foundation pillar, accountability, that God has instituted for the good of all, else he never made free agency. But peculiar faith then is an usurper and pirate, if it dare to usurp truth and honesty. But peculiar faith only asks to make her impression on mind's credulity. It is her function of prostitution; and she uses her capital.

Bigotry is united with peculiar faith; both are degrading.

What is bigotry but the obstinate adherence to peculiar faith and superstition. Rational minds will correct their own errors.

We are compelled, as rational beings, to have the reason of truth, instead of the sophistry of superstitious faith, that stretches conscience beyond all probabilities and reason. What can faith do? What has it ever done worthy of mind, independent of reason and truth, with the human mind?

We ask for manly and suitable proof, that rationality accepts.

Is it not the perquisite of office and profit that stretches faith? Peculiar faith doctrine is the world-iniquity and curse.

What peculiar faith having union of church and state from the time of the old soothsayers, who had to be consulted necessarily if they were to be believed, to the present date, ever benefited the world?

But who can appreciate the curses therefrom arising?

What do we need of peculiar faith for "The high bishop to have a procession, the people falling upon their faces and bowing down to a man?" Blasphemy most intolerable; mind-vassalage most disgraceful.

Can any mind of worth, dignity, and freedom possibly perceive any necessity for all this?

What shall compensate for all this manly sacrifice? Gorgeous shows, paintings, and churches towering in the air; but mind, noble representative of Deity, grovelling in the dust of iniquity and ignorance!

Do all the bribes of such prostitution compensate for the vices and degradation.

The first act of all peculiar faiths, that produce necessarily false systems, is to defraud the Almighty Creator of his attributes, reducing him to a demi-god, or partial, peculiar god, divested of his intrinsic powers for the degraded vicegerentships of man-power, usurped most blasphemously.

The second act, of course, can be nothing less than to cheat mind of its attributes, divest it of its innate and intrinsic powers, deny their legitimate potency, and basely substitute man's pretences, and mock necessary aids, that are detrimental to the whole family of interests, and the whole human family.

What a prostitution of mind's virtues and talents, on trash! What an outrage upon the rights of the Creator and his universe.

He that is hypocrite to God must be hostile to man's good.

The deplorable consequence tells on mind, kept back thousands of years from its true greatness, subject to all the lacerations of miserable misrule, and most wicked policies of tyranny; and made almost to crouch even in the days of its regeneration, and of its improving appreciation.

Never can peculiar faith, that grew out of superstition, arise in minds not constituted therefor: then must not this position and constitution yield to an honest faith? Sectarianism cannot stand; it must fall.

What is the cause if you dissent one iota, that you do not address children, next to infants and savages, about religion?

Because their reason is not matured ripe enough for suitable fruit; the fruit and the attempt would be green indeed. The soil, the mind, must be prepared for the seed. But you treat the matured mind like that of infants, and deny it its freest legitimate exercise.

Say what pretenders, dolts and charlatans can, still the world is governed by reason, graduated to the state of mind's capacity for its reception.

All their present systems of faith are those of peculiar notions, and are like those of usurpers in medicine, insufficient. They claim to think and act for rational mind and religion. What audacious infamy and felony.

They cannot begin to meet the wants of mind of mankind; but their advocates wish to monopolize and raise up antagonistic powers to any principle that seeks to present rational impressions.

What a spirit, that seeks to crush the best value of mind itself, the very matter in question about its light and happiness.

If any previous system had been discovered, commanding all the principles of religion, and their head, short of God, was the embodiment, then the disciples might appropriate the world; but up to the present time all claims to supreme power are an imposition. The question is therefore open alone to God the Creator, and his creatures.

What claims to the discovery of a new religion, are valid? None. What claims to that of a new creation, are worthy of notice? None. What claims are there any way? None but those of an impostor. All such are false.

It must be admitted that some errors may occasionally be made by the fewest, but that is the veriest trifle to the thousand ills irremediable otherwise.

Investigation of Romanism discloses inquisitions of horrid deeds, dark and bloody murders of many of the human family, male and female. For what? Can any at the tribunal of mind, answer for what? Religion that is rational and spiritual, asks for what?

The worship of several countries under that peculiar faith, show most superstitious modes of worship of the saints, and invocation to images, prayers for the dead, celibacies, vows, sacraments, public prayer, the scriptures, written by and for the priestocracy, to command their dupes, the people, the only rule of action by faith, elaborated by the peculiar views of absolutism, myriads of fanatical miracles and such creeds. These are not fit for animals, much less rational mind.

Art, intrigue and accident, supply peculiar faith, that of course, does not depend on truth.

It had been a wonder that peculiar faith had not corrupted the world much worse, but for the existence of a God who rules creation.

Then the existence of the God of nature, prevents the existence of any miracles.

Peculiar faith is governed in its ideas of right and wrong, by the course of the messiah founders, not by the principles of God. Priestocracy edicts, false pretences are to govern the world. Wonderful legislation and government, that! It does not regard the development of mind in all the richness of its faculties, as it arose in the darkness of the past, when topics and ideas were meagre, the people illiterate and ignorant, and mind was vassal. What pretence can such faith claim to mind's light, when it depends to propagate its doctrines on mind's darkness?

Why is there antagonism in peculiar faith; is there in mind?

Antagonism to truth, cannot exist in mind uncorrupted by peculiar faith, as the purpose of deity gives mind that is rational, adhesion, love and fondness for facts and truth. When mind has antagonism to correct views, it is because it has not self-government, nor proper government of principles.

This is easily proved, as principles do not clash, hence sectarianism, Roman, Greek, or Protestant, is radically wrong.

Mere reformation does little, where conservative revolution is needed to exchange the radical basis.

All peculiar faiths are putting themselves down better than others can, that is, God does it.

A man puts himself down, nobody else can, if he be right. Principles universal, cannot be put down, but peculiar doctrines and pretences can.

The very chief temples of peculiar faith easily change hands by conquest, the spirit of which has been aroused thereby, and the conquered are subject to the mortification of their faith-mutations, while those of true faith are already the same everywhere, not only insuring a brotherhood universal in rational religion, but the safest general position to prevent all the ill consequences of wars provoked. Rational religon does not institute any wars.

Party spirit of peculiar faith, only sees one side of the question, and that its own.

Rational religion is the silent messenger of God, unlike peculiar faith, that characterizes mind's perversion. Have religion, then, not peculiar faith, and there can be no necessity for repudiation, and this age will hear no more of peculiar faith doctrines, but will rise from a subordinate to a God-like position, that of the noblest triumph of mind. Thence arises the means of an exalted censorship of society, that will command all the just powers of the mind by the press, &c., what no bible of tradition can impart, an enlightened conscience.

The ignorance and stupidity of peculiar faith, cause hate in the world, that would be united, but for its quagmires that prevent the transition state to rational religion.

The worst argument for the adoption of peculiar faith rests on the example of particular men, instead of universal principles, that recognise reason as paramount and omnipotent. Principles are of God; peculiar faith is of men, and refers to their pretended opinions, as authority for the world! If reason be not always most safely appealed to, in the name of God what else can be honestly?

Romanists and protestants can decide rightly for each other's peculiar position, but they cannot be reconciled on the great principles of religious freedom, as they have not the permanent principles of rational religion.

The God of the universe can meet any draft on his funds, for that reason our reverence for him obliges us to discard the vagaries of peculiar faith.

Mind, that looks to its improvement and duty, can respect no custom, no more than cobwebs that are to be expelled; the moment they become nuisances, they are to be abated.

God's principles cannot possibly clash at all, but the creeds of sectarians forever clash, and their doctrines forever involve difficulties of logic and reason; hence, they seek to avoid reason, and recur to sophistry, affecting faith for credulity.

One sect says that falling from grace is the preservation of its church, while another sect says that this doctrine is demoralizing to churches.

The doctrine of falling from grace can only be purely met by rational religion, to put every man on his merits for his life-time, liable to sin in degree more or less, by temptation; and exempt as his nature is purified by a correct education and action in the correct appreciation of conservative principles, that promote the best possible condition of conscience. This is the only safe and pure doctrine, about falling from grace or having grace. All living beings are liable to sin, in degree.

Shall absolutism still decide the question of peculiar faith despotism over most of the world? Shall the organ of thought, the mind, be held in abeyance to man's notions? Shall religion be dependent on peculiar faith? Shall that be the absolutism of custom, or state power? Shall the existence of Christians, Mahomedans, Jews, pagans, mormons, or Juggernauts, be due to the contingency of citizenship, and the peculiar influences bearing thereon?

Reason is the only proper avenue, through the empire of mind, else men might be pirates and murderers, from the customs of barbarian faith.

Open the door for superstition and its varied peculiar faith, and all their curses can pour on us. There is no limit, as men's notions and licentiousness dictate.

You cannot stop the mormons nor pagans, who only have peculiar faith as you have, by brute force, but by rational measures, that exclude your as well as all theirs. What a sublime power is that of moral force, that bespeaks rational religion and its God. Then be done with peculiar faith, if you are good and rational citizens, and pay no court to any but the legitimate doctrines of monotheism, that demonstrates the sublimest power of the universe. Be wise!

Disrespect for God is engendered by any system of peculiar faith, that affects to impart any of his attributes to any other being. Rational religion claims potency adequate, of omnipotence, the Almighty.

God being self-existent, all others are created, and necessarily inadequate to the government of creation.

Peculiar faith superseding religion, is the most disastrous thing to public morals, as it deranges society.

It is the basest fraud to deprive the world of its inherent rights in religion, by all the false pretences of peculiar faith, that will die the death of the felon of superstition.

Base is any character, to think of the usurpation, much less to execute it.

To whom can the distressed friend apply, in his difficulties of mind about religion?

To the base intriguer, who cannot analyze this momentous subject?

No assassins are to strip off physical rights and inherent equality.

We cannot, as rational beings, permit such serious humbugs as peculiar faiths be imposed on the people, in disgraceful obloquy of mind.

The curses of peculiar faith go into all social and national circles, as we now see that with all the blessed light of civilization that emanates from rational religion, the master spirit over party spirits, how one nation mistreats other nations, seeking to force on them a government analogous to the one it had itself got rid of, such has been the conduct of France to Rome. Peculiar faith is one of the most dangerous enemies to mankind, as it is one of the most reckless bigots of tyranny.

Mind enlightened, not empirically, but by the means that nature demands and reason sanctions, will seek to carry out the noble and upward tendency of free institutions, a mighty conservative power of the world.

There are innumerable systems of superstition and peculiar faith, but only one rational religion.

The way to that is by mind and reason, truth, honesty, fidelity and integrity, not through priestocracy.

The Lord deliver us from sectarians and bigots, who only look to superstition for their motto, and a miserable doctrine for faith, for which they commit themselves in all their iniquities.

All such must end, as man's deeds, as thousands of their predecessors. Man, be wise in time.

How many innumerable and inextricable contradictions do the sects of peculiar faith produce?

It is absolutely important that we should have a system of rational religion, that gave full and ample confidence in its universal powers and virtues.

Where is any such after all the boasts and pretences of peculiar faith, that begets peculiar difficulties?

Have we, the people, any proper system of rational and vital religion that imparts on spontaneous innate faculties, inherent principles, that inspire in the breast of all mankind, having rational minds, true confidence? None at all, for we have only systems of superstition.

The principles of religion, not the doctrines of peculiar faith, are for ever important to live and die by.

But then it is claimed that the christian or some peculiar faith, has the pure and genuine possession of grace. What proper proof can be given the world, that has the best right to ask it? None. It is only mere assertion, without any honorable proof. Why the humbug?

Positively all peculiar faith has sectarianism, and that certainly excludes the main idea of grace, universal love for God, and his people.

Do the advocates love God alone, who is the sole Deity?

Do they love that people, with whom they cannot commune by their articles of faith?

The only position then of grace is rational, not peculiar.

Do not libel mind and reason, and then you will not libel God.

All, but the true faith, have many superstitions and contradictions in faith and creeds.

It is the duty of all enlightened free minds to seek that which is entirely free from clashing, as God's principles cannot possibly clash, if they do, assuredly the work is man's.

To correct the wrong, we must know the right.

Action on principles all the time will effect all right. Action on peculiar doctrines will affect right but effect wrong.

The world absolutely requires what God decreed it, religion, as peculiar faith deranges and ruins all its relations.

The code of mind's ethics will best protect the world. How base the world can be about its peculiar faith.

How puerile, imbecile, yet furious, fanatic superstions, yet call peculiar faith religion!

The virtue of the world is too often forced; its hypocrisy disgusts human nature, its corruption degrades it.

The world is too clearly governed by all the present codes of interest rather than of principles.

Peculiar faith is a non-entity in religion.

All faiths in spirits and ghosts, demons and exorcisms, peculiar endowments of grace, are unreasonable and unworthy rational minds.

There can be no peculiar exclusive form of religion in this world, nor any doctrine peculiar or mystified, beyond God's eternal and universal principles. Any others are absurd, the belief blasphemes God, and condemns itself as the work of priests.

There can be no peculiar god-head, no spirit or holy ghost, that unites any vicegerent to God, and man to the vicegerent.

All such faith is absurd, and betrays the assertors as impugning the rights of mind for degraded purposes.

Any denial of reasonable views without a proper refutation is dishonesty, and can only be the act of a perverted, weak, and ignoble mind.

Any faith that circumscribes God's actions to any one nation and its pretences, making all a peculiar nation, is utterly absurd, and negatives God's attributes of universal omnipresence to a peculiar little god of the world, made by priests' brains if not by their hands.

Any mind professing peculiar faith, must war with other advocates of different faiths and war for the false sovereignty of the world, and therefore shows improper spirit destitute of love to God, who is universal in his attributes throughout the universe.

What can the antagonism of the world full of peculiar faiths avail one soul, knowing their false position?

It takes all the elements of religion, a God-gift to the soul, to save it from the effects of peculiar faith that deceiveth the world, and renders nugatory much that is good.

But what is the condition of the minds that are much perverted, to have the serious difficulties of peculiar faith to contend with? How few can escape? Why, then, should the best of the world use the counterfeit, when they are already in the enjoyment of the genuine at once at the mint?

Any one mortal that dies meriting condign punishment, or penalty for misdeeds, presents a state or condition deplorable, hence a change should be made at once and of progressive improvement.

This can only be done by consent of mind, to be enlightened by truth, and matured by wisdom.

Accursed, then, must be he who misleads, trammels, and perverts the mind of man, whose immortal soul is invaluable and inestimable.

The absurdity of faith made of blind belief, that is only taught as custom taught the teacher, is most culpable, sinful, and degrading.

Any hope that rests in it is imbecile and impotent.

All such must be demoralizing, and in the best proof, an appeal can be made most faithfully as to past and present fruits.

What can the future promise?

History shows us murders and butcheries innumerable to correct heresy, as it was called, by burning, forced conversions by inquisition-generals.

Who shall decide this greatest question?

None but the Almighty Creator.

Who represents him? Mind enlightened.

Peculiar faith is made the means of hiding a multitude of pretences, designs, and sins.

The world is wicked enough without all these!

Peculiar faith gives us the mixed plurality of gods.

Nations seek true government, but must have their rights trespassed upon by the usurpations of peculiar faith, worth nothing to the world.

Who wonders now at the thousand deformities of society, when primary wholesale injuries abide in goverment that unites church and state?

Butcheries of the people must be perpetrated to establish the temporal power of the popes, by the worst of political hypocrites.

The crisis of the world's history makes men, who as good and true will unite to secure it from the fangs of superstition and its effects!

They know that high-mindedness, honor above all vulgar prejudices, will elevate the world to its pinnacle.

Peculiar faith generates in all ages, immense vices and crimes, consequently it is the rankest absurdity, when estimated as religion in any age.

Has any form of peculiar faith, that sets out with false pretences to God affecting to be religion, done otherwise than as a virtuous institution, then it was an ignoble superstition, claiming to be what it was not, and being what it should not have been!

In countries even claiming to be free, faith, unless conformable to the existent national peculiar faith, denationalizes the recusant parties, who are ever excluded from national councils, after their election, by being unable to take the oaths required.

In England, the Jews, though elected, could not become legislators for this reason.

There is no end to peculiar faith heresies while its several bibles of tradition as of Judaism, Christianity, Bhuddism, Latter Day Saintism or Mormonism, Mahometanism, Brahminism and Paganism give them utterance. Is it necessary to ask which is right, when all rational minds can see them all wrong?

And yet what rights have the citizens, but under the recognised national peculiar faith of those countries so silly and corrupt as to adopt them? If the evil be intolerable, even in England, what must it not be elsewhere?

What country rights have they but by adoption of their abominable creed?

Put down, for God's sake and mind's rights, these the rankest heresies that war on God's creation, and creation's rights. Even proscription of opinion in this Union, the mere reflection of the dying monster, precludes delicate liberty.

Let not this stupid invasion of mind's freedom any longer exist. Enjoy all the genuine exaltation of purest rationality; that is the purest incorruptible liberty.

The one peculiar faith of the slavish government is arrayed against all the rest, while religion holds up all, modern and ancient, polytheism or trinity, as unworthy the countenance of honest minds.

Do you wish to get rid of the errors of Romanism, you must revolutionize Protestantism.

Relieve the world, in God's name, and by his principles! Let us go with those that go the farthest in religion, no matter whether we rouse absolutism, or the women and children, so we be right. Rational women and children wish to be right; let them now learn it.

The world would have been much further advanced in science, philanthropy and the real greatness of humanity, if there had never been any pretensions to superstition and miscalled religion.

For whom was the institution of peculiar faith from the first ages of the world to the present time? For the priestocracy, priests and preachers, kings and their minions. The good of the many was not consulted, who were made subordinates to the peculiar faith order. Despotism, not religion, was the purpose of the most ungodly ambition.

See their iniquitous enslavements of mind, by all the vices of absolutism. See their iniquitous wars for conquests of soul and body, lands and money, powers and principalities, throughout the world.

The world of peculiar faith is ambitious of rising, right or wrong, on the ruin of others.

This is not a religious but an ambitious spirit. We must be guarded by principles, the only conservative basis, against the impudent pretensions that affect the world.

Peculiar faith can never exalt to the Supreme Creator, as all such has emanated from the savage, vassal, ignorant and barbarian state.

Savages revere the sun, but as far as the Creator exceeds the sun in majesty and brilliancy, so does religion excel peculiar faith, that can be nowhere before the God of the universe.

It is not altogether the fault of new doctrinists of peculiar faith, new sects, as the Mormons, as the ignorance and corruption, the bigotry and superstition of the masses of the people, who ought to have investigated this comprehensive subject, and to have seen that peculiar faith doctrine is not religion, but is the very reverse, and the peculiar curse of mankind. Past ages have been disgraced enough by the wicked heresies of all peculiar faiths.

The pretenders have been enough illiterate, profligate and licentious epicures, loose and vicious, to curse the present also.

Let a Numa institute his god's temples, altars, sacrifices, and rites of worship, declaring idolatry under the care of their priests; let the East Indian build his pagod temples for his worship, with his vedas for his bible, and the tyrannical Brahmins for priests, but let world-freemen, that are intelligent, revere truly and mindfully the only being, the God of nature, who could create, organize and regulate matter by sublime principles, that render his attributes above all, as the great sole First Cause of the existence of things.

And the beauty and strength of this position that triumphs above all others, are, that all God's creation tends to good if appropriately appreciated by mind, whose actions must be correspondent.

But in what horrid position is the world now? Who will rescue it from the snares of peculiar faith?

Various and opposite faiths are mixed up in the same government, and thus the whole world is wofully cut up thereby. It is so in China, Hindostan, Asia, Europe. Where is it not? Its waves after waves, with fiery martial prowess, enslave the fairest portions of the world.

The Brahmins ruled India, then the Bhuddists, producing civil and horrid wars, then the Mahometans govern, and all in turn, submit to the Christians, while in Arabia, &c., the Mahometans rule over Christians and Jews, all producing their peculiar hostility and injuries.

The Pagans of Babylon conquered the Jews, and transplanted them in the east. Did not the Jews learn from the Egyptians and their conquerors, the Babylonians, their peculiar faith?

Other conquerors with diverse faiths, people with them, several cities of Asia and Egypt, and caused them to be diffused widely over the world, where they are not cut off by persecutions of enemies of peculiar faith. In this, the Jews were treated better by the outside barbarians, as they murdered their enemies, and spared neither sex, nor age, nor property!

Who had the most orthodox civilization? All the ancients, Jew and Gentile, possessed only peculiar faith.

Martyrdom, severe as it was itself, was much of a speculation, for proposed benefits.

Now toleration, the lovely daughter of civilization of mind, that rebukes all the boasts of Christianity, and all peculiar faith affecting to be the only light of the world, as withholding the noblest blessings of mind, is its universal protection.

Instead of toleration, christianity has given in turn, persecution, inquisition and proscription, peculiar faith for religion.

Toleration is a defence against a world's persecution, that arises against all peculiar faith, its necessary concomitant.

What protection better to conscience, Jew, can be offered you, than the adoption of rational religion?

You have tried thousands of years, your own peculiar faith, and have been the cause of many new ones, no better diffused over the face of the globe.

Your predecessors laid iniquitous foundations, and you have sacrificed deeply on the altar of superstition, and most deeply have you atoned therefor.

Arouse, ye descendants of Joseph, and assert the dignity of character that belongs to mankind, united in one universal brotherhood.

You can never attain peace and happiness on this earth by your faith, that can never reach the dignity of religion.

You can never assert a union with mankind, from whom you have been estranged by the follies and crimes of past ages, but by the eternal principles of the God of the universe, who ruled your peculiar gods.

Consider, remnants, fragments of a nation, so much persecuted for so little profit, after all, your duty and happiness.

No vows of such a faith that is peculiar, will be estimated by the Almighty, for religion.

You may see the errors of other peculiar faiths, but by your education so peculiar, you fail to see your own.

However you esteem yours, its peculiarity will never render you safe with your peculiar god.

The integrity of your mind before all blood offerings of victims, can only be acceptable to the God of the universe.

While all sacrifices are superstition and nonsense, from the blood of animals to that of pretended messiahs and Christs, mind alone atones as mind ought.

It is in your power to interdict your civil and religious death and oppressions.

You have sacrificed long enough to the false peculiar faith of your fathers, who were ignorant and fanatic. Forsake their barbarism in the lights and blessings of rational religion.

You are now diffused among most nations, and nearly in all lands.

This you have chosen, that lies between the two mightiest oceans, commanding all continents and their wealthiest commerce. Aid in rendering an example of the most brilliant light to all the nations of the world.

No one of peculiar faith can expect to triumph in this mighty country.

What military chieftain will be fool-hardy enough to try his ambition, when a nobler field of glory awaits mind in its richest rewards?

By the side of this land the ancient republics stand half civilized, as they had not representative constitutional governments, the first principles of freedom.

Appreciate, then, to enjoy your best boons of national happiness, and lay aside the exploded pretences of peculiar faith, that ruined your forefathers.

Where peculiar faith ends rational religion begins, and where the persecutions of the first stop, the blessings of the last commence, covering the whole earth with happiness.

When all other persuasions are done, rational religion flourishes, and mind reflects the attributes of its Creator.

The persecutions instituted by those advocating peculiar faith and doctrines, have immolated hundreds of millions of victims over the world.

This was the degradation of base self-interest, and proves conclusively that there is but one true faith, that is rational.

If one peculiar faith perished, another triumphed.

This spirit among all corrupt classes of man has immolated for all kinds of power upon the base altars.

There have been horrible persecutions of christians by those of the same name; that proves conclusively that christianity is not religion.

How many did the reformation of Luther cause to be anathematized and excommunicated, to be butchered!

Much of Europe suffered in the attempt to overthrow the reformed church, by civil and international wars.

To this we owe the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew. For this, popes decreed that a jubilee should be published throughout the whole christian world, "to return thanks to God for extirpation of the enemies of truth and church in France." "The whole city of Rome was illuminated with bonfires."

Under fanaticism, all the atrocious and revolting indignities can be perpetrated upon human nature, as the rape of the modest virgins and matrons, the murder of all ages and both sexes, even of infants and sucking children. Even an unborn child burnt for heresy, the exhuming and burning of the bones of reformers buried for nearly half a century, as of Wickliffe, not to mention the confiscation of property to millions in amount.

Who can meddle with peculiar faith with impunity? Her history is horrible to contemplate.

She has to invoke the power of absolutism to aid in the world's tragedy; the power of kings and queens to do the base office of fanaticism, to become the dirty tools of destruction, by burning people denounced as heretics by assassins.

The rights of conscience are lost sight of, and both persecutors and persecuted, the regulators and moderators, the executives of peculiar faith, become mutual victimizers, and butcher the world between them.

Both sides persecuted, and will persecute forever, if you give them power and impunity.

What were not butchered were exiled, banished, or forced from unceasing persecution to expatriate themselves to various parts of the world, and America in particular.

Again we repeat the question, how many hundreds of millions have been massacred and butchered, to the fanaticism of peculiar faith. The most atrocious tyrant, the bloodiest butcher is peculiar faith.

One sect has been accused, long ago, of destroying sixty-five millions of people! Yet they are called Christians!

Well can we say, that without truth, honesty, and humanity, none have religion by profession.

The religion of civilization, to be what God requires, excludes all these actions, as no part of her creed.

Have not most of the world's wars been perpetrated for peculiar faith?

Her errors and tyranny put to shame and confusion. Who can uphold them? The world detests this felon, its deadliest enemy.

To renounce her vices is to renounce her bloody flag.

None are safe under it: pirate of the world!

We believe that false philosophy, with false faith, should be guarded against, by the revelations of rational mind and reason. All else is dangerous sectarianism.

Allowance must be made for education, that perverts all the advocates of peculiar faith, retards the world's improvement, enslaving mind and imposing on its credulity.

All the jealousies, ambitions, and warfare, between the different sects, prove all sectarianism to be destitute of religion.

Fanaticism overlooks morals, religion, all patriotism, in the horrid curses of her own peculiar faith.

No violence is too severe, no sophistry too base for her purposes. Hers is the bloody flag, that crimsons the world.

Blindness of faith is the one dogma, with all kinds.

All the prominent leaders of peculiar faith have suffered a miserable or felon's death, for their impiety and blasphemy, expiating by their own blood their own iniquity, of basest character.

Nor is this all: would that it were.

One of the conclusive arguments against all errors, are the disunion and warfare among the sectarians. Their views and interpretations being after the manner of men, from the imperfect organic base of their principal, directly war on each other, with a perfect hatred and hostile ferocity.

Some of them must have a blind faith; whilst many adopt a very convenient faith; whilst none have the true faith, pure and uncorrupted.

Then it becomes all honorable patriots to resist with manly energy all the errors, crimes, and injuries of superstition, and repel all her malign influence. It emphatically belongs, as a paramount duty to the people, who are to resist all such absurd evils and immoral misdemeanors, to save us from any secret, or all associations, whose clanships defile the rational society of the world.

The hundreds of divisions of peculiar faith can never unite on messiahs, much less on doctrines, when they have such peculiar views, that subdivide all the time into peculiarity.

Will the moderns be never done with the exploded notions of the ancients, about the science and philosophy of peculiar faith, while they reject their science and philosophy, when abstracted?

All such institutions are erroneous, having a false position and platform.

They have not the elements nor principles of union, hostile and aggressive as sectarianism, gory in blood, is.

How much less can it unite its antagonistics, Mahometanism to Christianity, Mormonism to Judaism?

All are peculiar, and all must necessarily be antagonistic.

This peculiarity has destroyed all, and must destroy all, forever.

It is too selfish, and cannot comprehend the interests of the whole world, embracing those of the mortal masters for the God Creator.

Any faith short of the last cannot stand, for it is false and must be defective.

The people are the beneficiaries. Who shall thwart them? Priest and preachers? Who are they, but those acting for themselves? The whole world-people absolutely require a rational solution, to their world-problem.

If probably one of the hundreds of sectarian divisions of all the systems of peculiar faith be nearly right in form of doctrine but most wofully short in sight of practice, where is the balance who are directly antagonistic to this one? Where is the peace of the world involved, when religion has no antagonism, no war? Which one is that, of all sectarian creeds and doctrines?

Most minds act by direct interest, according to the present teaching of sectarianism.

They may be crushed by want of success.

Many act by blind impulse, hope, interest, misleading, want of correct opinion of themselves or others, false ambition.

There can be billions of peculiar faith, and every one necessarily must have bad faith, antagonistical to all others, and all to reason, the act of rational mind. Shall the peace of the whole world be at issue, when religion secures it at once?

Then reason or mind enlightened can be for the wisest system, the only standard, the Creator God with no priestocracy, no worship but a true rational adoration.

That faith that was sophistry in sermons or dictation in power, ought to be silenced by reason.

Then one form of peculiar faith only differs from another, if it be not the true one as monotheism, as grades of superstition.

At this age of the world any one affecting faith independent of reason and the best guides of rational mind, should be scouted as an enemy to God the giver of all such.

It is deplorably lamentable that so much superstition and sophistry to uphold it, still prevail among the supposed best circles of the world.

Centuries hence if reason do not assert her empire, thousands of forms of such faith may prevail for their season, superseding each other by base intrigues or bloody wars. They must all diverge from religion. The handle to the peculiar faith, shows the impostor.

For thousands of years, this game has been played upon the unsuspecting honest people, under various forms of expiation adopted, as by the blood of animals or by blood and water baptism, then came the blood of the so called messiahs, and preceded by the blood of millions of victims of the dear people who listened to the fatal words of peculiar faith.

So abominable is peculiar faith before the light of truth, so odious is its perversion of God's rights, that its followers all expiate more or less for the folly, delusion and blasphemy.

Its god is an improvable being who is wiser in time as man, more so since the creation!

Is this possible when the God of the universe is unchangeable, and has omniscience? What a libel on Deity!

Who was the weakest of mankind, the priestocracy that invented and propagated all such stuff, or the receivers? The knowing receivers, are as bad. Will the world overlook this position, is it blood of beasts and men, or mind that adores God, the God of the universe? Is it blood or mind, that is to be appreciated.

The code of peculiar faith presents antagonism of sects, all professing Christ, even in the same church: of governments, as absolutism against Republicanism. Who can wonder at this, when such governments embrace church power and union!

BRAHMINISM, &c.

Was there ever a greater curse on the land of Hindostan than the Brahmin faith, degrading man into four castes, and unmanning by its deepest curses on him. To what but this faith that arrested the march of mind to its sublimest conceptions and aspirations, do they owe the present subjugation of their mighty country, that shames from its mighty national fortresses, the imbecility of its one hundred and forty odd millions, one-eighth of the whole world, to the intelligence and bravery of a few thousands of Europeans? As long as they nurture this faith, so long will they be imbecile and at the submission of men of mind.

THE HINDOOS.

No wonder their corrupt empires fall, as they only have the fragments of society cut up and ruined by peculiar faith.

They have been overrun by Mahometans and Christians, and have had civil wars for the peculiar faith of the Brahmins and Bhuddists. What nation could stand all these peculiar curses, backed by martial piracy?

In the administration of justice in India, "the value of the bribe determines the cause," excepting when the case is so manifestly proved, as to brand the failure of redress with glaring infamy. The first is peculiar faith-justice, and rational mind makes it.

"Of the host of Hindoo Divinities, Brahma, Vishnu and Siva, are the most exalted.

The Hindoos have distributed the creation and government of the universe among these three, styling Brahma the Creator, Vishnu the Preserver, and Siva the destroyer." This position bespeaks the want of analysis of the profound subject in their minds.

What claim has the old and new testament to originality? Is it not indebted to heathen mythology?

Is it not all mythology itself of a peculiar kind?

We clearly have here, God, Christ, and the devil.

The system of the Hindoos gives a universal deluge.

The mythology of the world has absurdly undertaken too much, mixing opinion with fiction for reason and facts, causing absurd, peculiar faiths and ceremonies, to usurp the place of religious principles.

The whole world has to be now revolutionized on the loftiest conservative principles of rational mind.

The pure morals of society must be preserved by suitable institutions from the bible of rational mind. All other bibles are not only unsafe, but most dangerous.

Have we any creed or action in pure faith, that has accomplished the legitimate demands of religion?

The Brahmin assumes to rule all other orders of society, their rights, justice and laws, and becomes a despot of the worst character, for sacred purposes, and degrades society in the most licentious manner.

This Hindoo peculiar faith and tyranny, present a prototype of universal priestocracy, if mind of the world would have submitted to its vassalage. It only needs the power to act.

Woman, you thoughtlessly adopt the bibles of peculiar faith, and they are they that degrade you. Unite with rational mind, to secure to your best rights, the best endorsement of their protection.

In Hindostan, the women are degraded as servile, and the most outrageous position is established by unnatural orders in society, enough to force the conviction that all such superstition and tyranny are incomparably worse than no professed faith, the world over.

Proper laws would be the glory of glories to it.

What can be worse than the government of priests?

The progress of mind has been impeded by them for thousands of years, and has been deprived of its potent rights, and just character, crushed and overwhelmed.

Such a state of things has rendered India, with her one hundred and forty millions, the abject vassal of as many thousands, and she has none to thank for her suicide and parricidal curse and ruin, but the abominable jesuitical priests at the expense of their country.

This curse of all curses, has been upon her.

What can any people be when church is monarch?

It blights any country, the fairest of the globe.

It is even bad at any time, at the very best, when church and state are united, as oppression will prevail, till all corrupted, most certainly fall a prey to the worst passions and despots of the world, enslaved by them.

The advance of the Hindoos, in social improvements, was just enough to enslave them with the most abject submission to the car of superstition and absolutism, possible to be conceived of.

Any priestocracy that rules, is well calculated to ruin any country.

Let us analyze the books of Menu and the vedas.

We now can see that all but the bible of rational mind are false, as the codes of superstition.

All other bibles are mere copyings of each other, of false gods, plurality of gods and demi-gods, man's libel of Deity, who cannot be a peculiar god, to suit peculiar notions of priestocracy.

"The vedas are called the sacred book of the Hindoos, and are believed to be revealed by God, and estimated immortal."

What numbers of systems can arise that mind has to analyze ere the right decision can be duly made.

If we had never heard of any till all were placed before us, we must resort to the best appreciation.

The Hindoos are believed to have had the faith customs of the Egyptians.

They were conquered by the Egyptians, Mahometans, and Christians, in succession, and what but idolatry was the result? Asia, let alone Hindostan, has been overrun by peculiar faiths.

With the Hindoos, Brehm was the great god of all ineffable.

The peculiar faith was that of polytheism.

China may have been originally civilized from Hindostan. Bhuddism, the great heresy of India, prevails very commonly among the Chinese.

The military castes ruled over India.

The priestly or sacred caste governed where intellectual functions were not effectual, as in Egypt.

The eastern Hindoos did not know Jupiter's son, Alexander, or knew him too well as a humbug to recognise him, especially as conqueror.

His army took a panic, although his court flatterers would have the world believe that he was its ancient conqueror.

The Egyptians, who carried their worship to Greece, northern Africa, and perhaps Italy, transferred it also into Hindostan, according to authors.

The Hindoos had the worship of human gods and heroes, and rivers with them were sacred.

History enables us to extract, that "The Egyptian theogony enfolds a very perfect psychology, and the purest science of their day, in a system which began with the identity of God with his work, and ended in personifying every least species of existence."

Zendevesta, the bible of the ancient magicians and modern Perses, teaches that there is a Supreme Being, eternal, self-existent.

The Persians entertained the purest form of heathenism, and abhorred the worship of idols.

With the Hindoos, a whole and extensive class, the Brahmins, is sacred, and an object of worship.

When does a priest ever relax his absolutism over the people? The light of independent mind only stays it.

Civilization does not need priests, but philosophy, science, mind civilized and refined, rational religion.

India, the finest country on the globe, has been a prey to priests, and has thereby been sacrificed to soldiers and priests. It is priests all the time. Citizens of the world, do not help to pollute mind.

There is every kind of peculiar faith in Asia, and what good has it done her? Rather say, what harm has not been perpetrated? The end is not yet.

Man is the same from mind everywhere.

Already has Asia, the most of the world, been victimized by peculiar faith. Let, then, mind seek to arrest its curses.

All its bibles have their prophecies, miracles, and mysteries, mysticism, mythology, romance, fables, and legends.

There has been a constant antagonism of all such faiths, but all their virtue has a very low scale of morals.

The Bhudda faith displaced the old Brahmin faith of India for a season, then the Brahmins, by a new dynasty, persecuted and drove out of Hindostan their Bhuddist antagonists. Would that the people had driven out all, that the world would silence all priestocracy.

The Hindoos afterwards had a dynasty of magician kings, that terminated. It was the state power sought, all the time church and state union.

And this is the history of the whole world, time out of mind. The only rational remedy is rational religion, that ends all antagonism and sectarianism forever.

The Bhudda faith "denies the truth of everything invisible." It is materialism exemplified in idolatry.

The Brahmins have their prophecies.

"Brahma seems to be the supreme reason, and originator, corresponding with the Egyptian Phtha."

"Indra, the brahminical faith, resolves all things unto God."

The Hindoos have fables of gods being married to mortal females. Even their literature is enfeebled by mysticism. Hermits reside also among this people. The history part is taken from Whelpley.

According to the vedas, every sacrifice has a particular and proper value attached to it, and within its proper limits is infallible.

According to the authority of Menu, Brahma is the principal person of the three that emanated from Brehm, the vast ineffable one.

Creation was the work of Brahma, who, the first of created gods, gave origin to the world by conceiving it in his thought.

Has not the cosmogony of Menu been followed by Moses? Menu, the legislator of the Hindoos, is claimed to be among the most ancient of men.

The book of Hermes was predecessor.

In the book of Menu, there are four castes or classes. "The Brahmins are sacred with him, and their very birth is an incarnation of Dherma, the spirit of justice; for that the priest is born to promote justice; and by the right of primogeniture, (being first created,) is the virtual sovereign and possessor of the world." Menu takes especial care to impress the sacredness of custom;—declaring that it is transcendent law, and commanding all twice-born persons (as they revere the divine spirit that is within them) to observe it with the utmost reverence." Menu was of the priestocracy.

The Brahmins at first were beggars. They turned out to be the worst of tyrants, enslaving their own fellow citizens.

The code of Menu blended superstition, and was to uphold the good of the priestly order.

"Among the laws for reading the vedas, each time the preceptor must pronounce silently the mysterious O'M., the initials of the unknown name."

When was it that the priestocracy overlooked mystery?

Repetition of prayers is inculçated on all occasions where any pretext will serve to introduce them.

The repetition of the prayer of prayers is alone sufficient to expiate all sin, and secure immortal bliss. The Supreme must be adored silently.

The morals inculcated are fine indeed.

Courtesy to the Brahmins insures celestial beatitude.

The marriage code is excellent, especially for the priests. Marriages must not be contracted within the sixth degree of consanguinity.

Penances are apportioned, and torments are threatened in the world to come.

Every unexpiated offence has its punishment appointed in the future state; and the degree of purgatorial pain is fitted to the enormity of the sin.

The idea of the Hindoo purgatory may be traced to the Egyptian doctrine of transmigration.

All conditions of life are regarded by the vedas as probationary.

The redemption of souls out of purgatory is supposed to be effected by the prayers of their children.

Hence, in the ancient poetry of India, woman is named the giver of heaven; for, by her, the son is born, whose prayers and offerings shall redeem the soul.

Offerings to the manes are inculcated.

Demons and evil spirits are believed in.

We cannot avoid asking here, what effect must all such books have had upon the minds of ignorant, deluded and superstitious people?

Devout Brahmins must keep a sacred fire perpetually burning in their house. The manes are to be revered as gods. It would take a man all the best time of his life to observe all these particulars—and strict attention to such subjects must exclude important knowledge. How ignorant must these people be generally! A Brahmin must not shed the blood of a Brahmin.

Evil, once committed, fails not of its fruit, if not in the father, yet in his children, to the second generation.

The fifth chapter is of diet, purification and women. Many kinds of animals are enumerated as unclean. Every thing is pure which a Brahmin has either praised or sprinkled with water.

Married women, for the hope of paradise, are commanded to honor their husbands.

Devotion, the life of a hermit, the modes of self-torment, are detailed to severe asceticism.

Religious suicide by penance, is commanded, and to die under torment, is a surety for paradise.

Kings must be held sacred, and treated with respect, even in childhood.

The code of Menu, like all others that have emanated from an ascetical or fanatical legislation, aims rather to control and punish the individual, than to protect him in his civil and moral freedom.

To Brahmins, the sovereign must make many and splendid gifts, to secure his happiness in this and in a future world. His council is that of priests. He must be always guided by their advice.

The advancement of the priests is inculcated.

He is commanded to enlarge his empire, and to subdue neighboring nations.

Advocates and attorneys are very numerous in the Hindoo courts, for all ranks of the people are exceedingly litigious.

False swearing is a very common and trivial offence among them, and for a trifling sum, any number of witnesses may be suborned; nor do they esteem forgery a crime, but count it among venial offences.

The usages of law, not equity, are considered.

Immemorial and barbarous custom, is the force of law, with these people the most of all nations.

This trait, the same as with the Egyptians, causes the wonderful duration of their governments. Caste and sect preserve this feature.

False oaths are commanded, to save the life of light offenders.

Menu cautions the king against offending Brahmins, "who, without perishing, could provoke those holy men, by whose ancestors the all-devouring fire was created?" Confession is equivalent to expiation.

The priest's own power which depends on himself, is mightier than that of the king.

This power consists in curses and incantations against enemies; the holiest of the vedas contains a great number of these weapons, in the form of prayer.

The penances may be by walking on a tedious pilgrimage, or repeating the whole vedas, &c.

The least insult to a Brahmin, is met with a severe penance.

But no penance is comparable, for power, with the repetition of the vedas.

"A priest who should retain in his memory the whole kig-veda, would be absolved from guilt, though he had slain the inhabitants of the three worlds."

"As a clod of earth cast into a great lake, sinks into it, so is every sinful act submerged in the triple veda."

"The primary tri-lateral syllable o'm, (or a. u. m.,) in which the sense of the three vedas" (i. e. the unity of the Divine Being) is comprised, must be kept secret, like another triple veda.

He knows the veda, who distinctly knows the sense of the word.

A knowledge carefully concealed from the people, for whom it was esteemed fit that they remain idolators, unconscious of the divine essence.

So in Egypt, the knowledge of the one God was hidden from the people, and they remained idolators.

The priest only saw in the sacred idol or animal, a symbol, and not a presence of divinity.

The final absorption of the soul, is believed.

Millenia of torture by fire, are taught.

The opinion of one priest learned in the scripture, is declared to be more powerful than the voice of all the people.

The esoterical doctrine of the Brahmins, may be communicated to those only who are twice born.

The Brahmin must consider the supreme omnipresent intelligence, as the sovereign Lord of all; by whose energy alone all exist."

"All nature must be considered as existing in the divine spirit."

The supreme soul, the most high, eternal spirit, is present; the highest essence, the vast One, shall have the souls of mankind absorbed into himself.

This law recognises one God, but reserved that knowledge for a class, elected from the beginning, to be saints and sages; conniving at idolatry.

The government was absolute, from sovereign to all the local lords. In the administration of justice "the wealth, the consequence, the interest, or the address of the party, become now the only considerations—and, excepting when the case is so manifestly proved as to brand the failure of redress with glaring infamy, the value of the bribe determines the cause."

The trials by ordeal, which distinguished Europe during the dark ages, holds a high rank among the Hindoos."

There are three great powers among the Hindoos. Brahma is the main one.

The pagan priestocracy is equal to the Roman.

Can anything be more Jesuitical? Priestocracy is the same all over the world.

We are forced to exclaim, that better had there been no government with such absolutism and such unholy superstitions.

The Hindoos have the greatest tyranny over their women, or wives. What better could be expected from the slaves of slaves?

The filth of their towns is great.

Are the Hindoos equal to American Indians, who believe in a Great Spirit?

Their lower orders are degraded by their laws and their people.

In Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, May No., 1849, it is said that "No where among men have the laws and ordinances of society been more exclusively referred to divine authority, than by those who instituted the theocracy of Hindostan."

The first legislator of the Hindoos, whose name it is impossible to trace, appears to have represented himself as the re-publisher of the will of God.

He informed his countrymen, that at the beginning of the world the Creator revealed his duties to man in four sacred books, called Vedas; that during the first age, of immense duration, mankind obeyed them, and were happy: "that during the second and third they only partially obeyed, and their happiness was proportionately diminished; that since the commencement of the fourth age, disobedience and misery have totally prevailed, until the Vedas were forgotten and lost; that now, however, he was commissioned to reveal them anew to his countrymen, and to claim their obedience."

Their Vedas speak of the longest lives, compared with which Methuselah's is nothing.

The division into castes, made by the author of the Hindoo laws, may fairly be considered the first and simplest form of the division of labor and employments.

The priest is a character found among the rudest tribes, by whom he is always regarded as of the highest importance. He is the supposed means of propitiation, between the supreme power and the victims of superstition.

The Brahmins or priesthood are generally found to usurp the greatest authority in the lowest state of society.

It is only in rude and ignorant times that men are so overwhelmed with the power of superstition, as to pay unbounded veneration and obedience to those who artfully clothe themselves with the terrors of religion.

The Brahmins, among the Hindoos, have acquired and maintained an authority more exalted, more commanding, and extensive, than the priests have been able to engross among any other portion of mankind.

And this despotism of superstition has told awfully on the people.

As great a distance as there is between the Brahmin and the Divinity, as great a distance is there between the Brahmin and the rest of his species.

The sacred books are exclusively his.

The slightest disrespect to one of this sacred order is the most atrocious of crimes.

"For contumelious language to a Brahmin," says the law of Menu, "a sudra must have an iron style ten fingers long thrust into his mouth; and for offering to give instruction to priests, hot oil must be poured into his mouth and ears."

If a sudra, the fourth and last class, or caste, sits upon the carpet of a Brahmin, in that case the magistrate having thrust a hot iron into, and branded him, shall banish him the kingdom; or else he shall cut off his buttock.

The following precept refers even to the most exalted classes:—

"For striking a Brahmin, even with a blade of grass, or overpowering him in argument, subjected the offender to the obligation of soothing him, by falling prostrate."

Not only is extraordinary respect and pre-eminence paid to the Brahmins, but they are allowed the most striking advantage over all other members of the social body, in almost everything which regards the social state.

Although punishment is remarkably cruel and sanguinary, for the other classes of the Hindoos, neither the life nor even the property of a Brahmin can be brought into danger by the most atrocious offences.

As much the largest portion of existence, among the Hindoos, is engrossed by the performance of an infinite and burdensome ritual, which extends to almost every hour of the day, and every function of nature and society, the Brahmins, who are the sole judges in these complicated and endless duties, are rendered the uncontrollable masters of human life.

Thus elevated in power and privileges, the ceremonial of society is no less remarkably in their favor. They are so much superior to the king, that the meanest Brahmin would consider himself polluted by eating with him."

The Brahmins are a sacred class.

What a blighting influence peculiar faith has had on the oriental authority; her ridiculous fables have been for time's duration, and are only modifications of the same object, the elevating the priestocracy, but degrading the people, country, and world.

They have had in the largest circles their destined result, a malign influence, inducing the most feudal vassalage of their votaries.

For thousands of years the devotees have endured the worst of all servitudes, that of mind-vassalage, the most degrading of all.

Mind, then, has to examine the trinity of the Vedas, the prototype of subsequent bibles, and finding different trinities, will have necessarily to exclude all, as inconsistent with each other, that their advocates desire to displace, and above all inconsistent with God's universal attributes.

The Hindoo trinity, emanating from the ineffable Brahm, was Brahma, the Creator, Vishnu, the preserver, and Siva, the destroyer.

Brahm, the original, was self-existent, a mystery not to be spoken of. This position was no doubt taken, because the impostors could not analyze the subject, and stupidly concealed themselves, like all the priests, under mysteries, when pure philosophy is to be resorted to, with all the candor of truth. Siva was the evil genius.

Vishnu was to have ten avatars or incarnations. He has had nine, and when he comes the last time will be the armed avenger.

In one of these incarnations he appeared as Bhudda, the god of the universe; and again, in one as Juggernaut, at whose festivals the hostilities about their faiths, between the Brahmins and priests of Bhudda, are suspended, and all castes are amalgamated, or not separated.

Incarnations are quite common, and can be manufactured in priests' legends.

It is a shame that the world should be imposed upon, when the light of God should and can prevent it!

The peculiar faith of the Brahmins is placed, by the admission of Christians, next to theirs, however it has degenerated from its exalted originality.

That faith flourished three thousand years, according to the conjecture of Sir William Jones.

Now, the traditional unwritten part may have commenced thousands of years preceding, and run back into the dark vistas of antiquity.

Abraham is considered by Brande to have been of this faith. Indeed, there was a circle of the earth, including Western Asia, Eastern Europe, and Northern Africa, involved in the communism of priest professions, craft and policy, each peculiar to his own country, but all potent for the priests, who claimed the chief benefits, as an exclusive caste of people, lording it over the people.

Peculiar faith has all the picayune squabbles of the world—very low and degraded. It is not a peculiar, but the universal order of the whole rational world that is concerned in religion, that binds all mankind to each other, and the whole to God.

If faith were peculiar, as the advocates pretend, then God is peculiar—but religion is universal as God; hence peculiar faith is a false dogma, enslaving and deceiving the world on false pretences.

All those thousand and one tales about spiritual actions, are as a tub to the whale, the great people, all idle gossip. Sophistry carried out is perjury. In physics and morals, do you uphold faithfully the exclusive adoration of God? As you do not, rational mind should neither adopt or uphold your doctrines or you. Mind could never have been sunk so low but for priestocracy's movements. No one should foster mere preconceived notions, or a false position to maintain, as he and all such will be prostrated before principles.

There is no slavery like the vassalage of mind to peculiar faith. The acts of peculiar faith are in collusion, that if submitted to rational mind must be totally condemned.

What of all that ancient mass of worship of peculiar faiths remain but the forms and machinery of superstition? And all such are detestable to rational mind. Some peculiar faiths are the most vulgar and obscene. The bible shows it plentifully.

The very members of peculiar faith now proclaimed in the world subversive of each other, present the amplest refutation of the reality of all, and exclude themselves from belief of pure conscience.

They are like pirates of usurpation around the people. Most unquestionably the hopes of reward have excited cliques of usurpers, who would have had to support their false pretences by final perjury.

Who are the witnesses proposed for the peculiar faiths? Dead. What! a god to have dead witnesses? Are they mortal? How could they testify of God's adoption?

The perjury would be complete, if carried through courts of justice. If not, they would be miscalled. If the bible were not upheld by the dynasties of usurpation, it would be kicked out of decent society. When bibles of peculiar faith reign, conservative principles are not abrogated, as they are God's, but are overlooked by an iniquitous clique of pretenders. The suspicion of one bad deed or creed leads to general involvement.

Peculiar faith domination is one of the world's worst slaveries. What is social proscription in America for proper views in monotheism, would be acts of the hottest inquisition, if mind were to succumb and permit it. All peculiar faiths have left the world barbarian and antagonistic, which rational religion must correct, humanize, fraternize and civilize to all practicable refinements of mind, enlightened by the holiest of God's documents. No wonder the world, as China, &c., has declared its parts outside barbarians, when a barbarous inside peculiar faith dictated all such, to the estrangement of mind's noblest blessings, a universal brotherhood. For that reason, all secret societies are hostile to the world's greatest refinement and civilization.

Peculiar faiths endow churches, enrich a bloated priestocracy, and increase peculiar privileges; while religion, endowed with rationality, diffuses the world's blessings, and honors God in the happiness of mankind. What is bible faith is of no more value than the balance, a false pretence from first to last.

All peculiar faiths are antagonistic to each other, as they are to principles; hence they could not uphold toleration, as they are all intolerant bigots, the best even saying or pretending that he who does not believe shall be damned, and it acts accordingly.

Citizens of America should congratulate themselves that they are in a land enlightened by rational mind, to the free and liberal discussions of which from the first the world is indebted.

You need the noblest guarantee of your rights in religion, but you can only get a base surrender of them by peculiar faith. I now consider the mighty question solved amply enough to satisfy the world, that all peculiar faith is a miserable humbug. It is the most execrable pirate of society, the world. Of course, when individual man renounces his conservative principles of God, he is beyond as he is below mind's censure. Was there ever such a prostitute and harlot, such a murderess as peculiar faith, that is any and all things to the world, in its insidious sophistry? She has prostituted all practicable of the mind, and murdered its purest conscience, which she has seduced. She has tortured the world's peace, and has degraded its honor. She has bribed sectarianism with the own gold, and pierced universal brotherhood with her own deadliest weapons. She s mocked all that is of religion but its purity and innocence, and has upset all with exa deadliest deception. If peculiar faith were not allied to the deepest sophistry and amonyments, it would be kicked out of all decent, intelligent society at once. But it is

And of all practicable in despotism.

Peculiar faith has no patriotism, no sympathy.

The inside barbarians are worse than the outsiders.

Peculiar faith excites the worst passions, when she should master them. What Robespierre did for France, peculiar faith would have done and would do for the whole world. World patriots, stop her infuriate, mad career. Peculiar faith has no inherent principles, only peculiar doctrines to suit many degrading peculiarities. Analyze all peculiar faiths, and it will be clearly seen that they were for despotic sophistry and misrule. Are the world-people so blind as not to see all this? Will freemen, blessed with the loveliest land and the happiest government, that reflects the freedom and rationality, the pure religion of God, forget all this? Peculiar faith makes emperors high-priests, as those of China and Russia, Thibet and Rome, and their people low laity, the gambling policy is the first being high, low, Jack, and the game. 'Tis false to rational mind to say that the people must be governed by priestocracy, superstition, or monarchy. The world has to fight two brutal monsters, despotic force power and the jesuitical sophistry of the priestocracy. It might well commence with the highest, and put down emperors of China and Russia, and all others of that stripe, high-priests of their nation; also the Pope of Rome, and Grand Lama of Thibet. What was Russia but for the conflict of mind, habitually free? The whole machinery of the world's peculiar faith would be a miserable farce if it had not been its bitterest tragedy! Peculiar faith cannot solve the universe problem of union indissoluble.

She stands in the way of the only means of soul-safety, rational religion. As to that thing of contingent smiles, dependent on the whim of power, let good intelligent mind deliver us; from all priestocracy, church wiles, and chicanery, mind, good and true, deliver us.

The special acts of mind are the conservative special providence. Peculiar faith shocks the whole moral, intellectual world. Who is the God of peculiar faith? Not the God of the universe; therefore the advocates of the first have no God to offer us. The god of their selection can do us no good, and they are estopped from the God of the universe. Christianity, and all that emanates from peculiar bibles, are of peculiar faith. Let all be defined, as it defines itself. How miserably tied up, caught in their own peculiar nets, are all such? Polytheism, atheism, all peculiar faith, are amenable to correction, as they are utterly destitute of conservative principles. If a pastoral people were unfit, are a barbarian people competent to civilize and refine the world?

"The Bhuddists believe that there will be rewards and punishments hereafter, and, therefore rack their brains to devise fitting torments for the damned in the infernal regions." In all countries of less than constitutional government there is a state faith, as of China, Russia, Thibet, and Rome. Faith with them is everything pretendedly, being human law compulsory to man's conscience. With high tyranny, state governments resolve the whole, which can only exist in truth, fact, and reason. Novel faiths, in some, would overturn the existing government. Where there is a state faith, all the rest, even rational faith, that is religion, is discarded. Now, just government and faithful rational religion can only abide. Lamaism prevails in Japan, &c. This is something like Asiatic popery; or is not Roman popery like it? Its name obtains in Thibet. Fohi in China, or Bhudda in Hindostan, is the other name. This creed has the mysterious trinity.—Opposed to him is an evil principle. The Son of God of the Thibetians was born of a virgin in Cachemir, and was one thousand years before Christ. He is the principal object of divine worship; also incarnate god; wonder working prophet. It is doubtful, as of Christ, whether Bhudda ever existed. Several have assumed the name. Thibet presents the prototype of the Greek and Roman churches. It is said that the Jesuits were very much astonished at the ceremonies of the priests of Fohi in China, when they first came there. They only had the same editions. The people of China pay disrespect to the priests of Bhuddism, while they adopt their state faith.

The whole subject of peculiar faith is the same all over the world. It has no principles, but is petty grand larceny on the world, religion of man, mind, the world, the universe. God's own religion makes a man of principle, the most perfect and faultless gentleman. But peculiar faith gives demoralization.

Never give up the armaments to guard against perversions of mind. If principles do not avail, what will? Peculiar faith men will oppose rational religion, but the world will not consult tories, nor surrender to traitors their diamond rights. Let not the sovereign people of America speak of the peculiar faith of our fathers, but the religion of our God! That is the sublime position of mind.

Peculiar faith begets the most extensive hypocrisy in the world. All the latent effects of bad morals, carried out by peculiar faith, is mind's cannibalism throughout the world. Religion ennobles, while peculiar faith degrades mind.

The nature of peculiar or false faith is such, that the world cannot get rid of its false peculiar prophecies, until all are swept away by rationality of cultivated civilized mind. Peculiar faith affects to be Catholic, but with pretences as false as the foundation, whether Roman, Greek, or Protestant, all are retiring from a field in which "every knee should bow" to its institutor. The time will come when all such will be known no more, but as the dangerous toys of absolutists and priestocracy to delude and cheat the people their sovereigns, if they only had exercised their mighty jewel, their brilliant, their diamond mind, whose triumphs would give unfading lustre. It is your duty, highest, wisest world-minds, statesmen and all, to put me down if wrong, but to uphold my writings if right. Let the whole world look to it.

The pope, papa of the Greek church, lama, &c., are at the head of, and premise monarchical doctrines. Will freemen act tory to their republican liberty of mind, for these aliens to mind?

All the moderns may commit themselves about any peculiar faith of the ancients, but all Jew and Gentile were only ignoble, peculiar, unworthy of rational mind in all their peculiar faiths. All the ancients had only a smattering of religion, the Jew and Christian as little as any, as far they renounced rational religion. All peculiar faiths renounce religion as far as in them lies, and only retain what God first imparted of the elements, though sadly deteriorated. The ancients, even Aristotle, could not separate complex ideas of the God of the universe, the preserver, as well as the creator, the organizer. They could only comprehend the evil, not the effect of derangements of conservative elements by perverse mind, or as defective appreciations and misapprehensions, but as emanating from powers antagonistic to the good. Thus, all such stuff run through all peculiar faiths, most sadly deficient, degenerating into absurd metaphysics, whether upheld by eastern or western sages, even a Plato. The atheists were, and are, as good as the polytheists, for the first make no God, and the last make equivalents. There can be no Supreme, where there are detractions therefrom. The Jewish priestocracy first make a very inferior creation, correspondent to their ignorant position of philosophical science, and have the creator miserably deficient. As all such systems are amenable to philosophical science for correction, all the affiliated absolutists preach up for faith, to sustain the whole monster deprived of light. All their charlatan priestocracy preach against philosophy and science, as they can most successfully assail such false pretences.

It is needless to talk about the Jews of all the ancients having the idea of one God, when they necessarily had only peculiar faith, and did not have the idea of the God of the universe. Their god was peculiar to their nation, of course was the peculiar workmanship of their priestocracy brains, the stone-stupid tablets, to make an idolatrous people subservient to their government, and their unholy, and ungodly, selfish interests.

Cannot the whole modern world see through their iniquities? If it cannot, it is hopelessly lost to all rationality, the unappreciable God-gift.

The world has been martyrized, victimized enough by peculiar faiths, its bloodiest enemies, the blood-hounds of mankind. If mind was not peculiarly blind, by peculiar interests of absolutism in its peculiar forms, it would soon see it.

All peculiar faith has no peculiar claim at all to religion, all such being man's device, superstition for peculiar purposes, the merest counterfeits gotten up by the priestocracy of the world for worldly purposes. All the advocates having surrendered reason for peculiar faith, they have no tribunal but that of the ruling dynasty of bigots, and the last never had any justice or its right, rational perception. They are all gone, indeed, on their own self-willed position. Let us have no peculiar faith, the best that mind can devise, as all Confucian or any, are ungodly.

If individual peculiar faith be a curse, what must not national peculiar faith be? Just in proportion to its means. What outrage upon the world, mind, people, God.

The mildest monarchical governments have state faith, that tells its own tale, as rational mind of the people permits; if there be autocracy, the emperor fools, cheats, the people, as head priest. Priest is synonymous with cheat, as by him, the world is cheated. As to subjects of monarchies, however great their intellects supporting peculiar faiths, are they not doing their duty as loyal subjects, carrying out their double duty to peculiar education that has formed a second nature? When, then, any bright intellect is named, allied to such faith, we must analyze the whole peculiar influences that tyrannized over his deepest nature. The wisest nation will institute nothing less than the best rational education, as the highest duty to its citizens, who will repay the world, mind, religion, God, many fold. To give then peculiar education, is next to an unpardonable sin. The world can give no credence to the priestocracy, that are the pulpit sophists. Absolutism sustains worse, and is answerable for all its misdemeanors and crimes. Did I ever say all these acted felony to man? I say it was worse, all was blasphemy to God, the God of the universe. They shall not mistake me, and have any mental reservation that it is their peculiar god that they seek to palm on the world. The world should act like freemen, worthy of a Jefferson, Franklin and Paine. Ah! but you affect some conscience, as these men were not perfect. Are you looking at the perfection of man, or the conservative principles of mind? If you discard for personal considerations, you are most ingloriously condemned, as all your bible heroes are mock characters, the disgrace to mind and its beneficent principles.

When you decide your god for a mock system of faith, you do the same by your conscience. You dwarf both. But you affect to draw out of the category of polytheism, as you are a believer in trinity. That defines your position positively in that category, and you are either hypocrite to deny, or dolt not to perceive the absurdity. Why do you not act like a rational man, since your Creator has endowed your mind with all the mighty elements of rationality? You not only have one-third of a God, worse than atheism, that makes all nature God, a mere substitution of terms at last, that is unequal to the devil, your own distempered creation, as prince of the power of the air, a most foolish idea, but you have other partial gods, angels, spirits, ghosts, witches, wizards. You not only make your bible an idol, but you idolize nothing but the priestocracy creation, as the contents of that infamous book. You go further in your maniacal absurdity, that is as foolish as perverted mind of priestocracy can get to be; you say the world could get no other idea of God, but from your exploded bible. I say this is the most absurd of all idiocies. The world of mind never could get your bible ideas of God's perversions, without the obliquity and perversions of your priestocracy and bible; but it could not miss the God of the universe, to read his creation by his science and philosophy, vouchsafed to rational mind. Peculiar faith people cannot define rational religion, and of course they cannot practice it, much less possess it. The deadly hostile feuds among the grand divisions of peculiar faith, not to mention those of the same families, bespeak anything else than love to neighbors, much less to God, who is cut up, divided and sub-divided, conspired against, blasphemed and outraged by the priestocracies. Its messiahships are the fooleries of the world.

That peculiar faith that gets the ascendancy and suits the reigning dynasty, is the pretended true one. The Confucius of China rules out the Eastern and Western Bhuddhism, and is administered by the emperor who assumes the high priest office, under whom are the priestocracy the mandarins. But some approve of the civil officers holding also the peculiar faith, yet all such is odious corruption of government as well as religion. The world needs no priestocracy, much less civil officers of government which is necessarily corrupted. It becomes American freemen to teach the humbugged world as much in religion as constitutional government. To do so, they must have the highest rationality and purity in both. If the world of peculiar faith were not to swear to the truth of their faith, for which they sacrifice themselves as far as in them lies, they would be hypocrites. And if they do swear, they would be perjurers. Priestocracy peculiar faith is one great piece of patchwork, on the ancient oracles a great excrescence deformity, that botches, tinkers and cobblers have manufactured to meet the market, the peculiar market of the world.

As to the cause, all the world, talents, cannot uphold it, but if committed thereto must sink with it. Peculiar faith is a deformity on the world, has no principles, truth or rational faith—all borrowed capital, and ungratefully obtained on false pretences of religion that is basely slandered and its author robbed, his universe miserably imposed upon. It is the ignoble priestocracy that keeps the world in difficulty about peculiar faith, when rational conscience propels to religion. We have an illustration by the Mormons, Mahometans, &c., how peculiar faith can grow like a mushroom on false pretences, on which all is built. Intelligent virtuous freemen ought to be the last people to adopt, and first to reject peculiar faith tory and unprincipled, smuggled in by the pirates of mind, the brute force of absolutists, and the malign sophistry of priestocracies. There are millions to-day devoted to this world-curse, that would victimize the whole world by peculiar faith, that would see it murdered under that plea, and would perjure themselves the worst to have it fastened on all minds. No age can render the past vassal as it was, the master of the future. No slave of past peculiar faiths can be any example for freemen. Mind and rationality are inseparable in the universe, that is exclusively and rationally addressed to rational mind. All peculiar faith is to the world, like the fatal gift of the poisoned shirt to Hercules, as the fable moral has it. How absurd to have to go to the intermediates, messiahs and priestocracies, who have to go of course not to the creator of the universe, but to their created peculiar God! What benefit is that to you, or any rational being? The work of sectarianism is manifest, all over the world. The Bhuddhist thinks in his miserable bigotry, that he is too pure for the rest of the world! He not only will not permit the touch of others if avoidable, but has most difficult regulations and tedious rites and purifications to redeem his supposed pollution about the touch. Is his food touched, his utensil used by others, they are polluted!

Is this ungodly and inhuman pollution of peculiar faith never to be expunged off the face of the globe, by rational man? No wonder that this, the first country of the continent, Hindostan especially, has been ruined by this bitter curse of the priestocracy. Yes, the priestocracy can curse with a bitter, a horrible, and impious curse, and its blight falls on country and all alike, made abject vassals. People of the world, renounce all such curses, the world over.

How, church member Republican, can you convict the autocrat, the head pontiff, high-priest that rules his people with military despotism and bible superstition, when the last appeals to faith, a part of his government? How can you dissent from your own position? You are then self-impeached by a clash of principles, that convict and utterly condemn you. Retire from your senseless and ignoble position, and never pretend that you are pure in government, when your impurity in bad faith entirely silences you for ever.

The bloody piratical tory flag of peculiar faith has to be surrendered. How dare these peculiar faith demagogues of the earth to deform it, by such outrages on God and man! We are indebted to the Jew as well as others, for all this intolerable abomination, peculiar faith. Down with this world-curse, nations of the earth. A citizen of one country cannot go to another country, without this abominable curse staring him in the face. He cannot participate with the people, nor associate without the most abject vassalage. No mind degradation is the adoration of the Creator. Down with this relic of barbarous ages, the most contemptible of the world usage.

Religion by peculiar faith, is the tool and instrument of tyrants. Peculiar faith is a smuggler all the time. The world needs religion most rational to hold all the whims, crimes, and sins of peculiar faith in abeyance, to tell all the priestocracy, the Imperial Pontiffs, Popes and Papas, Grand Lamas, and all the tribe, that they are the vilest of the vile world. Impostors and swindlers of souls, not only denounce them and all their fool false pretenders, but silence them at once by the majesty of truth and good faith, to the only faith, the representative of nature's facts. The Bhuddist peculiar faith unsettles the world, disorganizes and deranges in its harrowing agitations.

What peculiar faith has not this peculiar vice? Rejoice, O rational mind, that you can secure the proper analysis and solution of this world-wide, this universe problem. Peculiar faith has various dyed garments of patch-work, bedecked in all the tinsels of a world's gewgaw. In what a quagmire is peculiar faith, about each other's creeds. If the world believes them, they are the worst of creation. By their own position, self-declared, Christians are Jew parricides.

I fear the gifts and givers in peculiar faith. Rational mind would have to play the hypocrite, to pretend to adopt it; so much then for the supposed authority of supposed great men's example. What is all such worth? Suppose the whole world were to pretend to such. What corruption. What ill-will and crabbedness, prevail between those of peculiar faith. In the same village, those of different churches generate a miserable state of things. Church bigotry is the absurd worship of peculiar faith and bibles, the priestocracy, instead of the adoration of the Almighty God. What is the world? Much of it is peculiar faith. Peculiar faith people do not know what religion is!

Peculiar faith commits highway robbery and spoliations on the world. The comprehensive liberal justice of rational religion excludes all contracted caucus, and frees the mind from all improper earthly sophisticated allegiance. Peculiar faith is one of the alloys of the world, having not the least intrinsic element of religion. The Jews, the Hindoos, have been ruined by their peculiar faiths. Let the balance of the world beware for itself. Rational mind under its glorious munificent mission of free agency, is to rescue the world from mind's perversions and abuses. What are they? Absolutism, with all its diversities and variations of sophistry, bigotry, usurpation and monopoly. We do not need peculiar faith and its bibles, but religion and its code, the bible of rational mind—no speculation but facts. Peculiar faith has retarded the noblest benefits of mind in all ages, pushing forward its own ills and evils. Is that religion, that raises the whole machinery of bullying institutions, proscriptions, and ostracisms, excommunication, wholesale butcheries and massacres, to perpetrate its ignoble peculiar faith? How do Christians, Mahommedans, and Mormons feel exotics on an eclectic, that if right, kills them, but as wrong, all are killed by rational faith? They are dead any how.

Religion commenced with God, peculiar faith commenced with the priestocracy, obliquity, and iniquity of mind, that worshipped the servants of rational mind, that commands the universe problem, that does justice to itself, to its God of the universe. We do not want a faith to exist to trample as a despotic master, where it is not fit to be owned as a slave. All the peculiar faiths arouse all the means to sophistry as clairvoyance, superstition, with their thousand false statements, as knocking to be heard. All peculiar faith must be knocked in the head, then all sophistry, all village and world-bickerings, will die a wholesale death as true peculiar faith. Where did you get peculiar faith from? Its age makes no difference, and it matters not, as all of it together is of no account, being counterfeit.

The priestocracy are the same everywhere. Both come from false pretences. But the Confucian is more philosophical than others. O, no, the Emperor of China has it for a state faith, assuredly for all the arts of government. He has excluded all the others as state faith. The prejudices of the people are enlisted by superstition of course. As concerns all peculiar faiths, so far as they are concerned, their poison is analogous, and would be relatively pernicious unless counteracted by mind. Christianity is what we have in Bhudhism. India has given it to the world.

Jew, what do you say? The Brahmin or Chaldean has given you your bible ideas—probably through Egypt. What can you make out of peculiar faith? The works, collusions, and combinations of king and priestcraft, to gull the people to pay taxes and tithes, and bow their neck to vassalage. But could man do that? Have priests any conscience? No more than all their faiths in all their forms have any foundation. Did God ever sanction one of them? Not the God of Creation, and if their peculiar god did, it was all the creation of the priestocracy who created the peculiar petty idol, and all he spoke, they manufactured by mind-jugglery.

But why did God not sanction? Because he had previously given the universe a sublime and soul-exalted dowry religion. All that peculiar faith presents, is false pretences. The bible-man affects that all things are possible with God. This is false—sophistry. Pulpit sophists of the priestocracy pretend it. The solution given by man, is false. God has his way to have all things possible, not man's folly, that involves crime, evil, negatives of God's good. Peculiar faith, with all its iniquitous disguises, and false pretences about religion, is nothing but an insidious form of despotic government. Most of the peculiar faiths have been handed down without analysis. The ancients could not analyze the complex ideas about good and evil, that the last is the negative of the other.

It is mind's perversions and deficiencies that cannot comprehend these things. God might as well have a million of angels to prop up this earth, as only to carry messages. An angel means a messenger. Now, if he needed one angel for any such business, he needed then the whole crowd, and the whole fabric of the priestocracy creation, would have gone to the speediest chaos. What blockheads, the dramatists, not to carry out the whole consistently. The whole creed is utterly defective, and falls to the ground. If any defender seeks to uphold it, he will make it and himself utterly ridiculous. The very thing that the world should discuss properly, the facts are there withheld by the false pretences men. What is the position between the main sects of peculiar faith? Will a christian love a Jew? Why not? O, he is of different faith. That kills the objector dead.

Why does not the monotheist approve: why are there any conflicts? The monotheist has no temporal interest in the priestocracy speculation, and if there be conflicts, they come from the peculiar faith-priestocracy, who seek loaves and fishes.

Will all the world peculiar faith people never learn that they are stupidly, constantly exposing themselves and outraging God, by perpetrating fooleries, pretending to miracles and prophecies, to impeach pure religion and render her odious, discarding the unity of God in his sublime supremacy? Was there ever such suicidal policy with any but maniacs? Who but jesuitical priestocracies could have ever devised such absurd abominations? All peculiar faith corrupts the world-mind. What can we learn from peculiar faith pulpits? Mind is misled all the time from God of the universe to the peculiar god of the priestocracy, who must be represented by them and their bibles, else they would drop into insignificance and annihilation at once. That is the difference between the God of the universe and the peculiar god of the priestocracy, and their cliques and minions, that the first embraces religion, whereas peculiar faith people and bibles have to sustain the other. What a god, people, a monstrosity, that draws the sword, and puts the father against the son, makes the sectarian christ quarrel with his father Jew, the Protestant quarrel eternally with his father the Romanist, puts the people of the world together by their ears and hearts, by their low, degraded feuds, pits a large part of the world against another part, that seduces the world from the true faith to which it is antagonized by the bribery of the priestocracy, and bribes conscience to commit blasphemies, perjury, surrendering the best only fund, God-given, the best future happiness for an earthly non-entity. Where is mind? Crushed by its own heel, made by despotism and sophistry. As peculiar bibles beget peculiar faith, what is that worth to rational mind or its God? Who can define peculiar faith? Is it definable? It cannot possess the rational mind, of course. What a monster, then, with which the light and peace of God cannot dwell.

It has taken mind thousands of years to master peculiar faith, the intruder by toleration, how long will it take it to reach rational religion? The ancients sacrificed ostensibly millions to peculiar faith. What do the moderns sacrifice? The idea of making mind and people peculiar, could only have originated with the degraded jesuitical bigotry of priests' selfishness. How correct it? By church? That has no principle. Principles must correct it. God proves his own record; how then can he prove man's? Man's only proves itself by conforming to God's principles, from which, if divergent, its perversion is self-marked. A conservative revolution in all this matter must arise.

A peculiar education may be peculiar seduction of mind. Various are the opinions about the disposition of the soul. The Hindoos would have a different location for souls than the metempsychosis had they been acquainted with the universe.

Give us religion, but no peculiar faith, no such bibles, or priestocracy, or churches. All peculiar faith advocates have diversified pretensions to what is right on the globe, and falling short of universal justice, which is religion. Religion is the consummation of unity, of correct universal appreciation of right.

Let religion advance. Peculiar faith people have had a miserable non-appreciation of it, however desired. The mass of the world mean right about religion, but they have been defrauded, swindled out of their rights. The absolutists and agitators of the world are foolish, thereby cutting short the very cord that binds man to his noblest elevation. They go to bloodshed and its attendant trains, war, pestilence and famine—barbarism. The degraded dwarf-circle of bigotry is in the same dotage for all lifetime. Do not sneak. Adopt principle, and you can face the world. You can triumph over the whole world by one principle. Where does peculiar faith rule? In the pockets of the priestocracy. Where does religion prevail? In rational minds.

Are not the abuses of peculiar faith, most oppressive to mind and the rights of the world?

What but the worst abuse caused the putting down the free state of the Romans, by miscalled brother republicans, for doing the same thing as the last?

The more tyrannical a government, the more influence does church have with state.

All but principles beget creeds, that have the elements of confusion and their own destruction.

Look at the clash of all creeds in the world, and of the world, not of God, whose principles clash not.

What is the difference between any professions of peculiar faith? It is all in degree and variety of alloy.

While one interdicts the bible from the people, all interdict rational mind in faith, and rational discussion, preferring their own blasphemy in interdicting the universal and appropriate rights of God. They exclude the possibility by their traditions, so fast by fetters on the human mind, of obtaining all the legitimate benefits of progressive improvement, from the bible of rational mind, the mental, the only true one.

Their dogmas exclude the humanity of genius, and weigh down mankind by all the iron sceptre of clannishness.

But why the scowl on free rational discussion of religious doctrines, and proscription placed on the correct conclusion?

What do the mere laymen followers of the church know, but to adopt what is called faith?

Can any peculiar system be placed on the merits of reason, before the people? They can only seek faith that betrays the rights of the people.

No rational being can withhold reason about faith, if he do, then all are withheld from him as absurdly.

What difference is there, whether there be thousands, three or four Gods, all is polytheism?

But what curious character the prince of the power of the air, has had by authority of the bible.

"Satan is said to have fallen from heaven with all his company." The bible's heaven is not equal to the modern earth. He is the evil genius of the world; of course, if the bible's God permits this, he participates in the act: what a libel.

Peculiar faith in all ages of the world, mythical or fanatical, seems to be the deepest conspiracy of mind perverted to override mind, crushed by brute force and sophistry.

It had to improve, as the mind of the people improved, by regular gradations, and its burdens from the building of pyramids to that of temples, was in accordance thereto. The peculiar faith of foreigners, is called that of heathenism, as if they were the only barbarians.

Peculiar faith that admits Polygamy as the Hebrew patriarchal dispensation, demoralizes most ignominiously, the world.

Rational law that emanates from rational religion, excludes all such peculiar faith, and its felonious customs.

Constitutional representative republicanism, requires rational laws that legalizes marriage according to the arbitrament of nature, that approximates equality of number in the sexes.

When peculiar faith prevails, the people are liable to any amount of false steps and position, as any amount of such faith may be added.

Reformation will never heal the corruption, as it is too partial, therefore conservative revolution is necessary to exclude the errors of faith, that are too powerful for reformation.

All peculiar faith is priest faith, from which we might ask the good Lord to deliver us, were it not useless to ask delivery from the worst of all corrupt governments, when the world's people make themselves participant in their corrupt ignorance and degrading superstition.

All that adopt peculiar faith, have never appreciated the universe author, and may expect to be cashiered by the holy chancery, if they knowingly continue the error, along with all those that join peculiar faith churches from any but pure motives.

There are low characters of all persuasions, that are reckless of the laws of God and man, conscience and mind.

All priest-faith dies hard, with its many heads this dragon has to be cut down.

CONFESSION.

Confession is boasted of as a triumph in peculiar faith, when securing by remorse of conscience a few dollars overdrawn.

Rational religion prevents all that at first, by one of its chief attributes, honesty.

Do we hear of the numerous murders concealed and confession withheld; the thousands of corruptions unknown and unredressed? The priestocracy's confessional the most desirable of all, to be made for the highest of all crimes, blasphemy to the God of the universe.

Of the fornication and adultery, that may lead to murder and many miseries.

Are the principals themselves guiltless?

What confessional of faith can sin make to sin?

Arrest not by reckless impiety God's attributes, sinful, weak mind.

Thou canst reach the very elements of proper sense, to assume this character.

Undertake not to define the limits and character of God, the fountain of all wisdom.

Recall thy libel, and repent of thy iniquity and blasphemy.

Let us hear only of religion that reason can hail as affording all the elements of greatness of mind, dignity of character, performance of duty, and rendition of highest allegiance to the Almighty.

It is idle, useless, and absurd, to expect any other means than through the responsible mind of each rational being, to overcome all obstacles in life, and reach all that belongs to it in its whole duty.

How important, then, is confession to a mortal!

We can neither speak to the world, nor indite a book, without recurring to the requirements and responsibility of rational mind that denounces all such stuff.

All we say and do, are by, through, and for mind, not ignorant stultified priests. But all this is of a piece, with the other ridiculous machinery of priestocracy and peculiar faith.

When the world becomes enlightened, then peculiar faith cannot exist.

It will die an ignoble death, the tool of absolutism.

Citizens, patriots, and philanthropists, decide this mighty question, the sooner the better.

Then the narrow and contracted policy of nations and societies can be liberalized, and the whole world march onward to true greatness and its inherent glory, by its most extensive comprehension of unity.

Then the remotest parts of the earth will come to know each other; and even China will open her ports voluntarily to the good of all; and the inside, as the outside barbarians, will unite in its completion.

There will be no violation of the trust of the mighty boon, mind; and all nations will impeach and discard all other bibles but that of rational mind.

They will adopt what is now instituted, The Order of the Universal Brotherhood, that embraces all the essentials and principles becoming to all societies, for it embraces all.

The Order of Odd Fellows and Temperance, Masons, and all can now unite on this mighty basis for universal good, and be necessarily absorbed thereby.

Peculiar faith has been a curse upon mind wherever it has been introduced. There can be no exception.

The history is that of sophistry and absolutism, forever antagonistical to mind's rights.

The Egyptian faith supplanted the Hindoo, and much of Europe and Africa.

The faith of Bhudda supplanted the Egyptian or Brahmin for a time, but was finally expelled from the supremacy.

The doctrine of Bhudda has invaded China, but the state faith of Confucius holds it in abeyance.

Christianity was introduced there centuries ago, and yet makes no progress. Mahometanism supplanted much of the faith of Asia, and kept military rule over Hindostan, till christianity comes over the same country, by the sword, pure military power, to rule out Mahometanism and Brahminism.

With all, there is a mighty jar, and but little proselytism. All exclude rational religion, and its lofty social adoration of God the Creator.

Mind to-day, has to seek the true faith, that rules out all by most potent reason.

Judaism has been divested of much value by Christianity, Mahometanism and Mormonism, superseding it.

Judaism has but little to complain, as she innovated in rational faith.

The christian faith soon splits as all peculiar faith. The potency of councils is invoked in vain to preserve its unity.

Arianism splits the church into fragments—that are with difficulty collected—after mutual triumphs and losses, massacres and bloodshed.

Not only many bishops are exiled and banished, but the Crusades were gotten up by false faith-people.

The bible is upheld by the vile sophistry of false-faith people. The idea of hero-worship, demigods, a mere matter of sophistry and flattery, arose in the days of popular ignorance, when deep cunning prevailed over true wisdom. Religion, most rational, must rule the mass, human nature, and all its speculation. Put yourself on principle, and you are fortified in defence against the fiercest assaults of the world, and competent to meet your God-creator. This is what is called virtue, and is certainly rational religion. The world must get rid at once of all the fool systems of peculiar faith.

Every world-patriot should scout that miserable position that causes talents and creative genius to pay obeisance to it, instead of exalting themselves and the world to its designed elevation.

The Roman absolutism, armed with the potency of infallibility, loses nevertheless its eastern churches, that became Greek, and finally many of its western, by protestantism.

Its pure orthodoxy is rank heterodoxy at the tribunal of mind, after all the sanguinary contests to secure it.

She warred by crusades, ineffectually, for centuries, to obtain conquests, but her gospel was put back by Mahometanism, and now the pope has been a curse upon his own country, seeking to murder republicanism, to maintain an usurpation.

What first principles of humanity or religion has this power, that has prostituted all at the shrine of mind's basest corruption?

More injury has been done the whole world, under the pretence of faith, than by all other means whatever.

The world would have been far happier and better, without any peculiar faith at all.

All such faith has only presented the world the shattered fragments of a broken brotherhood, that rational religion justly revolts at.

What is the world benefited by the persecution of dissenters, the bloody tragedy of the Vaudois, the rebellious clergy?

Whether "the interior of Asia, for many hundred miles square, had never been visited by any christian missionary" until 1849, or not, rational minds have the assurance that God is omnipresent, and that mind is the rightful guardian.

What matters it whether the Brahmins profess to teach science by divine authority, if the ignorance and superstition of the world did not enslave mind to believe their pretences?

All such imposition would die of itself if mind rightly counteracted it.

The light of mind-science never irradiated the crusade ages, and consequently superstition and bigotry, not religion, prevailed.

If mind could have had the mastery all had been right.

But peculiar faith cannot be enforced by the sword, nor propagated sincerely by all the delusion of sophistry.

How can the God of religion, favor any species of superstition?

Efforts have been made in all continents, but arms and conquests will not do.

Rational religion decides against peculiar faith, and she will, ere long, be scouted from the face of the earth.

The Indian of America believes in a Great Spirit, the Great First Cause, that puts to blush the asserter of the plurality of gods.

How impiously and blasphemously has God been treated, by the peculiar faith barbarians!

How cruelly have God's creatures been treated by them!

What, for centuries, was done for the millions of Indians? They have felt the force of the peculiar faith dispensation of the whole—the fire-water and the arms of the whites—something more potent than the gospel, to give them a receptacle to the spirit land. Yet they cling, with a laudable tenacity, to the Great Spirit.

Is not conquest made of all pagans, and would it not be of all other sects, by the sword, had the sword been available on the day of trial?

But the cimeter of the Mahometan was too strong for the sword of the Christian at that time.

Now, when civilization has spread, the Christian only wars on the pagan, and the partially civilized in creed, as the natives of the various continents, if they are behind in the use of weapons of war of the present day. But it is all still pagan against pagan.

Who can deny the crimes of bibles of tradition, that gave each sect inheritance of all that it could get, as the propagation of their peculiar faith accompanied the conquest?

To possess the lands of the heathen, the elect did God service in the action of possession!

The majority of the world is not aware of the remote consequences of these real heresies on principles.

What but the sword will define the rights of orthodoxy of peculiar faith? What shall stop the progress of such crime? Principles alone define the true extent of that position, that must be placed on the highest grounds of justice.

We can see the miserable delusion of sectarianism, when one sect seeks wars, unlimited in country and time, on others, to stay the proselytism that was going forward, and the conversion of the people, by an eternal enmity.

Races of men are not natural enemies, neither are professors of religion—the farthest from it, but all are natural friends, and would continue sincere friendship, but for faith charlatans, the real enemies of both and mankind.

Which ought to be put down?

Give us the value of enlarged and liberal views, without any bigoted policy of the age.

It is our highest duty and right not only to abolish all others, but institute all that is necessary, legitimate and correct.

We should have, at all times and occasions, a foreshadowing forecast, a judicious analogy and analysis.

All classes are invoked and identified by inseparable interests and indispensable duties and business, from the physical laws of nature, that are paramount to man's pretences.

The balance, or equilibrium of the universe, as paramount, can demand the right revolution and orbit of any system of worlds, that all harmony be maintained, and all right be executed.

No less, in the moral world, has mind the right to restrict and require the same rule, to exclude the many avenues to base, degraded usurpations, and monopoly of tyrant powers.

The best of those, avowing peculiar faith, cannot justify themselves before God.

Even christians admit that they have many and stormy doubts about their having religion. This is honest, and would be consistent, when they find that it is utterly impossible for them to have any on any such impracticable basis.

Who could doubt the rational position advanced in monotheism, that reverently and righteously only asks the aid of the God of nature.

On our last day, and at the last moment, this position will present the only justification before God.

Let not remorse, bitter and little availing, be yours on that important occasion.

You must act up to the possession of your belief of the soul's immortality and responsibility.

You must perceive that sectarianism propagates and disseminates doctrines at enmity to God.

The benevolence attributed to peculiar faith is through the innate principles of religion.

It is idle to say that one system of peculiar faith exceeded another as better, when all are deficient in primary and paramount virtues and attributes.

Wherein is any better? In departing from religion and God, and overwhelming by its greater influence the divine rights of mind?

The peculiar faith that is best appreciated has been most destructive to the lives and interests of the sovereign people?

The human mind is in a progressive state of improvement, independent of all such incidents of faith, and should have the intrinsic characteristics of religion.

Did any author of any such system discover any principle, other than the constituent of the universe, all of which belong to God? No.

Then all such are no creators, but usurpers and blasphemers of the Creator, impostors on men, only fit for vulgar belief, amenable to heaviest penalty.

But what harm would ensue from belief of revelation, though false?

It stands, as all false faiths, in the way of truth and rational religion.

The extreme proof has been at Rome as elsewhere, all over the world.

All on earth are punished for errors, more or less, and this thing of peculiar faith affects the whole world.

Our errors beget penalties, more or less, and remorse is no little part at times.

Reform belongs to the light of enlightened mind, and is constituted by repentance necessarily.

Now, repentance for what, as expressed by peculiar faith? It is duty to God and man that constitutes religious and moral sentiments.

What is the revelation of peculiar faith worth?

Is it anything like religion?

As to all the science of peculiar faith, we must make allowances for what mind has done, and cannot, possibly, omit to mention its illustrious deeds.

What shall atone for the omissions of peculiar faith, that pretends to usurp the claims of mind, through science?

Which are most abominable, her pretences to religion or to science? Peculiar faith is the vilest impostor on earth.

When we hear of the uncivilized embracing peculiar faith, that is evidence that they have not realized the proper benefit of civilization.

The history of paganism proves this.

Palestine has been ruled by the Jews, Romans, and Mahometanism, and has not yet seen the light of civilization.

All Judaism, with all its pretensions, could not civilize the Hebrews?

All the peculiar faiths of the world could not civilize the world!

Civilization is an act of enlightened mind, not of peculiar faith; the first comprehends God's principles, the last the faith and acts of individual leaders.

The result of peculiar faith tends to cause bishops to grow rich in a country of starving poor, that die poor by the million.

No matter the injunction of peace, when self-interest dictates, we can observe popes, the professed representatives of peace, urge nations, monarchical or republican, to war, and even receive their own papal power in bloodshed of their own fellow citizens.

The true analysis of mind will prove the doctrines of peculiar faith fully carried out, as leading to bloodshed, and this proof is in the appeal to history.

What were the murders of New England and Europe for witchcraft of all ages and both sexes, but from fanaticism of faith?

The Quakers of that province were awfully persecuted, no less the dissenters, who were exiled to Rhode Island. It is mind, not doctrine, that has been falsely claimed, that imparts the noble principles of morality and religion, nothing else will on this earth. It is folly and stupid nonsense, to expect any other source.

Faith must be subordinate to civilization, when it is peculiar.

The best as it is by excellence claimed, makes its God one-third or one-fourth of an imbecile being.

Men are better, as they are wiser, at this day, when a school-boy that has not had any peculiar education, contemns any murderous peculiar faith that burnt scholars at the stake for opinions in science!

Peculiar faith is an impostor, dictating in science and government.

What would she not do to-day, if mind permitted her?

Any peculiar faith is as deep in the mud, as the others are in the mire.

The novelty of a faith is no proof of its truth, which no custom nor fashion, but analysis, decides.

All kinds of peculiar faith, the best that can be devised, perform the bloody oblations of superstition in human sacrifices, through all ages of its existence.

Tory is peculiar faith by her fruits and deeds, not by her professions and faith: is one any better than the rest?

Is there any proof of superiority, but as the emanation of a better age and more improved mental cultivation?

If mind under any culture of peculiar faith, was peculiarly better a saint on earth, then we admit the superiority absolute, but we have to deny all the premises when the results are inadequate.

What essential difference of goodness is there between any such faith?

Opinions or faith of men doubtful and uncertain, not trustworthy, do not alter God's position of things.

What can be peculiar to any system, that is common in God's principles?

If mind carry out the principles, it elicits the best already, for its good and best happiness.

Much good may be effected when mind has the ascendancy, but take mind away from the peculiar faith, and faith becomes fanatic and tyrannical. As to government of passions, the sins that are evils, resulting as the negative of conservative principles, science and philosophy teach their correction.

What can peculiar faith avail with them, when mind has no control of the self-government?

What is the difference between good citizens well educated and well behaved, and those the best of any peculiar faith?

The excellence and light of rational mind, equalize them.

What then becomes of peculiar faith on its best behavior, and that under the restriction of civilization? But in its worst behavior, it is the fanatical scourge of the world.

Unlike fire, it is the worst of masters, yet it is not fit to be owned as a slave. You cannot trust it with any power.

It is useless, and has failed to meet the puffs of its advocates, but increases the sum of human misery.

What can we do with it, when the attributes of God preclude its admission, its own demerits preclude its retention? Misery and evil, its concomitants, will result to human life, rational religion makes them the least, and the most of human happiness.

The last invokes the aid of science and philosophy as the more wisdom, the less folly and wickedness.

The earth has its mixtures and alloys, and rational religion can best temper them.

Universal happiness cannot inure to man's soul while on earth, but a right education and morals can remedy the greatest defects and errors of mind.

God has given the functions, mind must exert the actions and exercise.

Peculiar faith ever degenerates into superstition, man-worship and imposition, when the whole comprehension of the subject is not in abeyance to the faculties of intelligent mind, the only beneficiary.

Conscience all the time is to preside over this vast subject, and necessarily excludes all such faith that is too peculiar to be true

Ignorance presided at the first start of peculiar faith; now the best philosophy is most substantially the best supporter of the best religion.

We can easily challenge refutation when miracles, the product of the grossest ignorance, are referable to imposition.

Magic powers of psychology can be the cause of mental illusion and delusion; when analyzed are the beautiful exhibitions of natural phenomenon.

The modern adoption of all pretences of this kind, as recognised by ancient fictions, has but little apology for the advocates.

Rational religion, as directed by science, ought to preclude all such now.

Mankind needs religion, not peculiar faith, as the first blesses, the last curses the world.

All religion does promote honesty and truth, and will exclude peculiar faith that nurtures sophistry and false pretences.

Men interested particularly in peculiar faith, that necessarily and universally depends on false pretences, will go to the extent necessary for that interest.

Are the advocates of any peculiar faith any better than the rest of the world? In what?

Do they excel in mind, deeds and morals, well behaved citizens?

There never was a system of peculiar faith, messiahship and all, but what there was the greatest zeal to have it estimated as infallible and orthodox, to surmount all reason, and reason's God, if necessary. The object is to make it live, if all others die. No object can be stopped short of, that will obtain it. Will perjury, force, ambition be despised in its consummation? Never.

What partizan priests ever abjured their peculiar faith?

The great object was, through the influence of moral doctrines that accorded passports to heaven the most captivating, besides all earthly anticipations, if the faith was successful.

Christianity, that was persecuted for centuries by other peculiar faiths of polytheism, persecuted with vindictive fury the world, as far as practicable, when she came into power.

It is too late for any attempt to render any peculiar faith dignified with orthodoxy, against the inalienable rights of conscience and reason.

Many forms of peculiar faith avail in barbarism, as savages have not attained the right use of reason. Races are to be estimated, as some cannot rise far into any scale of civilization, by reason of their natural talents.

Phrenology proves this on principles of physiology. While Greece, Rome and a few others had grown into much comparative civilization for their ages, eighteen centuries or more ago, many nations fell below it. The world has to abide and suffer from all the miserable systems of faith teachings and doctrines, and cannot help itself from the dogmas and false pretences of its teachers, who recoil at the loss of self-interest, not at the sacrifice of the world.

What but fraud and imposition gave license and authority at first for peculiar faith, that has existed under all the forms of superstition to the present times.

Superstition, the inseparable companion that invariably attends peculiar faith, ever abides with all states short of civilization; and, of course, civilization can never be governed by the faith of uncivilized mind.

The world acts blindly from interest, fear, and custom, without reason, that governs in civilization.

All the peculiar faith of Judaism and its posterity, Christianity, Mahometanism, and Mormonism, with its progenitors the Egyptian, the Brahmin, &c., emanated from the three imperfect states of mind, the hunter, pastoral, and tiller of the soil; and have dwarfed the God of the universe to the provincial peculiar god of each, that had the sacrifice of victims in their own blood.

Peculiar faith aspires unwisely to unsolvable problems, wild as the perpetual motion is at present.

After all, there is only a minority now on any one side of peculiar faith, or gospel side, and shall that, erroneous as it is, rule the large majority of thinkers for themselves, and aiming to be right?

Good and true citizens of the globe must see that mind be not perverted by false teachings.

They must investigate the whole purpose of their being, and not be divested of their birth-right.

Peculiar faith can easily render multitudes of mind vassal, and that decides the necessary facility for fraud, perjury, and complete deception.

One of the perversions of mind by the sophistry of peculiar faith is, if we doubt we are damned.

This is one of the most iniquitous pretences to logic, reason, and religion.

The only faith that is worth thought is through the principal only true and living God, and that reason teaches through present science.

Another vile piece of arrant humbuggery and sophistry is, with God everything is possible.

This is in the mouth of every pretender to interpretation of God's universe, no matter the defective system of science or reason. Is folly possible with God? What libel, O vain and ignoble man.

Make the whole question of theology refer to God, mind, science, and the universe, and then the world will all see the dignity of religion, that gives all capable of receiving all the advantages of progressive improvements of the spirit of the age.

Rational mind is independent of the elements of peculiar faith, and repels priests and preachers, only receives, as they are identified with the whole people, who are the beneficiaries before God and religion.

Modern statesmen treat the people as sovereigns, while the ancients mistreated them as vassals, to stand at a distance from things called holy.

What need we of a gospel scheme, that adopts man instead of principles, peculiar faith for rational religion, blind faith for enlightened mind and science.

Peculiar faith refers to a messiah, an irresponsible deputy; religion refers to the principal, who is responsible for his creation, and bound to preserve mind to the best of his attributes for appropriate happiness.

Let us hear no more of the contingency of such imbecile substitutes.

No peculiar faith is exact or certain, because it is booked; an adherence to its mere partisan conduct can hardly be justice.

Nations that have governmental peculiar faith do not follow the principle of returning good for evil, but if their conquests are criterion, return evil for good in many instances.

Who can trust his life, happiness and rights of mind, at all, in the power of peculiar faith?

Peculiarity of nations, persons or churches, shows the peculiar designs of man, but universality shows God.

All peculiar faith persuasions have had so many failures, that man's peculiarity is conspicuous.

Mind must set about something else.

It is high time that mind's rights should be heard, in defence of the truth of its position, that all the defects of peculiar faith, that outrages so many and abundant facts in the world's history, be exposed.

The butcheries of peculiar faith, without number, and inquisitors creative of all the violations of the very attributes and essence of religion, rational and true, revolting to all reasonable minds, should be repressed. Dissentient in her thousand divisions of secession, assuming to be divine in all, she pursues with a unity of tyranny her speculations in the world's richest treasures. Her bibles accumulated in all kinds of mythology, under all the deepest devices of cunning and Jesuitry, have been handed down, with constant care of her pretensions and assumptions, that could not be counteracted nor resisted by individuals, or isolated exertions, that were feeble and impotent, against her collusions.

Citizen, are you battling for peculiar faith, spell-bound to the delusion, whose malign influence you cannot appreciate?

Have nothing to do with a cause, that debases and corrupts mind, the world.

But you believe in revelation, you may say.

All kinds of peculiar faith are peculiar, and have peculiar revelations—all are fictions, necessarily.

What is the evidence of your position being right?

You will have to seek a circuitous route to that point, that will be worth nothing, after it is advanced.

All such can never be proved, for it is disproved by even God's attributes, at once.

How dangerous to the world's liberty and happiness, are the shackles of peculiar faith, that pretends to be religious faith, yet the most oppressive of all the world's tyrannies, and subversive of religion.

In this respect, most of the world do not assert their proper rights, if they know them.

When reformation took place in peculiar faith, the light of mind called for it, not peculiar faith. Now conservative revolution is demanded, by all the lights of the world, over all peculiar faiths.

Institutions of mind must be properly sought, to change spongers, idlers, and drones, into industrious and responsible citizens, well raised and well behaved, by equalizing popular rights, and lessening the difficulties of making a living, and giving more legitimate facilities to the people at large.

Why the reformation of Luther, if mind and reason had not triumphed over corrupt peculiar faith?

Why or how does one peculiar faith displace another, but on this principle?

If the Hebrew peculiar faith was that, by excellence, to save the world, what was it doing for thousands of years, if that was the chosen one of God, the light and salvation of the world?

The silence of this savage chosen people decides the inutility for all nations.

Whose hosts of people suffered so awfully by their superstition, from first to last, as the Jews?

Of course, they rejected, by the despotism of their priestocracy, mind and reason, and have naught—the bibles of tradition being impostures.

In the differences of peculiar faith, that distract the affection of families, society, and country, the whole world is not only unpleasantly but disastrously situated.

But party is the life of the world—what would it do, if all were of one peculiar faith?

The party of principles, not the faction of peculiar opinions, is essential in all rational discussions, where light is needed.

When the universal action of rational mind is predominant, then rational religion is in the right position. While the only victories in religion must be gained on facts, not in casuistry, the feelings of the world are still situated as partisans for peculiar faith, not yielding readily from bigotry, prejudice and ignorance to the facts of the case.

Hence it is not the authority of men, but the principles of the faith that meet the world's wants. But the mind cannot comprehend all about the mysteries of peculiar faith, and it never will, never should, if priests permit its foul impositions.

Pure religion has no mysteries, prophecy, nor miracles, but plain matter of fact views.

The advocates for peculiar faith seek the reason in referring to the tree, the grass, the flower, the growth of vegetation, for mortals to tell the process. What sense is there in the appeal, presenting neither analysis, analogy nor parallel point in the statement?

The word of God is addressed through God's avenue, reason, to mind, for mind to understand by plain facts of science. The advocates of peculiar faith expose themselves, in refusing all this to enlightened mind.

But what rational mind can yet explain all about God's universal documents, the solar systems? that prove conclusively a perfect God.

We see and believe vegetation to grow, from inherent enlargements and the products, and the fruit decides the value. All this is a part of the universe proof of its God.—Such is proof positive, but the book men affecting miracles destroy all pretence to truth, for God rules creation by conservative, not reversed or destructive principles.

There can be then no miracles in creation, otherwise the Creator is imbecile.

The advocates of peculiar faith object to phrenology, but as the system of physiological phrenology does not conflict but agree with rational religion, we are bound to admit its exact appreciation, however peculiar faith is in antagonism with both and all the facts of creation.

Peculiar faith does not look to the zenith of intellect, but to nadir of self-interest.

Some never attain, while others pass it and become puerile.

As all men's systems of peculiar faith have failed and will for ever fail, let reason and the God of reason have theirs, and as God and reason are above man and folly, so will be the first exalted to the most sublime of virtue and her noblest blessings.

The intrigue, malice and hypocrisy are antagonistic in peculiar faith, and defeat themselves.

Minds, blinded by peculiar faith, cannot appreciate rational religion.

Any other than rational faith, places mind more or less in a psychological state.

People think of the profit of self-interest, not of the good part. Are the revenues, the profit, the inducements and power of the church, nothing to influence? But what are all such to the people's rights, thereby violated?

The reward immortal is conditional and only contingent in peculiar faith, and perverted minds hasten to secure their's on this earth.

We desire no peculiar faith that drowns reason and enslaves mind.

What is the value of peculiar faith to those who backslide or err? Yet all that look to principle cannot err intentionally, otherwise true religion is necessarily unknown.

Under the auspices of principle and science, the best position is obtained for truth, honesty, sound judgment and modesty.

Mystery about the seed vegetating and the word of God is all dissatisfactory, as all present no analogy nor parallel. All systems of peculiar faith are for the benefit of the priests and their dynasty. They bespeak that man's qualities and attributes are too selfish for general good, if they be perverted. He cannot displace but must control them, by the will of enlightened cultivation.

The idea of sect is not innate to true religion, but to peculiar faith, and never can be anything else. Any other opinion is utterly preposterous. The Roman affects the name of Catholic and rejects the proper position in substance, at the same time being utterly incompetent to attain universal principles in peculiarity in faith. His position never can be catholic.

God's attributes are universal, and any faith not to be antagonistic, must be of universal constituency and nothing less.

Analysis will prove conclusively that reason, unity, and universality catholicism, characterize God.

Peculiar faith and bibles of tradition are of the same character, all are worthless and treacherous.

But thanks to God of mind, all false systems carry within themselves, the elements of their own destruction. The sectarianism of peculiar faith is fast developing that result, in most of its secessions of the present day. The true spirit of prophecy which is analogy from reason on the world's analysis, declares their progressive ruin and extirpation, for all these are perverted minds' deepest collusions that shall mould, whilst the ever living authority of Deity becomes more vital and immortal.

The peculiarity of sect adheres not to the liberal universal spirit of rational religion.

The very necessity for separation of church and state, impeaches the parties as involved in corruption. All peculiar faiths are thus amenable.

The best code of peculiar faith selected from the world of their systems, can only lead us through partisan faith to the chief propagator, and what does all such avail the world's age?

Rational beings must see which of the two, peculiar or rational faith, can best govern the world's whole interests. The pious frauds committed in behalf of peculiar faith or of their authors, are beyond conception. The very first acts of such proselytes is that of cheating their God by faith, to swindle mind of its rights, in most detestable ways.

They must know as clearly as they see God's works, that God is present everywhere, and may be called upon by appropriate duty ever necessary and expedient in thoughts, words, and deeds, actions rather than by words of prayer.

The prayer of duty can only be made through the prayer of thoughts, words, and deeds, the prayer of action towards mankind, yet mind perverted leaves the author of its existence and benefits, and recurs to the pretences of the priestocracy, and thus cheats itself, at the same time opens the door of future injury for its conscience that may be or not violated, only to be answered by motives to be judged of at the supreme tribunal.

If, then, all churchmen's first steps are those of self-delusion, deception, or intentional imposition, what proper guarantees can the conscientious persons have in adherence to such faith?

Many sectarian peculiar faiths are split into hundreds of fragments, surely so, as blind faith not on analogy and analysis of reason, precedes works that alone are to be looked at by mind.

What is the enemy of constitutional liberty?

Absolutism in peculiar faith, government, and aristocracy of money. All these are in abeyance to aristocracy of mind. The world is cut up into fragments of clans, that if they do not aid beyond their own little circle, fail in best actions of the greatest good to the greatest number.

What wise man will give anything for peculiar faith, that is all things to all men all over the globe?

Is there any faith that separates you from the unity of God? Depend on it, it is an evil that you cannot rightly embrace. What guarantee does all such give mind on earth equal to principles?

Who would give, if wise, one iota for any character that overlooks principles; and who do that more than messiahs?

What guarantee for good character has any in all peculiar faith professions?

If peculiar faith was an abstraction, we might be satisfied to let time remedy without interpretation; but it is a troublesome superstition, that becomes bigotry, fanaticism and tyranny.

When peculiar faith becomes speculative, and unites with absolutism, all-governing authorities in excess, and when does it not do all these and more if permitted, then mankind ought to put it down as the worst species of tyranny?

Its false tastes are not quite so bad, but eventually malign, when it may run into ridiculous states of invoking from the universe intercessors, other than God, may affect belief of visions, and exhibit the various influences of trifling with the souls of the world by pretended miracles, mere sleight of hand or mind-jugglery; but all denote a contemptible, obnoxious influence on the human mind.

How long shall it be ere such vulgar prejudices and superstitions are superseded by the reflective part of mankind, who are truthful and honest? Not until original thinkers exert themselves as freemen, free from electioneering and corruption, and act as intelligent and correct-minded citizens.

Such will observe that the creation shows order and symmetry, the work and design of a Supreme artist, who moves it with electricity, and balances it by gravitation.

The best regulation of the world will be by principles; and all society is best regulated when it resorts to full principles, as all its members are best benefited thereby. You ask for the greatest good of society, and yet you practice its greatest evil, peculiar faith!

However abundantly peculiar faith prevails, what does that profit religion?

Mexico, ay, even England, that is so conspicuous in the world, are surfeited with a state peculiar faith, and present a large class of their population ignorant, and of course superstitious.

With all your peculiar faith, show us an ignorant people, and we must see a superstitious and degraded set of people.

Some countries with state faith do not even tolerate other faiths to any participation of citizenship. Where is the freedom of mind? If, then, peculiar faith produces all these evils, away with all such abuses, that help to crush the world.

If any wish us to adopt his views and faiths, we must first have the full proof of their worthiness; God did not give us more than five senses, hence they require proof, else he would have given us a sixth sense, which inspiration of revelation, with its false pretences, affects to supply.

God's works prove him the Creator and Preserver, so that none in their senses can deny them.

The world has been blasted by speculative peculiar faith. It has been seared by its horrid crimes.

When advocates ask the world credence in their faith, without satisfactory reasons for that faith, then they act dishonestly at once, and do an injury all the time to morals, truth, honesty, and purity of mind, the greatest desideratum in the world for both sexes.

If we preserve truth and honesty, we preserve chastity and dignity of human nature.

Are we to take peculiar faith of the Asiatics or Africans, who could not give freemen laws?

The peculiar faith of miracles, prophecies, mysteries and enigmas is an abomination in the sight of God and his religion, a degradation to mind and the human character. But there has been no superstition so absurd, no rites so cruel or barbarous and criminal, no peculiar policy so tyrannical, but that they have, at one time or another, had followers, who carried out successfully for a period the misdirected perversions of mind.

What part of the world has not been beset by superstition? Let us rid the world of it, and man-worship. How? By reason and religion.

By this time intelligent, unprejudiced people must see that it is superstition that still stalks her hour on the stage of life, and ought to be expelled.

All good and true people ought to unite in arresting the downward tendency of morals.

We address those of independence of character, not faces of wax, or people of straw.

The mind of the ignorant mass in all ages is assimilated; hence it is difficult to eradicate old or new impressions.

We must desire minds enlarged and cultivated, that can protect themselves through God's light and spirit.

What power has peculiar faith with the last, when all such know positively that it has need only of universal religion, which is dignified, as it comes from God?

If the light of any peculiar faith blazed, the blaze was that of fanaticism, not of science, for centuries. Its absolutism flourished on the soil of serfdom, and nations have to undergo a transition state to be rescued. To extirpate heresy to peculiar faith, Francis the First of France issued an order that any person that refused to sign the confessions of faith, should be deprived of all offices, and burnt alive without further trial.

This produced the massacre of the Huguenots of France. The sanguinary persecution of the protestants overran much of Europe.

The design was to exterminate heresy by fire and sword, and to extinguish civil and religious liberty. The dynasty that assumed this prerogative was composed of state and church absolutism, and contained in one felonious mass judges, accusers, prosecutors, witnesses and executioners.

The persecutions of the protestants in Holland were most dreadful. The spirit that prevailed was the malign demon of peculiar faith, for protestants that were persecuted to exile from Europe, in America persecuted a more peaceful sect.

And what saves the world now from the ferocious piracy of this fell and dangerous tyrant? Any church association? That is the very thing, if possessed of power, to play the tyrant. It cannot be trusted one moment, for it is the most dangerous tool of barbarian cruelty and vindictiveness.

There is no virtue in any of it, vile and degraded in corruption and vulgar ignorance as it is.

It is the great evil genius of the world and mind. It mistakes superstition for religion, credulity for faith, and the oracles of priestocracy for the enlightened principles of the Almighty.

Its peculiar notions cause its peculiar god to speak as it chooses. In the sight of its fanaticism, patriotism had no virtue.

What, then, is heresy? It is an error of opinion about religion, not to be corrected short of the science and philosophy of civilization.

Of course, then, those that issued orders for confessions of faith proved themselves exempt from the holiest inspirations of religion in its purity.

Had the dynasty of peculiar faith thus propagated its doctrines, the world had been depopulated.

Where would mankind have been, but for the blaze of science? In the toils of hypocrisy, or the ruin of the world. But peculiar faith has the peculiar assurance and impudence to lay peculiar claims to science! The christian particularly, assumes this peculiar greatness. The state of science depends on the state of mind, and its facilities for civilization. This is the whole solution.

Science, if to be appropriated, is indebted very much to the Pagans, who outshone all, in some things.

The moderns are indebted much to the Roman law. "The equitable doctrine of Salvage, came from the Roman law," says chancellor Kent.

While peculiar faith appropriates all to its peculiar monopoly and usurpation, religion diffuses to the whole world, by its agent, mind, never proscribed, but advanced in all its legitimate civilization.

Where is the evidence of high principles of sound religion, but in the general benefit of the world?

No form of man-worship yields the point, giving the tears and ruin of the world, instead of its blessings.

The functions of the world can create its rightful possession of happiness, that peculiar faith frustrates, mars and degrades.

Religion is to insure the best results of rational education or cultivation of mind, that is to make man useful and happy, and should embrace all expedients necessary.

Who could stop the heresies of Millerism? None that had faith in the bible of tradition. Thus the heresies of faith are proved by rational mind, to be demoralizing. What heresies can arise but from the false positions of peculiar faith, that has disturbed the world for centuries, on this peculiar point? Its numerous votaries are ready to swear on their creed, and yet all would be antagonistical to each other, and to the only basis of God and truth. Numerous Mormons would no doubt swear that Joe Smith has been seen since his death, that he did not die till his time came, though pierced by many bullets. Their position is analogous to that of the Christian. Both are superstitions.

His oracles when consulted, told as Joe Smith spoke or wished. What more could be desired, but an ignorant people in mass to propagate more successfully this peculiar faith?

These are rich scenes for the world, did they not enslave and corrupt it.

How long shall the best interests of the world be sacrificed to peculiar faith?

Is it right or honorable, to put down right by sophistry, the perversion of truth? Is peculiar faith occupation the return for constitutional religion?

Shall the priests' substitutes of peculiar, prevail over universal good?

There is no reason or principle, for peculiar faith.

Over part of the world the voice of usurping absolutism, not of the sovereign people, is heard, and causes all its curses.

The world from paramount interest, is bound to do away with all that can indoctrinate mind in the least corruption, sway or intimidation.

All secret societies and peculiar faith doctrines, fail in promoting the greatest good to the greatest number, which is universal.

The great struggles between peculiar faiths that have enslaved the world, must die out.

On true analysis of mind passing through its gradations of relative ages of cultivation, we are necessarily convinced of the pernicious effects of superstition, engendered in the diversified theatre of natural phenomena. The tumult of natural elements, as the tornado, hurricane, earthquake, volcano and electricity, have excited ignorant ages to regard them, though the agents, for the cause. As science advances, peculiar faith and superstition recede.

How many of the present systems of peculiar faith have been received by the simple, unthinking world, as the very best that could be proposed, all which the world of absolutism, at one time or another, has conspired to impose on the balance, with all devices and pretences! Peculiar faith is an act of sophistry, that misleads mind. But the advocates of peculiar faith affect that they have the only right one, orthodox or true.

The followers of Christ, Mahomet, Moses, Smith, Bhud, &c. affect all this!

Have they any idea of the only true God, who is to be truly adored by the best actions of mind alone?

That is the first thing enlightened mind has to learn, as the Great First Cause, else the school-boy, or the Indians who believe in the Great Spirit, will outstrip it. The names, whether Hebrew or Greek, of Deity, are not material, when all convey the proper idea of the supreme Creator. All minds are naturally compelled to have ideas of religion, crude or enlightened; they should perfect them in the pure mint of mind, unadulterated with any of the sophistries or absolutism of hierarchists.

All the wise and good should separate themselves from this ignoble crowd, and secure pure ideas of God all the time.

What can we expect of any peculiar faith, but the legitimate fruits of deception, fraud and imposition?

Analyze all peculiar faiths, and this is their correct history. The Christian is as deep, in this obnoxious quagmire.

What other is the Roman, but a system of deep and peculiar faith swindling? "Roman catholic divines had argued, in their writings, in favor of equivocation, mental reservations, perjury, and even assassination." Also, says Macauley, "The clergy were the king's worshippers, and the judges his tools." What cannot absolutism do? Charlemagne assigned to the benedictine Alwin the high office of preparing, from the various sources within his reach, a perfect codex of the holy scriptures."

Peculiar faith has been a system of tything, a taxation for false pretences, and the priestocracy have been peculiar brotherhoods in all ages of mind's perversions. We can well say what corruption prevails by union of church and state, in the case of "Charles II., who refused the Eucharist from the hands of the English church, and died a Roman catholic."

The advocates of peculiar faith must not expect us to believe their doctrine, unless they prove the same to universal propriety, an impossibility forever.

The world may well differ about peculiar faith excitements, but if all do not improve religion on right principles, better had they never existed; for assuredly they do injure society in its most vital parts.

Let none stifle inquiry respecting these principles, whether protestant, Roman, or any other.

When they come to see the matter in its true light, they will adopt the position as the deepest interest to mind, and will discard their own. The world will see the right, if not trammeled.

The Jesuit Journal, The Universe, says, "So long as religious unity exists, civil intolerance is the duty of government." Where would have been his peculiar faith, had it not superseded the preceding one of the country?

Plenary indulgences disgrace the Roman hierarchy. What are phylacteries, but part of the superstition and its imposition? All these are the veriest trifles of mind. The power of the pope can be only upheld by liberal views, tolerated for a time, then go down, as mind marches to its elevation. In principles, mind has something to contend for.

What superstition can be greater, than praying to angels and saints, all priest manufacture?

What corruption can be greater, including the imposition on the people, who are to be preyed upon.

The dominican and franciscan friars before the reformation, were, what the jesuits have been since. They were the most contemptible of all the different orders of the priesthood. The barbarous superstition and ignorance of the multitude, raised them to the supreme state of peculiar faith-influence. "They discovered the most barbarous aversion to the arts and sciences."

The idea that converts to the creed of peculiar faith being competent to decide on its validity for the world's recognition, because they profess such faith, and are members of some church, is too absurd to be entertained.

Do they actually know the definition of religion?

Most do not know the difference between peculiar faith and religion! You affect much merit by songs of praise and thanks. But you pay them in words to a mixed Deity.

Your prayers, as fervent as peculiar faith-devotion can make them, are not paid to the right source.

All are best evinced in actions, and those are due to the God of nature, the Almighty alone.

Your grace before meat, and for the reception of all blessings, can also be expressed louder and more effectually than words, by your actions rightly addressed.

But of what use are prayers for the dead?

Appropriate burial service should be performed by a civil commission, that the living may be benefited, and act rightly, and that relations may do proper justice to their feelings, the rights of humanity, and the proper obligations of civilization.

What avails peculiar faith-phrenzy, but to aggravate her world-wrongs? What can devotees do for the world-blessings that they altogether contravene?

What authority has any king or potentate to assume the title of defender of the faith, catholic majesty, any more than the popes, who assumed to depose kings from their crowns? All these are the tricks of church and state absolutism, to cement a lasting influence.

What piety have any of these superior over the world?

All the laws of psychology and physiology, allow of no infallibility to any mortal. There is no fatalism that has given it, as that does not exist.

Libations were superstitious rites.

It will not do for the moderns to claim any prerogatives for their peculiar faith over any kind of ancient superstition, all of which must succumb to universal principles and their Supreme Creator.

Mind proves before any proper tribunal its own agency and superiority.

After all, peculiar faith has nothing to boast of.

So great was the light shed by the minds of Socrates and Plato, that the first fathers of the christian church, praised them both in some measure as christians.

In what did they, and Origen, the greatest of the christian fathers differ, when he believed in the transmigration of souls?

What has degraded the best institutions of mind but its perversions, and which of these can be worse than those of peculiar faith?

"The most fatal wound of all to the Swiss League" was contention about peculiar faith.

For this, for a long time, they had civil wars.

The disturbances in India have been the worst, from the different orders of Brahmins and Bhuddists.

Nothing can protect nationality and humanity, when lawless, reckless, and faithless pretences of national peculiar faith prevail.

Instead of the ruins of empires, and the destruction of mighty cities, brought about by peculiar faith, and recklessness of principles, religion causes mind to rear its mighty empire over the globe, on permanent conservative principles.

There can be no pure religion in peculiar faith by the nature of things. But smart people, professors of peculiar faith, affect that they certainly know.

Yet how can they, as they have not investigated, nor can they know the whole circle of history and science?

They cannot know intuitively, as that is impossible, therefore they must prove their position, especially messiahship, satisfactory, otherwise they are cut off from any foundation, and their mouths are effectually closed. But what tenable proof can they adduce, after deserting reason for faith?

But converts rely on hearsay, which comes from interested and ignorant partisans whose oath could not be valid as interested.

The errors of peculiar faith are hard to be divested of.

Even Napoleon had his astrological superstition, and spoke of the star of his peculiar destiny.

Numa, the great law-giver of Rome, affected to have sybilline books, to impose on the people whom the cunning world has always treated with contemptible imposition when impunity was practicable.

This has been the door, for all kinds of peculiar tyranny. How much were the poor ignorant barbarians of ancient times imposed on by the necromancers, who pretended to learn of the dead?

Peculiar faith presents no genuine diamond or crystal, nor similar ring. Good citizens, should have no counterfeit or any such means, for agitation of the world.

All this doctrine is supported by special pleadings, sophistry, mental reservations, and the deepest pious frauds. What infamy!

Peculiar faith only advances the pretences of superstition, whose doctrines must be utterly exploded by rational religion that tolerates no messiah. She has no history.

The supposed history of peculiar faith, is a peculiar story—it is one of persecutions. The one that is persecuted by other species of superstition, uses persecution in return. It has the nature of the beast, never to be regenerated. A perfect hyena, it persecutes mind, its very power, and robs God whom it has always blasphemed. Peculiar faith has fought in various ways for thousands of years, with peculiar weapons of faith!

What intelligent freeman is not ashamed to have peculiar faith, that should be left to the serfs of absolutism and superstition?

Reason is rejected only by the ignorant, or by fools and knaves. Some may estimate that if peculiar faith do no good, that it can do no harm. But do we truly estimate the invaluable loss of time, the perversion of habits and vices for virtues, the future enslavement of our passions and superstitious fears? Philosophy has ever been attacked by the false pretences of sophistry and peculiar faith, the enemy of mankind and its highest right. The story of miracles is a pretended appeal to facts, and must be analyzed by philosophy that alone analyzes truth, to analyze the nature of things.

Philosophy ever discards the phantoms of peculiar faith. Every system of peculiar faith is a libel on God, and an imposition on mind. Do we undertake philosophy that only deals in facts of reason with mere faith, or does it not result in experience and observation through the senses by ratiocination?

Advantages will be taken in faith if yielded, forever.

All peculiar faith people are bigots and egotists, of most unjust character. Sectarians! whom can you blame for opposing peculiar faith, that is sectarianism in general, yours included, when you attack all others, to protect your own? We attack all on principles, you act for self-interest. You have to be silent, or self-condemned. There can be no greater humbug than that of peculiar faith, that is dangerous and oppressive to the world, which knows so little of it in all its insidiousness.

Peculiar faith disorganizes society and the world.

She gives curses where she dispenses supposed blessings. Parasites, flatterers, and retainers, may descant on this topic, but all the merit is unequivocally due the real and intrinsic character of God's boons.

It is on his capital that all the effect is produced.

His are the magnificent institutions and prerogatives, the duty is mind's.

What peculiar grace has peculiar faith of any kind imparted to the world, that she should find peculiar favor in its sight?

The rites and ceremonies of peculiar faith are bad, oppressive and tyrannizing to the citizens of the world.

What liberality has sectarianism, that thinks all others have not as good a faith, as they have not its faith? Sectarianism cannot decide, as it does not stand at the right point, but must transcend or fall below it.

None but the right standard can give mind the qualification of right judgment.

Peculiar faith is the result of dark and benighted ages of absolutism and priest imposition, whereas rational religion is that of rationally cultivated minds, elevated to and ennobled by the best blessings of civilization in all its glorious and pure excellency.

We permit no short sighted policy of peculiar faith, that follows a master of absolutism, receives the dictation of sects, adheres to creeds of opinions, but violates the principles of rational religion.

Any persons may change from peculiar faith, from the Roman to the protestant, or from either to the Mahometan, but no rational mind can leave rational religion, the God-gift.

Who desires to know all the vices of peculiar faith? This reflects from its corruption, all the superstition and bigotry of ages thus darkened over the world. It is she that presents all messiahships, and those in antagonism with the great laws of nature.

Principles cannot be excluded by peculiar faith, no more than the Creator by messiahships.

But how can peculiar faiths be the policy of any, presuming on their potency? Do they blindly mislead themselves, without knowing where their own dogmas actually lead them? Peculiar and easy faith arose in an age of darkness and superstition, and has never been eradicated.

"Mahomet, who lived in the sixth century, considers Christians in the light of infidels and idolators throughout the koran; and, indeed, had not Christians worshipped Christ, he could have had no shadow of a pretence to reform their religion, and to bring them back to the worship of one God."

Can the world begin to appreciate the amount and extent of persecutions for peculiar faith in the world? Barocaba, who pretended to be messiah, murdered heathens and Christians. In Christian countries there have been persecutions to murders without mercy. In France, multitudes of Jews were burnt.

In Germany multitudes of them were murdered by the myrmidons of the eight crusades.

In Persia, the Tartars murdered multitudes of the Jews. Neither paganism nor polytheism is extinct in the world of peculiar faith, that invades the sacred precincts of civil liberty, conscience and philanthropy. Will you stand by, citizen, patriot, and not aid the exigencies of the world in this essential matter? Some people have no sincerity, as their minds have become perverted; they are thankless as they have no gratitude.

Can all these cultivate the right spirit in the empire of peculiar faith? How will they compass such impracticabilities?

But you cleave to your faith? Of course you found it upon the bible? Now, certainly, you must unmistakably prove the last, to be honest and truthful in your consistency. What are the proofs of your bible, as to its authenticity? You do not know, or do all your ignorant misleaders! It is astonishing to find how few do know this, as priests cannot know or prove it!

Are you betrayed to the loss of the genuine for the counterfeit, throwing away your soul-gifts for the shadow, what you can never reach?

Are you thus caught so stupidly, when so shrewd in business and life transactions otherwise? Do you cheat yourself, or do you permit others to do it, which amounts to the same thing?

The false position of peculiar faith is always apparent on proper analysis.

On the fragments of peculiar faith arise the splendor and magnificence of rational religion.

At her dawn presided science and philosophy.

Patients are often harassed, are deranged at times, about peculiar faith. For God's sake, let the world and souls be in peace. There is no peace in peculiar faith, that has no brains, intelligence, or magnanimity.

The miserable patients who are disturbed at death, wishing for a faith, should be ratified, but enlightened too. Not only ought ministers, who come to advise, have purity of morals above reproach, but intellectual correctness too; above all other things they ought to tell the truth about the authenticity of their gospels, which, if candid, they are obliged to say cannot be done, as they are not authentic. Are freemen slaves to peculiar faith? Is that so? There has been war upon Jewry for eighteen centuries early, by the children that came from its womb.—How parricidal is peculiar faith, when anything opposes her selfish interest. She is created in the froth of sectarianism, and is equally meretricious as her prototype in fiction.

Where is the end of all these things? One superstitious wave succeeds another. The Mormons have created theirs. Every new system does the same. The motives are all similar, never can be vastly different.

Is there no money nor speculation in all this matter? There is hardly anything else when all seek power.

Allow all the motives that prompt, and take away those that are not in the secret, who suppose good faith all the time, and the balance is nothing but blasphemous corruption forever.

Peculiar faith will do for scary children, hysterical females, imbecile men, cunning priestocracies, and despotic autocrats, that rule the world by a devil, a very pious and religious duty! Peculiar faith is inseparable from sectarianism; both are identified.

But the world must have faith. Is that a particle of virtue? Is there one particle of virtue in peculiar faith? Is not faith a necessary result of investigation, and only in proportion to the facts of the case?

The sectarianism of peculiar faith keeps the world apart, and thereby clearly proves its peculiar vices. All peculiar systems of faith are imperfect from the essential nature of the materials: now mind needs a perfect system, that mind may invoke as religion —the model system of religion. The same peculiar faith that gives a devil also gives a messiah, proxies of priestocracies, all anti-god. Peculiar faith corrupts all communities. What a blood-thirsty tyrant is peculiar faith. Such mere faith stultifies its followers, blinds their senses, and brutalizes their nature.

Sophistry of peculiar faith, thou hast no limit; as envy, thou hast no dignity. The system of electioneering against all principles for reasons of their temporal popularity, when it was to their disgraceful advantage, show the extreme length that peculiar faith goes. Who can doubt of the false pretences of peculiar faith? The very position implies the most blasphemous falsehoods. How can you expect less than millions of fools and liars to sustain it all over the world. Peculiar faith sides in argument just as it suits self-interest. Do we respect truth or justice when we speak of peculiar faith as a faith?

Who has the orthodox, the infallible, of all such? Can its corrupt elements beget any such?

Judaism and Christianity are the parents of Mormonism, as well as of Mahometanism. Which, then, is most sinful? They are all peculiar faith, which is only modified more or less in each. If Mormonism be a corrupt daughter, Christianity is a corrupt mother, and Judaism is a corrupt grandmother.

As peculiar faith advances, so does a hypocritical age, then rational religion recedes. It is a false position to refuse to get out of your heresies of untruth and bigotry.

If you wish the world further humbugged, let the mass still be vassal to any demagogue. In all kinds of government they have but to continue this thing of peculiar faith. When the leaders are influenced by sinister motives, blindly selfish. the balance can be easily found. Which is peculiar faith worse in, impudence or ignorance? What gives tendency to scandal and libel more than this position?

Is peculiar faith never to end her impious evils, and rational religion never to begin her illustrious, godly blessings?

Shall mind be subject in any respect to the odious vassalage of any peculiar faith, the peculiar tyrant of the world? Shall property be confiscated, and persons be excommunicated. Shall both be subject to violence? None of peculiar faith-men ever conceived properly of God: it is utterly impossible. All this pulpit peculiar faith is ex-parte, one-sided, giving suppressed statements or one-sided sophisticated, and filled with a thousand delusions. Reason and rational mind can rear the proper standard.

Where can we get a rational discussion of religion by peculiar faith-people? All peculiar faith derives all its honor and respectability, from mind, that makes it what it is. Peculiar faith was to rule the ignorance of the world, to secure all power-influence, pretending that society only could exist but by fears of future punishment, and yet the world is overrun by these very nations, claiming to be elite or select, in piracies, martial and naval murders, and robberies. It is impossible to civilize the world by peculiar faith, that has not its first elements—a universal brotherhood!

We may cherish the best feelings to all the citizens of the world, as part of God's creation, but not for any of their peculiar errors, among which is one of the greatest, peculiar faith.

The christian innovation was once to the Jews, what now the Mormon faith is to the christians. What is wanting to the last power? What is wanting to all peculiar faith? Truth. An affiliated is not debarred from giving testimony, but then he, and all the world, cannot establish one pretended miracle.

Peculiar faith has devils; rational religion has none.

The bible of peculiar faith unites prejudices, passion, credulity, sophistry and superstition, to overwhelm the human mind, and involve all mankind in its ruin. With all your toleration of peculiar faith, your Mormon would or could not live in peace among christians. Wars have arisen between them.

This proves most conclusively how delusive and dangerous is any peculiar faith: behold the snake is not killed, it is only scotched. If the Mormons be a dangerous people that seek a vindictive retributive justice, for the deep wrong due them, how much more so is the peculiar faith that originates all the tribes?

The great danger is, that too much of the world will have too low views of duty and action through peculiar faith. Their acts are grovelling—undermining against their neighbors, seeking advantages. But this you may affect is not so. But how did you treat the Mormons? Oh! that alters the case. Did not the Pagans treat your ancestors thus intolerantly; besides, you set the Mormons an example to plagiarize a peculiar faith.

Why so many sects in faith, and so many systems of faith in direct collision and antagonism?

There is but one religion most certainly. There cannot be any two principles clashing—nor any two faiths—for assuredly, all are false that have the elements of antagonism. All peculiar faiths, christian particularly, as well as the Mahometan, are in antagonism to religion.

It is the paramount duty of the enlightened religionist to denounce all false faiths as false positions.

But the cause of sympathy, is that of some of these peculiar systems. All do not weigh one straw before the rights and dignity of mind, the true beneficiary which has been crushed by them for thousands of years!

Peculiar faith advocates pretend, that they have investigated the whole subject of religion. Have they touched the first position, the supreme obligation to the Supreme?

Are they disinterested enough to do justice to this subject?

But then the feelings of wives and families are to be consulted in faith. The right position is paramount with wives, children and family, and that is only rational faith. Any other is a curse to the whole country. We congratulate ourselves in the due investigation of this subject, and that reason is on the Lord's side, and can only see this as the safe side.

We seek to live and die in this the true faith, as confirmed converts, exempt from skepticism. Those who advocate peculiar faith can only be the veriest skeptics.

If we sided with priestocracies that conspired against God, as atheists or polytheists, trinitarians, unitarians, or luke-warm optimists, we should feel that he was against us in the end as well as all the time.

Do you expect virtue, &c., in a people wedded to peculiar faith and its tenets? In the best and fairest portions of the globe, peculiar faith, its education and dogmas, poison up the blessings of life. Most of the world will go it blind for peculiar faith. They will swear white is black, if expedient. Exemption from all peculiar faith will add dignity and grandeur of dignity to the world. Mind has been falsely, treacherously brought up to yield the question of peculiar faith hitherto, bound to the car of superstition. Has a fanatic, bigot, any reason about him in peculiar faith? Conscious of extreme weakness, he becomes a decided despot of humbug, and throws himself on the dignity of toleration—if he cannot repel all such by vindictiveness. What wanton felony. What train-band mind and society-spoilen victimizers!

So sectarian are some village schools, that even ladies of the same town hardly give to each other the street. This is civilization, with a vengeance!

Joe Smith found, it is asserted, his golden plates in New York; Moses found his stone tables at Mt. Sinai. Which has the best claim for truth? Neither. One has the oldest lies. That old bible, for which sophists and autocrats battle, is a fine example for freemen to seek. Of course it is right, is it, for freemen to copy after all such?

Is the world to adopt the word of bigots, the most odious reptiles? Are they not the thousands of harpies preying on society, having but little unison of interest?

What a position of the world, that much of it is priestocracy, a fraud or deception on the world by peculiar faith!

The main question arises, is it done knowingly?

The true analysis of the world's position is not yet fully written. The peculiar faiths are cut-throat to each other; while rational religion is happy to be defeated of her errors by rationality. Even now the world is so soft and verdant as to believe as told: This is the effect of peculiar faith, called Faith. Ignorant of the earth, they are ignorant of spirits and angels who they assume are its visitors.

Do you believe in haunts, they inquire? We do, in those of guilty conscience. But in spirits, ghosts? They have something else to do than abide in that capacity. Their functions commence in other departments as soon as changed by death.

Rule superstition to proper obedience, and science makes her the noblest mind-agent.

Know and think of the differences between religion and peculiar faith. Can the last be honorably adhered to, while so far from backing out as in pure love, all must get stronger inclined in the true faith, with which all the advocates will identify themselves, it being the nation's interest, the world's glory, and all that is needed is the proper opportunity of securing the world through mind's civilization.

What rational man will refuse to display his mind's greatness and purity? Let us not have the dynasty of peculiar faith—it is the scourge of the world, the mind, spirit, the soul. What an impotent, imbecile state of non-resistance does the thoughtless world oppose to the unreasonable pretences and tyranny of peculiar faith. Can any rational beings be opposed to the true exposition of the baseness of this faith, when they ought to be most thankful for doing so?

Peculiar faith is ashamed to let go at once, as she would be exposed in her deformity.

It seems that the whole system of peculiar faith has been wrought out very cunningly, but not usefully, as all its elements are perishable.

False faiths are little hells of little minds that propagate or adopt them.

Is there any faith that is peculiar too absurd for the deluded mind of fanatics? There are even the devil-worshippers in the East. The whole idea of demonology is monstrous, as displayed in the bible, one of the greatest libels on Deity, as to their possession of human souls over God! How monstrous, absurd, ridiculous, miserable, mean and degrading to rational mind!

Evil beings, living in human bodies! As good as the origin of the conception of messiahs! All utterly at variance with the first principles of physiology and pure morals. Let not your prejudices intervene between the twilight of science and bigotry.

But the idea of the devil is figurative. But as to that of legion, that was a spirit, of course not figurative. There can be no halting between two opinions, for here is the most marked decision.

Christianity is only peculiar faith, with less alloy than some other counterfeits. Peculiar faith is a stupid, sottish superstition. How demoralizing are peculiar faith and its bibles! They propagate the falsehoods about demonology, ghosts, spirits, with craft and all the heinous tribe of superstition. But, if you explain by figuration, the expounders assume the exclusive right, and then you are told to take hold of the real substance, and if you seize that, they refer you to figuration. Why not drop such a rotten system of sophistry and superstition, that cannot protect its friends, and cannot longer deceive the candid world? Better for the whole world that it had never seen peculiar faith in any form, as billions have been injured most deeply by it.

The real existence of angels, good and bad, is one part of the bible machinery. If it be the bible and not mind that directs, how is it that you affect figuration?

Some construe, as the universalists, as figures; you deny them. Large parts of Asia, as south Asia, are devil worshippers, the slaves of priestocracy.

Under this dynasty of faith, what little of the world is worthy of the real light of rational mind?

How many millions commit themselves, even to perjury, to oppose mind's innovations, as adverse to their peculiar interests and faith! How many believe in evil spirits? A trial for bewitching was held in Alabama not many years ago, in a Christian council, I am informed by a pastor of a church! What but the bible originated, and the priestocracy uphold it? Mind arrested the burning, of course.

One nation has conquered another, and what love is there yet established on any peculiar faith? But all peculiar faith is suspicious, as it is, and cannot be true: it is false security by a false position. Of how many is the lifetime spent, without any peculiar faith! Where was the pure faith all the time, but with them, more or less?

But what can we do against the world's peculiar faiths? If you aid, you break the charm of improper teaching. The noisy are to be rebuked, by rights of the world.

Does bigotry ever forgive opposition?

But few sectarians contend for truth, they are after their own wordy victory. What needs the world of any peculiar faith, that, on analysis, it must be fully satisfied, is not only of no benefit, but a positive evil and injury?

I have been particular about Hindoo faith, as incompetent as any, that though the world be full, still it is of no avail. But they all do evil, and dangerous powers should be counteracted. Why attack all peculiar faiths?

Because they have assailed the rights of mind, depriving it of all its best principles. Analysis will tell that the propagation of doctrines has not depended so much on rational as interested views, that may reflect the profits. The pecuniary emoluments are to be considered, in the peculiar faith expenditures. What else can be expected? If you have money to expend, it is well.

In opposing peculiar faith, I am only doing what every patriot would do if he could. The taxes of the people should be appropriated for their benefit, not forced, for the curses of peculiar faith. Suppose that all peculiar faith people were to carry out all their peculiarities, what sort of a peculiar world should we have?

The Bhuddists avoid contact with the Christians, and cook exclusively to themselves. Names are nothing in peculiar faith, whether quaker or Bhuddist, all are bigots, in which character they all unite!

All is contingent by peculiar bibles, that the world may never know; but God's documents cannot be hid, as his works prove. These are facts outweighing all bible rhetoric, addressed to the five senses of every rational mind. But the peculiar god speaks and hears, as the peculiar caste says! Sectarians, if not hostile, are antagonistical to each other. There is no orthodox opinion about reforms from absolutisms.

If religion was not the mistress of peculiar faith, the last, would master the world. Peculiar faith is a libel on religion, as is christianity. Peculiar faith brutalizes all that it touches and sticks to; it contracts the bigot to the fanatic, and him to the brute, and changes all so that its best friends cannot finally know them, if subject to its comprehensive influence. What can be worse than the priestocracy, that uses this means against the world?

What is the state of rational discussion now? Is it not proscription by the priestocracy? Is not the exclusion of the bible circle brought to bear? Is there not evasion of friendship, and direct hostility? Is this a proper position in society, free and intelligent? The peculiar bible opposer is an infidel! What is an infidel? It is an unfaithful being. To whom? He cannot be to God, whom he reverences. But he is to the messiah! That he should be, otherwise he would be an infidel to God. All that sustain robbery of God are infidels. This is the true position when true advocates impeach infidelity, for the whole must be comprehended to reach the right basis.

Peculiar faith doctrinists can be bitter, but it is not the bitterness of proof, but of blackguardism on mere assertion.

Infidelity is robbery all the time to the unity of God.

What are all the pretensions of cliques but resting on this unprincipled position, that authorizes the sincere belief that millions of perjuries could be perpetrated for peculiar faith in the world; for what member or advocate would not swear to it? And yet all would perjure themselves. Does not the professor appropriate much of his lectures to all the sophistry of his faith?

Cowards, hypocrites, and robbers of society oppose rational religion, and are loth to say aught against peculiar faith, as it is in the ascendant! We could forgive them if they could not analyze the truth. Peculiar faith could not last the attack of mind one Sunday if the world would do its duty. Peculiar faith peculiarizes its each individual interest. Now the world is after its own self-interest.

How can you give us liberty in every sense of the word, whilst you are under the iron fetters of peculiar faith?

The paramount good of society of the world absolutely requires that no dynasty impose its peculiar faith on the same. Peculiar faith causes even individuals, let alone nations, to estimate themselves peculiarly endowed. Peculiar faith has corrupted the world of mind about ten to one hundred fold worse than it would have been without it! The perverted world will not fight you honorably; it has no principles, only peculiar ways, faith, and action. What if the chief or archangels were in the seventh or best heaven if sin get in, and angels there become devils? We cannot help your having adopted peculiar faith; that may be your misfortune when not your fault; but the time may have arrived when it may be your fault and not your misfortune.

The dogmas of peculiar faith prove no orthodox faith, much less religion. How much time is fruitlessly spent by peculiar faith in plotting against the balance of the world, in every disgusting way! What is peculiar faith as regards God, the universal Creator? An unprincipled opposition, the veriest humbug! Think of that, ye conscience-men.

Among fanatic enthusiasts we have the Swedenborgians, who believe in revelation to Swedenborg. Are they not as true as all others, as Mormons, &c.?

While we reject peculiar faith altogether, we seek to cultivate what is rational. The peculiar faith dogmas and dynasties, with all their machinery, are contradictory of each other and themselves. They have the basest intention of fraud.

But why not let peculiar faith prevail? No convict or culprit should in this world, that requires religion.

Such faith is counterfeit and has all its curses. Let this humbug, as dead, be buried. It is for the people to have it interred. The bias of sophistry of peculiar faith warps the mind sadly. As to martyrdom, what is not due to antagonism of other peculiar faiths, that without exception, are despotic with powers. One peculiar faith is as good as another, till exploded. What can one individual do in a corrupt society, that will libel and sophisticate? How is the world to be rightly benefited?

By discarding not only all errors, but all oceans of errors, no matter how estimated from the cobwebs of antiquity. Did we come out to satisfy peculiar faith-people or truth? Mind has no innate ideas, but impressions through the senses; ought they not to be correct?

What can be worse than the materialism, the depravity of mind. The infidelity, the skepticism of peculiar faith? What can be more savage than peculiar faith, that fights all other sectarians, and the true and only faith?

Her parricidal character is degradingly odious and vicious.

All peculiar faiths clash, thus proving their position wrong. No peculiar faith can establish its position, with all its peculiar characteristics.

The very idea of peculiar faith expresses the elements of peculiar views, that are false to universal principles of God. How could they be established but on false pretences, violations of truth and reason, alias miracles, prophecies and mysteries, but sophiscated visions of the same thing. 'Tis needless to say, that we cannot take cognizance of the acts of our own mind; suffice it to say, that we know enough of the partial operations, to fully carry them out in good faith. The ancients interdicted examination into first principles, and required, as now do the advocates of peculiar faith, to have them taken for granted.

By this course, we only have less degrees of superstition, arising from the elevation of mind, not being untrammeled. Well may it be said, reformers correct yourselves, as well Hebrews, as christians, all are in the same category. Peculiar faith has peculiar sophistry.

There can be millions of systems about peculiar faith and its miracles, all analogous in falsity, but there can be but one right system of religion, that duly estimates the God of truth and honesty, whom no nation has ever yet recognised. The system of Judaism revealed innumerable untruths about their peculiar god, with their priests, prophets, and pretended miracles.

Let us give proper credit for all conscientious members of any peculiar faith-association. God takes the will for the deed. A world-wide evil is peculiar faith.

People set out in life, determined to be sophists, not to be convinced. How often does society invoke all its perversion to defraud itself of its own rights.

Society is now made up of sects, clans, and secret clubs, all having influence, good or malign, the worse, as it is more peculiar.

All good citizens must eschew all the sub-electioneering of society against universal brotherhood.

All peculiar faith-labor is lost; it ever begins, never ends, forces, but does not satisfy. Of all corruptions, in this corruptible world, corrupt peculiar faith ousts all.

What are all the Robespierres, all the wild, reckless, fanatic bedlamites of tyranny, in all ways, the enemies of their race, stupid in crime, their minds perverted by peculiar faith and education, and crushed into all the degradations of brutes to the advocates of peculiar faith. Do they not recognise their brethren? Are they so stupid as to deny their analogy?

How many thousands of years has mind been extricating itself from the wiry-serpent-folds of priestocracy and polytheism? The polytheists made their devil of course, that they had of the devil-worshippers, a suspicious pedigree. Next to an idiot, a maniac, an atheist, a polytheist, save us from faith-bigots.

All are sectarians that are not rational religionists, and the fact that Christ was necessarily sectarian, conclusively proves him mortal. The proof of sectarianism is self-evident. What can we expect of the world about peculiar faith, when its bigotry has no justice, and it would cut each others' throats, but for the civilization of mind. What war has peculiar faith stayed? What, rather, has it not excited? The government of the universe, this world included, is in fact, and right, in the Creator of mind. Some see interminable difficulties among various sects, but see no end. Where is the remedy?

In rational religion, universal brotherhood, that look to one God. The knowing any depravity and adopting it, is a bad state of sin. How comes it that the people do not know better. It is the most difficult thing, to reach the right analysis of a world-wide subject. Isolated points of material importance are known by thousands, but the fewest know the whole connection. Peculiar faith leads to so much worldly deception practiced, till habit is confirmed to a dangerous position. While some faiths are better than others, what are all peculiar faiths worth? They primarily transgress the chiefest points in usurpation of divine rights. The priestocracy mislead the people, who willingly submit to their degraded dictation.

Skepticism and infidelity should only apply to atheism and polytheism; peculiar faith is irrational.

Strange how much reckless fatuity prevails about peculiar faith, and the treacherous desertion of mind that cannot be superseded. Bring back all, to this point. The only difference is, that some peculiar faiths cannot conceal their baseness as long as others, nor any from God. All are robberies of God. One foolish goes after another, as mind advances. If mind did not advance, these would increase.

But what avail missions of peculiar faith? Look at the contingencies of missions, how much time is lost in learning language, laws, superseding and quarreling with other peculiar faiths.

It is thought by some that the author of Swedenborgianism scarcely had sound mind, as he professed to enjoy open intercourse with the world of departed spirits. He is said to hold that there is a trinity, and yet denies its personality. All peculiar faith presents dreamy delusions: all are visionary, gratuitous. The laws of Sweden are said to be that "Every individual leaving the national church to enter another communion, was liable to lose his property, and even to be banished from the kingdom." This is a Protestant country. Peculiar faith was always the great aid to absolute ancient or modern governments. No faith was worth anything, that did not aid government. The ancients sought peculiar faith as capital, and is this vulgar gewgaw any the less avoided by the moderns? What can furnish worse morals? But you mention the glorious triumphs of faith at the last sad close of life. Why should this change be sad? It is the harbinger of another brighter birth, into a more glorious immortality, the more illustrious as the soul recognises the exclusive unity of a perfectly pure Creator. This attends the most rational consideration of this paramount subject. But as to any other idea, can there be any greater bursts of enthusiasm than those of the Juggernaut, who voluntarily victimizes himself under the wheels of the car of his peculiar god? All such as the last is fanaticism, but the first, the only true effusion of religion, exalts its position. With what peculiar facility can peculiar doctrines of made bibles be propagated, mormonism is proof. It is sectarianize now, not originate, except among the ignorant class that stupidly never inquire into the proof of the position. They overlook this, for want of proper cultivation of mind.

The code of peculiar faith is that of the equivocator. Peculiar faith says to its equals, parents or closest relations, ye all are infidels, that is outlaws.

With the proper use of their mental faculties, they cannot be more vassal, to audit such libels.

All peculiar faiths are peculiar powers, a part of usurpation of absolutism, nothing less; is this expedient to make people better?

Peculiar faith always has mysteries as a part of its humbugs. Peculiar faith is a tyranny over mind, and is handed down as the perpetual constant tyranny of superstition and sophistry. It is forgery and a counterfeit; it is no hand jugglery, but the jugglery of mind, that pays by a dash of the pen, millions. It is wholesale and retail, a perpetuity. But it is cruel to dispossess one of even a crystal, unless you can give him a diamond. Yes, we invoke the diamond of pure religion. Destructive must be superseded by conservative principles, that revolve in religion.

Let not the people sacrifice their independence of mind and morals, when they hold the treasures of both.

Religion knows no difference between Jew and Gentile, she eschews sectarianism, and points to the unity of God. All peculiar faith is declared by man, but this is not what reason and mind need and tolerate.

Why is there infidelity? Your peculir faith is in part responsible therefor. What an outrage on the world, to make peculiar faith an inquisitorial power.

Peculiar faith may talk all it chooses about love to members of each, but the part is not practicable nor beneficial. "The Hindoo and Musselman population in the city Majeerunb, had risen against each other, under the influence of religious fanaticism, and the city was destroyed by fire." The Christian had at last subdued both, and was master. Peculiar faith offers all felonious false pretences.

What is peculiar faith knight-errantry worth?

Great is the Diana of all peculiar faiths.

What greater evils are perpetrated on the world, than those originated by peculiar faith? Sectarianism sees no merit. But each has its own elect! Who are they? The egotists. Has not peculiar faith had something to do with every ancient war? Has it not compelled man to look on his brother as an alien, an enemy? With the world any one especial faith is orthodox, infallible, christian or civilized, whilst all the others are those of minds at enmity against God, that is their peculiar God, as they are heathen, naturally pagan outside barbarians. All peculiar faith doctrines are a desecration to God. Peculiar faith people value themselves on feelings, excited by enthusiasm. What else is it. What value is it, if this be no foundation for messiahship. The works of peculiar faith must introduce evils, because it mistakes principles. The very position means an impossibility; when faith is to supersede reason, then the fabric of virtue goes to death. Peculiar faith never can find the true God. True principles are libeled by the professors.

Seeing that you cannot attain purity of faith your way, will you deny the only practicable one because different with yours? You ought to help remedy the defects of that advanced on proper principles, not advance the defective system however adroit its sophistry.

Reason must obviate the poison of peculiar faith.

Much has been said of infidelity, but what can be said fair for peculiar faith? Rational religion asserts the only claim to good faith, no other can.

Peculiar faith of the world is no where; it is an imposition, humbug. Where the most power is invoked, there the most vitiation of it arises.

Peculiar faith antagonizes the feelings and interests, rends them asunder from that God that joined them together in the holy wedlock of one universal brotherhood.

Let's be done with all this folly and crime.

All sectarianism, all peculiar faiths, stand in the way of constitutional liberty, one of the great elements to its injury. The diversity of opinion may be honestly entertained on both sides, but both cannot be right. What sort of morality do moralists use adverse to reason, proper sense, justice, honor and truth? One form of peculiar faith is only preferable to another, as the least of two evils. Christianity, Mormonism, are all superstitious evils and crimes.

No custom, plan, or design should restrict the world, to any set of peculiar faith dogmas.

The popular sovereignty of this world must decide this paramount question, and to do so let it be presented in all proper light. Peculiar faith tyranny has convulsed the world. There can be no national or church peculiar faith. But what shall we do for some peculiar system? True rational religion will do all that is needed—all that can be permitted by the Almighty.

Who wishes to see society cut up into clans, cliques, vassals, as it will necessarily be by peculiar faith that degrades and embroils it? Let us give a world-wide protection against peculiar faith, peculiar power, peculiar dynasty, peculiar humbuggery, to deny which a man's face must have a shield not only thicker than a rhinoceros' hide, but even than Homer's Achilles' shield.

What is the revelation of John, but a gross priestocracy compound of deepest ignorance assuming mystery, making beasts of the heavenly host, rather a beast of himself? If he had said that he saw an animal there that should have had long ears, then he would have spoken the truth for once as an ass. He is true to his vocation. Ch. v. 8, And when he had taken the book, the four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints!!! The priestocracy sticks out in everything.

The saints! Who are they? Can mortals declare them?

This was the heaven of the peculiar god, and this peculiar man saw it! Ch. vi. 10. And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on earth? Well, and who are these they, that cried? 9. The souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which he held! What vindictiveness in heaven—another worse state, than when the devil fell. This was the second sin there. And what did all John's sights amount to at last, but a monomaniacal rhapsody? 13. And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth! Inspiration teaches exact representation; now, John, a school-boy can correct you, though you saw all this in heaven. 14. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together. Worse, John, your visit, revelations and inspirations, betray you as the greatest ignoramus of all monkish pedants. O John, you lied too bad! John, you mistook the scroll for a host of starry orbs in boundless ether. Your vision was visionary.

Ch. xii. 7. And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon. 9. And the great dragon was cast out. Worse and worse. The object is to fix the host in heaven, of those claimed to be saints on earth. 4. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth! Now, if any one will affirm that the scriptures are true, we will give him up as a hopeless bigot.

But some may pretend that this is all metaphor. Then, why employ the world about such silly metaphor as the bible?

All peculiar faiths have peculiar country or people, god of course, privileges, laws that are tyranny, surely. The gods were part of the strength of the country; their name was to strike terror into the opposition, to create panic. There was great hatred among the ancient nations, Egyptians—Jews, about their gods.

The Egyptians had implacable wars, about their gods and peculiar faith.

All this matter wants a start, to put down peculiar faith. Its advocates use no argument that is rational to support it. The Jews were shepherds and had to leave Egypt, the hot-bed of priestocracy, under the guidance of priests, governing them by a code of their regime. There is a delusive charm in all peculiar faiths, among the ignorant. The object should be to get rid of all, as mind advances, and then the universal rational faith religion triumphs.

What enmity of sectarianism is there, whether Christian, Mahometan, Jew, or Mormon.

All peculiar faiths are impositions. Who can be saved by peculiar faith that speaks: are not all lost so far as that is concerned? Peculiar faith claims to be heart-faith, all that we can know is mind-faith, that results from honest conviction of mind. All peculiar faith has been devised by priestocracies. It is unnatural to man, and can only be propagated by devices and force. Though the world is full of peculiar faith and superstition, there is but one religion; there can be no other. What if the world has been wrong in its faith. It should drop it, if proved satisfactorily to be spurious, not adhere to it like a bigot if wrong, to make inconsistency apparently consistent.

Be not self-deceived. All peculiar is superstitious faith, and so far as it has its self-right, it is only that much of mind.

It is impossible for any peculiar faith, Christian, or any, to be universal. It has not the essential elements.

All have been too ready to embrace all expedients to promote their elevation, from the use of the sword to the dollar, from the king to the debauchee.

It sacrifices, even at this age, glorious republican institutions of government to its hierarchy, and makes sister republics, so miscalled, her tool! O, what a falling off was there, our world-citizens? It makes kings and autocrats unite, and issue ukases, to enslave the world, by its superstition, its peculiar influence, and its degradation. All peculiar faiths have useless rites and ceremonies. The affiliated knowing ones do not like to see it exposed. Sin is error, or wrong, all sincere knowing ones should seek to correct. All peculiar faiths are invented for some sinister object. Peculiar faith engenders coarse, vulgar bigotry. How much insanity is there in the subject of peculiar faith? Let not the world cultivate any sneaking self-system, that will lower its intrinsic merits, and all that should elevate it. Carry out this matter about peculiar faith far enough, and you will necessarily be convinced of its error.

Peculiar faith makes God peculiar, endows opinions with superstitious notions, and imparts such code of its object. What sort of peculiar faith doctrine does not imply sophistry, falsification, and imposition?

What an absurdity, the offering of jealousy and envy, in the different orders of peculiar faith!

It is difficult to decide, in some matters, which proves most civilization? We have to look at the matters of fact. Which is more civilized, Christian England or pagan China, in the opium matter?

Sophistry is everything in life with some, but we can detect it always, if we bring principles to bear.

Peculiar faith degrades its followers below principles. Some meet by fraud, sophistry, and collusion of the world in peculiar faith. Do these satisfy the intelligent and honest mind of freemen? We come not to attack your good but your credulity: we defend all your religion, but impeach all your peculiar faith.

But the professor's feelings are peculiarly claimed, as proving the faith, especially in Christianity. All peculiar faiths can claim feelings; where then is the superiority? Rational beings are perfectly satisfied to retain the only maintainable position that is rational, to live and die by. What more can be said, or done? The only object of proper standard is God, and to be recognised, not by feelings but by mind's operations.

Fanaticism is the cut-throat incendiary of the world.

God fixed man, who fixed himself in a false peculiar position, from which he has to recover himself.

The whole world's history amply proves that superstition and peculiar faith will never answer for the world's welfare. Some people think how well, how beautifully they can perform; they had better consider how well they can omit the malign misdeeds of the bible. Who continues this abominable system? The profession of the priestocracy, who have taken such pains for centuries to mislead the world.

What is peculiar faith worth? It is faith misdirected. Self-delusion may cause you to seek peculiar faith, whilst at the same time none has principles.

Professors of peculiar faith assume all the morality, despite of the supreme rights of mind! What base sophistry! Puseyism, Romanism, Greekism, Protestantism, Polytheism, and Atheism, are all combating religion. The greatest engine and machinery of corruption to the whole world is peculiar faith, its cause. What malignant feelings, "acts of faith," torture by fire, and mutual persecutions, of Christian, Jew, Mahometan, have prevailed, when power permitted.

Who could trust himself to the tender mercies of peculiar faith? The sooner we get rid of peculiar faith the better. What good faith has peculiar faith?

We overlook the character and functions of human nature, created by God for noble and elevated purposes.

Heresies will arise in peculiar faith the world over, which can never see right in this matter.

The world must observe the enmity of peculiar sects, all the time of their existence, for thousands of years.

What is their redeeming quality? None. All that is valuable is mind, whose rights they have crushed.

We see it between Christianity, Judaism, Mahometanism, Mormonism, Bhuddism, Brahminism, or any other form of paganism,—all. The power of each church hierarchy, once greater than the civil government, has aided in all this. Whole massacres of Jews or other sects have been witnessed more than once by light.

No one can reason, enslaved to love peculiar faith or fanaticism, on the especial subject that overrules them.

Peculiar faith doctrinists seize upon the human mind as their peculiar property, and tyrannize over it as a heretical vassal. Without principles man is an animal; and with peculiar faith man deserts principles of science. The highest proof of want of science is the position of peculiar faith.

These peculiar faiths and sects alienate the various portions of the world from each other.

How many try, pretend to get peculiar faith, and fall back. No rational being can retrograde from rational religion, while mind thus enlightened is so constituted that it cannot receive peculiar faith. Now rational religion is for all, consequently this is the only faith of religion. Society is so constituted by peculiar faith that individuals take base advantages of it. The base act badly when permitted with impunity; but when society is deprived of its best constituent principles its safety is in abeyance to improper influences. Then feelings are shocked, and principles are outraged, without proper redress. As man can only live to sin the least, so his position to be most successful must be relative to such.

Of all the humbugs of the world, that about peculiar faith is the greatest and most culpable. What prejudices are addressed, what vices are aroused, what ignominy is accomplished. The pride of opinion may cause antagonism of error with truth, but no humbuggery is available permanently on a false capital. Hypocrites cannot appreciate true devotion. Their too much devotion in idol-worship blinds and causes the world to trade on the capital of the position that is made false.

This is the age of bigotry with all of peculiar faith, not of refined noblest feelings. This is one of the things not worthy of acquisition, as we have necessarily on the best principles of existence to look on all the heads as deceivers. Well can it be remarked that adults are grown up children, The whole tendency of mind under peculiar faith is to sophistry. The lifetime on this basis presents a continued evasion of right.

This tribunal has proved itself totally incompetent to settle the great question of religion.

Peculiar faith is the faith of superstition, the parent of a prolific world brood, whereas the faith of rational religion is that of reason, truth, and facts.

How comes it that so many world-people believe the statements of peculiar faith about the future, but yet refuse absolutely to become of that faith?

There is something singularly wrong in all this.

Peculiar faith sophisticates the world, and causes most to see mostly one side of doubtful questions; and what is worst, to uphold all such by bigotry after their explosion when interest is involved.

Peculiar faith is one of the great questions of agitation to the world. The best social relations are interrupted by peculiar faith and sects.

What a fine thing it is that the peculiar faith people do not go as far as pretended in most instances, else the world evil would have been greater. Its hypocrisy, as bad as it is, may be a fortunate ingredient.

What does peculiar faith constitute but a series of clanships, as destitute of real merit, to vanquish by base intrigues? While each peculiar sect has honorable people by the blessings of God-given minds, the elements of all are most dishonorable and unworthy. Our rights are not to be compromised at all by any such organized felony of after for forethought.

The state of the Mormons is one of the emanations, and consequent on bad faith doctrines. The world is inundated by base doctrines. Can there be any systems of peculiar faith without the vitiation of superstition mixed up with it? All would be well if they were passive, but crusades are made of conscience misinstructed.

The responsibility of peculiar faith is inappreciable for its evil. It has not been in the power of fanatics, &c., to get the world ruined by their peculiar faith doctrines. Time secures a better and better conservatism, and the God of nature reveals his supreme character.

Peculiar faith affects all parts of the world, while affecting much good that the tuition of mind, however under disguised pretences of the first, is the legitimate claimant. This should not rob mind of its character, nor God of his rights. Where peculiar faith predominates, there is so little independence of the balance that sophistry obscures, or mind is vassal to obedience and acquiescence. Patriots, philanthropists, freemen, to the rescue of mind, your noblest jewel. What an evil to see with other people's eyes, thoughts, analysis of mind, forced by the current to adopt a creed of peculiar faith, or be proscribed all the benefits of social and civil rights! True patriotism, intellectual and noble, revolts at the idea. If now we feel the force and tyranny in this country, separated as church and state are of clerical influence, what must it have been for ages and centuries when invested with sway of undefined powers. The clergy were the teachers, moulding mind, influencing will, assuming to be the guardians of education, necessarily made most peculiar. What could escape the potency of such sacrilegious usurpation?

The peculiar faith doctrinists project their creed as universally applicable, and peremptorily admissible. They have usurped by dictation, proscribed, dictated by inquisition. There are many good people, though they have adopted peculiar faith. How much better could they be if they were to adopt the only true faith. It makes no odds whether christians or pagans, they are on equal footing. It is only the state of mind's elevation in their country, that is indebted to science, that makes the real difference. One idol-worship is as heinous as another.

In what a category peculiar faith leaves her votaries. Would not one hundred and forty millions of Mahometans swear that Mahomet is the true prophet? Two hundred millions of Christians would swear that Christ is the only true messiah. From five to seven millions of Jews would swear that there is no messiah. Five hundred millions of pagans would swear for other messiahs! Now all contradict each other. Who is right? None. All this brings about a bad state of morals. Is it any less than a world perjury? When heads of families show no particular care how members of families progress in life, whether they have good morals or not, so they have peculiar faith that is advanced, it is very bad. The world has been imposed upon by peculiar faith-mongers, who set the world to quarreling and fighting therefor. Get religion, says the sectarian. All minds have the elements of religion, the more refined in civilization the more possessed of it. When they improve it, it is rational, and nothing else, not peculiar. What enormities from false pretences about religion, about the forms of superstition, that begets a world of lies and falsehoods. Peculiar faith is the concern of the priestocracy. Instead of aiding peculiar faith, men should thwart every effort but that of perfecting a bible of mind, the only one between God and mind. Peculiar faith people ruin a good cause, given them by the Creator, for the cause of the priestocracy, who are most conceited, and ignorant of the analysis of mind.

Every peculiar faith man is obliged to start on false pretences, which he, as not in the secret, may not have known. The world is full of systems of peculiar faith, but there is only one rational faith, religion, that Deity wrote on the human mind.

Let a world unite on it, and the result is the same. How dangerous and demoralizing is peculiar faith, by peculiar education trammeling reason, as any error may be propagated, the individual becoming a pirate, murderer, as faith, without inquiry, curses.

No science should bend to peculiar faith.

Peculiar faith bewilders the mind, while rational faith enlarges it; the first is antagonistic to the last, which is conservative of the world, the universe, the immortal soul.

Man is forced to suppress his honest sentiments and conviction about peculiar faith, that is no faith at all, if it be not believed in. If a man previously satisfied, when in his final sickness is made to be excited with his family and friends, about his faith, unless he has a very balanced mind, has thought of all these things, and is well prepared for them, he, and all such, may spend the balance of his days miserably. The peculiar faith-people have had it too much on their side, and use all pious frauds to perpetuate their doctrine. How comes it that the world do not fully believe that the peculiar faith-people all lie, when they speak of their doctrines? They can do nothing else.

Now, people do die most abundantly without a qualm of conscience in monotheism, trusting alone to the powers of their God, from whom, as they detract in attributes, they render themselves proportionately atheists or polytheists, who are about equal. People in all ages, have decided to be humbugged, time after time, and tyrants have destroyed myriads, seeking to prevent them.

Let us have no peculiar faith at the expense of freedom, conscience, reason, science. Peculiar faith is the fruit of bibles of tradition, that are ever false friends to mind, and destructive, not conservative, antagonistic elements of social and religious life. It is a mighty work, to eradicate all such errors, with all her machinery, wiles and corruption. Peculiar faith must be defined mouthy; knows but little, and betrays itself, miserable in acquisitions, and worse in enjoyment.

Opposition in argument to peculiar faith, influences the bigots, and arouses its basest tyranny. The majority of the world will outlive any one peculiar faith, no matter of what pretensions. As all Pagans have various peculiar faiths, none have had a majority.

Peculiar faith is the essence of bigotry, and the food of fanaticism. The world needs no peculiar faith or tradition bibles, to sanction or sanctify usurpation and tyranny.

The cunning, short-sighted, peculiar faith-people, think that they can escape detection, when they vainly sacrifice mind, time, to unavailable doctrines. They are the worst sufferers.

Their platform discloses at once the doctrines of that faith.

Under its auspices, have originated some of the monstrous iniquities of the world; among them was the French revolution, which was a full comprehension of proscription of social relations and virtues. And what has peculiar faith done for the soul? She has scattered the vile weeds of sectarianism over the world, causing universal antagonism.

For thousands of years, her sword has been drawn, and she waged war for two centuries, for one object, the war of conquest, ambition, power.

There were Christians and Mahometans, not religious, surely not, contending, each affecting to draw from the one fountain of Judaism, itself sectarianism. What better could be expected from the children? Sectarians would rather principles should perish and religion cease, than that their peculir faith-bigotry should not prevail! It is dangerous for any such faith to prevail, as thereby bad men come to wield a dangerous power, who are able thus to set bad examples for monarchy. The peculiar faiths of all mankind are directly in conflict and antagonistic to the best position of mind.

Who is safe on the side of the destructive, that negative what is good, permanent, and rational?

Of all outrages, sectarianism of all kinds can excel the world. When a person seeks to convert us to his faith, that has no rational testimony, we have no faith in him only as a rank impostor. If you bring peculiar faith forward, as the test of one single thing, you make bigots for all things. Peculiar faith is a murdress, foul and degraded. Keep the elements of mind right, else everything is made to bend and conform to the iron despotic rule of peculiar faith of bibles of tradition.

Well may the world look out for all the despotisms of Judaism, Popery, Mahometanism, their awful conflicts not yet terminated after many centuries of antagonism, if any had the ascendancy. Have we forgotten the conflicts of the Mormons? See the case of Bhuddism and Brahminism. The history of such faith is analogous, and presents danger to the world, wherever peculiar faith exists.

What does peculiar faith do for the sovereign people? It is like imitating the cries of the young, inveigling through superstition that imitates rational religion. But for the benign spirit of toleration, which is one of the brightest reflections of mind, the horrors of the dark ages of peculiar faith would still triumph. Who doubts it, let him refer to the last views of Italy and Spain. In all the fury of fanaticism, the triumph of mind holds its sway through toleration, whose beauties and strength are hardly appreciated.

The fanaticism of peculiar faith diffuses a malign spirit over all the social relations of life, and the world. It is the exercise of bad faith to man, and blasphemy to God, repudiation to man, dishonesty to God.

By accustoming themselves to the sophistry of peculiar faith, the mind of the public is vitiated for abundant sophistry. On this basis the world decides, and merely from conceit, which is disgusting and contemptible.

At the most, faith, however peculiar, must be the subject of reason, and yields most certainly to universal faith. To whom are we indebted for the inquisition? To the doctrines of peculiar faith. Can you institute any law but that of reason? Is not the inquisition the law of peculiar faith, that of peculiar tyranny, sheer nonsense, if it had not been sheerest oppression? You cannot bring the masses, the clans, the cliques to rule, unless you rule them on principles. Christ's spirit is claimed in all the hundreds of christian sects, yet they war on each other! Our indignation might be aroused at the apparent inconsistency, if his nature had been truly depicted by his fabulists.

What humbuggery and vassalage have the people suffered by their masters, foisted on them by the same acts.

Who can attend all his life to the precepts of peculiar faith, with benefit? He hears but little else, as all else has been proscribed and anathematized by it. There are millions of martyrs to peculiar faith, bibles of tradition, fanatics, priests, preachers and ministers, bigots, popes and their minions. You cannot arrest the right action by peculiar faith. It is God's, and is rational religion.

The wise must go for reason and religion.

Peculiar faith draws drafts on mind in the treasury of God, without due acknowledgment. We must refer to such bare-faced pretences. The world secretly laughs at peculiar faith, as an imposition. Can rational beings sincerely believe in it? Do they not make a profession, policy of it available their way? The sooner blotted out of the world are all peculiar faiths, the better for soul and body, religion and God.

Those who adopt crazy doctrines are as bad as those who originated them.

Peculiar faith begets peculiar notion and opinion, that vary with or nurture peculiar interests! What sort of a vitiated society does it beget? What are people to do? They do not, cannot believe in all such matter that enslaves mind. They proscribe principles in defence of the worst tyranny ever invoked ostensibly for God, as the authority, but pretendedly, as is in the bible, when the very reverse is the reality.

It is singular, that the real intelligence of mankind should be superseded by their superstitious fears. The opinions of affiliation corrupt the perverted and ignorant. It is the most arrant credulity to believe peculiar gifts of the past, that should exist now, if ever. Those of the moderns, that advocate such idle and absurd pretences, are worse than the ancients. The malign influence for peculiar faith is in government, that arising in usurpations needs all the arts and devices of humbuggery to uphold it. All the odious enormities of such vile imposition are overlooked, by the bribes of hush-money. This very thing, peculiar faith, is nauseous and noisome in the eyes of proper sense and honesty. Who that sees the right analysis of the subject, but must believe that all peculiar faith is most abominable and degraded.

We attack no pure being, who is never identified with the odious crime of peculiar faith. Because you have joined its bonds that is no fault of mine. It is your misfortune, and you should, if wrong, retreat from its insidious folds.

And you, intelligent freeman, knowing better, as you see better, by the vision of true science, adopt all these degradations! When the wolf is to be expelled, we must not take him for the sheep. We cannot be caught by names—a meagre substitute for Deity. What a stumbling-block is peculiar faith, that proves only removes of mind, in superstitious rites and ceremonies.

Peculiar faiths cannot meet the contingencies of the world. While monarchies are local tyrannies, peculiar faith tyrannizes over the world. The howl of despotism is for faith, but a faith treacherous to the rights of mind and truth, a bad faith to the world and mankind.

What iniquity has been committed by peculiar faith. If mind had full justice done it, all peculiar faith would in one moment terminate! And that not a miracle. You cannot usurp the world, by monopoly of peculiar faith. No person, able or in power, should assume vulgar privileges.

How much the peculiar faith world differs in the expediency of correction, as it differs in the points of correction. What a pity it is that the world has not a full code of knowledge of all important points, to properly and timely guard against.

The worldly cannot see religion for peculiar faith, not only doing wrong, but seeking to put others wrong. Peculiar faith brutalizes and debases mind. Can there be anything meaner or worse than peculiar faith, that daily utters some hundreds of millions of falsehoods? People are misled in the mass, and yet they are willing to submit to the humbugs of the priestocracy. That miserable state of bad feeling, enmity or animosity of the world, about peculiar faith, is to be deprecated. See what peculiar faith has done already, in Judaism, and her prolific brood Christianity, Mahometanism, and Mormonism, and these only a beginning.

When these die out, as they will, because not built on science, then religion will prove her brightest light. It is the fault of peculiar faith that we condemn, as it has no principles, without which no universal system of good can be accomplished. That catch-word, faith, deludes the world. Faith is rational conviction. Our object in life should be the pursuit of truth, but when peculiar faith is adopted, it is on a false position, and there is no standard to prevent a falling to a lower depth.

The abstract maxims of peculiar faith will not do. Do not be wheedled, swindled out of your creation-birthright, religion, by the false pretences and position of peculiar faith. To maintain any peculiar view, rationalists have to leave their noble position, and give up the substance for the shadow.

The world has been overwhelmed by false faith and misrule. Commerce and religion unite the whole world. Why separate it by any false pretences of peculiar faith? The intelligent patriots of this Union sympathize with the unfortunate patriots of Europe on the eternal principles of universal brotherhood; and is this inefficient, hurtful thing, peculiar faith, that separates the world with hundred fold animosity and causes its bitterest ruin, to stalk to the end of time over mind? Let us, in the peace of man and love of God, be done with this heathenish barbarism of the ancient and modern world, that lies crippled or crushed beneath it bitterest poisons. The whole world needs correction.

It is not only China, but other extensive countries of Asia, subject to despotisms, and what is as bad, the first tottering under the piratical smuggling of opium, and that by the most enlightened of European nations who boast of Christianity! that should be the theatre of conservative revolutions, not of missionary petitions of peculiar faith, but of the real means of civilization among the Asiatic nations, especially the Arabs of the wretched country Palestine, and all the country to Babylon and Ninevah, peculiar faith is an article too abundant. All Asia needs rational religion.

Let us not wonder at the jealous policy of Japan, that fears the awful vicissitudes of peculiar faith in Western Asia, that has had such awful lessons taught them. And shall all this be lost on the wise of this generation of this nation, that is so blessed with a large share of the world's commerce and its happiness? Well may mind observe the question, Does it wish to appreciate the effects of what peculiar faith has been and is now? Let its attention be turned to Asia, Eastern Europe and Northern Africa, and after you have trodden the classic ground of its best contributions to the world, now desolate in much of its area. then you will still be better satisfied that much of Africa, however ignorant, has been spared some of the world's ferocious improvements. Africa has exported her barbarians for a better future, while conquerors, as Tamerlane, have reduced the country of the Euphrates and Tigris, and erected on the ruins of Bagdad a pyramid of ninety thousand heads! The Tartars and Saracens, as the Romans, have despoiled indeed. Sectarianism is vicious, criminal. The world ought to be rid of insidious impostures of peculiar faith. We now cannot trust any peculiar faith people with the faithful records of history. How much has been altered!

The source is poisoned to garble cursed bibles of priestocracies on the world! The vile persecutions of the world are not done with. They are arrested more by the power of toleration than by any merits of peculiar faith. It is enough to make misanthropes to see the effects of peculiar faith.

The world will never be rightly governed till universal brotherhood is established.

The world-poison is in the thing sectarianism.

The people are individually to be bettered. How can they be fairly and justly dealt with by any such, as the human mind has been crushed by the world's despotism for thousands of years? In getting rid of all peculiar faith and its education, we shall be exempt from all that fund of the world's evil. The functions of peculiar faith that assumes all, cause the question, who and what is the heathen world? All that does not belong to other particular peculiar dynasties. All peculiar faith, as Christianity, Mahomedanism, &c., is pagan idolatry, nothing more or less. All peculiar faith, where practical, has usurped temporal powers, and we see the evils of all when each is specified, as that of Judaism, in the bad fruit of a bad tree, the base of sectarianisms. The world has made itself a perfect blockhead about peculiar faith, that has been its worst point, whereby it has been overwhelmed, oppressed and ruined. Every little village is now divided by sectarianism in Christianity, between that and Judaism, &c. Apocrypha is an elegant illustration of peculiar faith, a test of faith between the Romanists and protestants. With rationalists, all is sure enough as apochrypha. If any peculiar faith be the true one, how came it to let the others get the start of it? If true, how came it not possess the whole world? None but fanaticism of peculiar faith could consider it essential that Christ should die by the million at Jerusalem, and leave the world most oppressed by other faiths, pretendedly for prophecies.

What world morals! Let the world throw away all the curses of peculiar faith. and its infamous sophistry.

As the chicanery of faith as all peculiar faith is false, how then can we promote religion by any other than rational means, as all bibles of tradition that represent peculiar faith are necessarily false?

Do not most set out determined to believe the faith of the country, however preposterous or absurd?

What was and is the character of the Egyptians and Hindoos for truth? What has been that of the Jews? Has it been most high-minded and honorable.

All countries had their tutelar deities, and necessarily their peculiar faith. Which was right? None. Which was wrong? All. Which was apocryphal? All. They were all not only worthless, but deeply injurious. Truth cannot be told where peculiar faith abides. Peculiar faith is the most childish trifling in place of religion. All the dispensations of peculiar faith, as Christianity, Mahommedanism, Mormonism, come from man most positively. If one peculiar faith be admitted, all must be. and thus the most irrational category is created, misleading mind. duping the world, and falsifying God's word. Man mars what ought to be left entirely to the Creator altogether.

What a scene for othodox peculiar faith people to contemplate, when their opponents, the Mahommedans, drove the Christians not only from their holy sepulchre, but from their eastern capital, which they have retained for several centuries.

The Romans built a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus where the temple of the Jew god, in Jerusalem, had stood.

The peculiar faiths had to contemplate a war, that ensued, wherein more than fifty Jewish cities were demolished; nearly a thousand of their best towns were destroyed: more than half a million of soldiers were slain by the sword; and in the end of the war the Jews were banished Judea, by Adrian, upon pain of death if they returned. What had not peculiar faith of the Jews to do with the destruction of Jerusalem? What could have been more wretched than their situation after Jerusalem was taken by Titus.

All peculiar faith is contingent and subject to corruption, as Judaism by Antiochus Epiphanes, and the Romans after him; but rational religion is above all when mind, reason, and rational education guide mankind. The whole wise world is interested in maintaining good faith and destroying the bad, which is peculiar.

The majority of the world does not think for itself, but is blindly misled by demagogues in the pulpit, politics, martial piracy, &c.

Many were the tricks and expedients for peculiar faith.

What a potency peculiar faith exerts over the world yet; what must have been its mighty influence once? What greater corruption can be exhibited of mass of muscle in abeyance to it. All undue advantages have been taken by it, in all forms and conditions of life. Tenants at will are hardly free, and despotism of government has made mind a tenant at will!

By reason that mind is prone to perversion by peculiar education, let us have no system that will promote that end; let us have the only proper means of rational education, that is from rational principles.

What are peculiar faith and its bibles but what past ages consumed thousands of years in mystifying, and in which thousands to come may be fruitlessly consumed in unraveling. After the use of all the talents, bibles of tradition, and time, the world is not as well off at the end thereof. And what have been the aim and scope of peculiar faith in general? To originate the power of superstition, to rule the devotees in this and other worlds. What good people do this? Who are good in this world? The peculiar faith people? How do they prove that?

Reason alone can tell us the difference between true and false faith. The very basis of argument faith helps each peculiar faith, to its own silence or its own defeat. Any one peculiar faith is therefore undeniably incompetent to proselyte other faiths, and has to yield all to rational faith. Do you decide, that we must go by faith? Then we may go for all peculiar faiths, as there is as much obligation on us for adoption of such.

All peculiar faiths are corrupt in conception and tend to corruption; the best Christian as others, was deeply corrupted by imperial unions. What improved it but mind, that directed reformations and revolutions in faith and government. To reach the highest proper position, it has to reach the highest state of rationality. The wretched state of ignorance conspired to aid in the promulgation of peculiar faith. All earth and its demoralization, have been moved about this thing of peculiar faith.

"Mahomet never asserted a falsehood" say the orthodox, when he asserted nothing else in the koran. Mahomet lied about his night journey from Mecca to Jerusalem and thence to Heaven, and would have ruined his whole design, had not his friend Abu Beer vouched for its veracity. This fiction made his fortune. Now but for the accommodating credulity of the world called faith, we should get rid of all peculiar faith. When peculiar faith is dependent it is mild and asks for toleration, but when in the ascendant, then it is dictator.

It creeps, by words, and progresses by the sword; after that it is upheld by sophistry, sustained by superstition and secured by bribes and sinister government. Thus with Judaism, Christianity, Mahommedanism. Moses held his power by superstition and an armed priestocracy. If his superstition did not avail, terrible as was the imposition, the swords of the Levites did the balance. If persuasion and art did not establish Christianity, the union with the mighty Roman power did. Rational religion is independent of all these designs and machinery of priestocracy. She is independent of prophecy and miracles, and can be demonstrated clearly and conclusively by the highest universe. There never was a peculiar faith, but what lied into existence, and was indebted to the same for its maintenance. Among other things the most conspicuous have angels, a most senseless invention. "This whole doctrine concerning angels Mahommed and his disciples have borrowed from the Jews, who learned the names and offices of these beings from the Persians, as themselves confess." Talmud Hieros. in Rosh hashana. Sale's Koran.

What a light the world would have if we had the books of the people preceding the Egyptians and Assyrians, or if literature be not accorded their predecessors, what if we had theirs?

All peculiar faith, is humbug, certain. Part of the world is humbug any how, and that is necessarily from that source much the larger part.

What awful schisms in the world have grown up by peculiar faith, none of which can possibly exist permanently with sectarianism, whereas if any of the last arise with supposed monotheism, it is proof positive, that it is not monotheism, but peculiar faith always. Judaism was sectarianism rank from its ignominious predecessors, and we see how little the Jews agreed with the ancient world. Who warred on them? Was not peculiar faith the cause of many ancient wars? Christianity and Mahomnedanism have had bloody work with each other; both of them have had parricidal assaults on Judaism, and all with their own offspring. How many bloody battles had Mahommedanism to sustain itself against what were called false prophets? What furious and relentless animosities still prevail? Is not this the case with all kinds of peculiar character that has reared its impudent face? No matter what be the garb of peculiar faith, it is a world's curse as its delusion, the sooner dropped the better. A few instances of Mahommedanism will suffice, as they are not so familiar to this part of the world. The sectary Bâbec cruelly put to death a fourth of a million of people, "it being his custom never to spare man, woman or child, either of the Mahommedans or their allies," says Sale. What dreadful deeds were perpetrated by the people called the Ishmelians, or the assassins. When Moseilama was killed, ten thousand of the apostates who followed this false prophet, were left dead on the spot. What wars can be more relentless?

As Abraham's prophecy declares the land should be the Jews' forever, what if under that prophecy the Jews should be always fighting the Mahommedans therefor? One may be perfectly disgusted with society, human nature, as society may be, and acts on a false basis. Society is mapped off by clique and kith circles. Has the majority of the world under the present defective organization of society, proper morals when it clearly has not pure religion? Peculiar faith necessarily alienates one portion of the world, from all others. What superstitious rites can be a rule of faith to mind? What nation has ever risen by peculiar faith, to the full demands of religion? Let the world answer. No peculiar faith is disinterested; all have their speculation and priestocracy. These little petty sectional views, must yield to the large ample continental world comprehension of religion. It must have no selfish subdivisions, when the world requires enlarged liberal views. The highest temporal objects have been sought by peculiar faith, that despoils mind of its noblest characteristics and best rights. Society is deeply corrupted by petty peculiar faith organizations, from which it has to be freed, ere truth and justice are done the world.

All revealed systems of peculiar faith, are made by the ignorance and superstition of the people.

In peculiar faith, the sovereign people are forgotten. The education of their minds is overlooked, as the main pillar of science and virtue.

Peculiar faith does not suit the rudest state of uncivilized society, and is at variance with the fundamental principles of the best society. Peculiar faith or bible revelation, does not approach rational religion, that secures the highest protection to society, and, therefore, such faith proves itself of mortal pretensions, consequently it could not have emanated from God. Peculiar faith begets many world evils as legislation, for forms of faith or belief, and to exclude unbelievers.

Religion is to save all rational minds.

There should never be the first advance of any such proceeding as peculiar faith, in any part of the world.

If this world were to act about anything else, as it does about peculiar faith, it would be considered deranged assuredly, and justly so.

The process of peculiar faith distorts the human mind, and renders it a miserable machine.

And the functionaries of peculiar faith assume to it, all that belongs to mind, that is crushed under its poisonous influences. The capital of peculiar faith is used as the pillars of despotism for the world. Yes, emperors proclaim peculiar faith to the people as long as they are verdant enough to be thus deluded, but how can freemen be blind enough to receive such? It is by a continuation of imposition, of sophists, whose sectarian spirit has crushed the noblest aspirations of rationalism. Pure religion does not breathe in the atmosphere of peculiar faith. All the people, of one peculiar faith, cannot agree, how then, can you reconcile the Mahommedans and the Christians, when their forefathers fought for two hundred years, nearly. For what did they fight? Conquest?

That was incompatible with rational principles.

For the sepulchre of Christ? That was fanaticism. And have not the Christian and Jew oppressed each other for nearly two thousand years? And will they not, for two millions, if they could exist?

The only end to them, and the blessing to the world, is by the majesty of mind, the most illustrious action, rational religion, this the world has yet to learn.

Is it that christianity boasts over philosophy, that the last was incompetent to govern the world? In what has she then proved herself superior or adequate? The sectarianism of sophists, has misruled the most of the world. It is that spirit that murdered a Socrates, expelled the philosophers, as they were called under the Roman Emperors, and has basely maligned, and excluded the hallowed spirit of rational religion, the only conservative of the world. The advocates vociferously speak of the pretended civilization of peculiar faith, especially christianity. Mind claims, as just to the whole world, the refinement of civilization, and that rational religion alone can give.

It is not in the nature of any sectarianism, of which christianity is an impudent part, to give pacification to the world. How are the peculiar faith-people sophists? Because they advance the idea that deism would ruin the world, that cannot otherwise reach a higher position in morals and religion.

They are in perfect antagonism with deism, that they must destroy to survive themselves.

The humility of monotheism is the greatest, as its sincerity is complete, and its confidence in God universal, comprehending all the soul especially.

Does any peculiar faith rear any temple of virtue, and practice odious iniquity behind it?

What is the difference between Pagan and Christian?

The first had open idolatry, the second has book-idolatry. How can the world break down the errors of peculiar faith that horribly assails it?

The glory of mind's light must do it.

The strong arms of powerful monarchies of the world support them; money and its pernicious influence sustain them; the people love them—women worship, men fear, children look up to them. The humbugs of the ancient priestocracy are nothing to the modern, who affirm them to be the essence of morals and religion. Bibles of this faith, are the coins of priestocracy. Patriots of this world correct all this. All the worst false pretences have been sought to establish peculiar faiths. Citizens of America, complete your freedom from these, the glorious refinement of civilization through mind.

Why do we speak against all the peculiar faiths of the world? Because none of them have any pure religion. In this, then, mind should not let the world get the advantage of it. Why is there antagonism in the world, about peculiar faith? Is there not enough, about other things? There can be none about rational faith, pure religion, that unites the whole world into one grand brotherhood, and harmonizes its dignified union. Had the ignorant ancients, the presuming priestocracy, left many things alone, they had not imposed so many errors on the world. The moderns must modestly analyze, and refuse credence to peculiar faith. But what a bore on the world, that is outraged indeed. Families have to conform to the vitiated peculiar faith of the day, else be ostracized. Men, in our circle, so far from asserting the dignity of intelligent minds, in speaking out what their independence entitles them to, sneak out of all responsibilities, and are actually afraid to read, much less discuss, the important truth of the world!

Peculiar faith must corrupt all countries, without exception. All its churches have no principles inherent, as all must be united on a false position. What virtue is there in all that? Proscription attends opposition thereto, and where it has union with state, so much tyranny it has displayed, by persecution and punishment, or peculiar influence and power. A new conservative organization must prevail, to have public opinion most enlightened, and rational religion most elevated. Let the world not only aim to be right, but lay the sure foundation to appropriate it. All the foundations of peculiar faith have to be broken up, ere public opinion is right, for the world to uniformly assert its own rights and correct its own wrongs. It will not do, to let others decide in all this matter exclusively for mind.

Who is qualified in integrity, talents, and disinterestedness? By the people's taking for granted that irresponsible priestocracy would act up to their pretended good talk, usurpation commenced, and having its hold sustained in state power, will not relax it.

What, then, is the difference between atheism and polytheism? Has either of them any correct principles? The difference between the atheists and polytheists, who go for more gods than one, is this. The first deny God and the duty to him, that is religion, and of course duty to man. The last deny a correct, faithful duty to God or man. They impart a false worship in peculiar faith, a blasphemy to God, and a most ungodly despotism on man.

All polytheists go for revelation, that is necessarily based on false pretences, as it is obvious to all the rational part of mankind, that mind is the agent of God on earth. Nearly all the ancient philosophers, and peculiar faith people of all ages, are so superficial, that it is absolutely dangerous to follow them, in their metaphysical pretences.

All peculiar faiths are contingent, which clearly cannot suit mind, in all its various permanent conditions of life. Atheism or polytheism is the necessary result from all peculiar faiths, it seems to us. Peculiar faith has not scrupled to manage God's affairs, and interpret for him most absurdly; it cannot meet the necessary demands of the world, and of course is exploded. It cannot begin to satisfy the world; its end is worse when all see it—no form, no kind, no pretension will answer. But none must oppose it. It is an unpopular step, especially with the women. All its advocates profess to have its peculiar revelation. If that be so, let it be provable, and reliable, as genuine. After all the pretences of revealed faith, it is all founded on the teachings of perversion of mind respecting the universe, and all for the sinister purpose of absolute rule and tyranny.

Mind comes short of the proper comprehensive analysis. As to feeling being the test for peculiar faith, that must be all a pretence of the party advocates, the partisan priestocracy, as all claim that much.

How much history is made to bend to peculiar faith? All the bibles of peculiar faith are old legends and myths, and every one of them analogous, all relying on unity of false pretences. What will not peculiar faith do? Will it not excite in the world a peculiar state of immoral feeling, most difficult to be eradicated?

What did not the military spirit of the ancient world, with its ferocious exhibitions of embittered feelings? What did the gladiatorial shows at Rome do less, than finally expose her as one of the bloodiest butchers of the world? Did not peculiar faith demoralize the whole world, Palestine included, when she sacrificed her children to the fire of Moloch? What had she to boast of but her degradation, if she had ever been presented with the true worship of the God of the universe? All such faith corrupts the mind. But how is it possible that in all countries where any peculiar faith prevails, that people get along in that faith? They succeed in the universal principles of mind, the elements inherent to life, granted by the immutable God of nature. The followers of these peculiar faiths do many fantastic tricks before God, they pray to him, sacrifice and seek to appease him as if he was a mutable priestocracy idol. All mankind have to watch over their own actions, and commune as rational beings before God for their own correction as they are the mutable beings. What have they to say to the immutable Deity? Instruct their mind.

They can be thankful and grateful, and should cultivate all such refined feelings. I thank my God that I have such a splendid governmental liberty, to write what I consider just for him and all mortals. You wish to travel over the globe peacefully and religiously. Can you declare your peculiar faith without offence to the law of God and man? No. But civilize the world, and then you and the rest of the world lose your and their hold on all peculiar faiths, and all will adopt what is just to God and man, rational religion. No other will safely convey you all in this world.

But you boast of the numbers flocking to you. What does that signify? Raising up sects is nothing. Mahomet raised his, and the number comprises now nearly one-seventh of all mankind, it is said. The Mormons are very recent, and number several thousands. Their sect has flourished on the same platform as Christianity and others, that of peculiar bibles, and if they had the sword they would find the followers by the power. The whole world would be actually Mormonized, if they could dictate terms to-day. And so would it be under the sway of any peculiar faith, capable of mastering it by brute force. What conscience has any? Is it in Christianity, that fought for its very existence, and afterwards for this very purpose, some two hundred years continuously? What virtue is there in peculiar faith? Is it not a barren fig tree? The fault is in the people who do not reason, but look forward for sinister purposes, &c. They put themselves into the power of the artful and unprincipled intriguers of the world.

As long as peculiar faith exists, principles cannot accompany. Though the world does not fight now generally, fortunately being governed by the light of mind, still, peculiar faiths keep it in antagonism. Peculiar faiths will alienate the various portions of the world from each other, that can be united by religion. As with bad and unprincipled lawyers and doctors, so with parsons who could not give me any of their peculiar faiths with all their delusive premiums of bribery and corruption, in exchange for rational religion, which they clearly have not got.

How much valuable time is spent in the world by peculiar faith people in hearing, reading, and using controversial writings about peculiar faith, that of itself is worthless. What does it all amount to? Science ought to be discussed and lectured on instead, as that will not divide but harmonize the world. Then a universal brotherhood will prevail. Where will peculiar faith longest linger? Among ignorant people and despotisms, union of church and state. There is the charm. The adherents of peculiar faith argue in this way, we might as well gather the fruit as others; but they should not gather it illegitimately and blasphemously.

A man that is under peculiar faith doctrine becomes a bigot. The mind, and not the heart, is concerned in the investigation of truth the world over, and if it be not rationally concerned it is irrationally. Peculiar faith does not look above the priestocracy. No peculiar gospel of any bible of tradition can be upheld in truth, honesty, or reason.

How ridiculous is the contest of peculiar faith people, that some of them are better than others.

That argues against the first, who had the best means, and therefore are not as good, relatively.

How comes it that the best are in such a perversion of light, in which there can be none good? The first and only true question arises, is monotheism right? If so, then the whole world must come into it; the sooner the better; lay aside all peculiar faiths. This is the religion of the whole universe, none other can suit at all.

Christ or Bhudd, Mahommed, Lama, or Smith, if potent here, never would get through the exhaustless universe; of course, then, monotheism is the position forever.

Who is chargeable for the atheism of France? Peculiar faith despotism, that had crushed rational mind, and had invoked the stupid flock of faith.

All peculiar faiths, as the Christian, Jewish, &c., are of human invention, but monotheism is of God.

All the advocates of all the peculiar faiths combined can never fill up the awful chasm in mind, that is left in mind ere their particular faith takes hold of it, thus proving the whole an imbecility, a blasphemy in the sight of the pure God who created, endowed, and preserves all minds. O vile, wicked, degraded priestocracy.

The adoption of peculiar faith is the blasphemy of the Almighty, slander of his religion, and catering to the worst demoralizations of the world.

You cannot reform religion, but you can reform youselves and your faith. No peculiar faith can stand. How often are intense efforts made to cover weak and corrupt priests.

There are many systems of peculiar faiths, all emanating from superstition and her speculation, all more or less absurd, none religious.

No peculiar faith can prove the authenticity of its own scriptures, nor say aught against monotheists.

The extensive establishment of any peculiar faith as Christianity, Mahommedanism, Mormonism, Bhuddism or Brahminism, is no proof of its authenticity, since the world has been divided mostly among such faiths. All may flourish. None of it has a living principle.

Peculiar faith has an awful quantity of infamous vices that affect the world. This country now has the Mormons, Christians, Jews, Bhuddists, Atheists; all must embrace rational religion, toleration will be very partial.

What virtue peculiar, has peculiar faith?

This world is now filled with poisonous, bitter, deadly feuds, of sects and peculiar faiths arrayed against each other, the representatives of which they had rather see perish, than one jot or tittle of their pretended prophecies, or their exploded demoralizing books, called bibles. What an idle legend is peculiar faith: what stuff about infidelity.

That religion had nothing to do with peculiar faiths, the whole of their history for the world's age will prove, if nothing more. Has not all the calendar of crimes been committed? Has there been ranker ambition, deeper avarice, more relentless pride and revenge, more malign by inquisitions? Under the name of religion, all the world iniquities have been practiced.

Peculiar faith begets a false confidence—hypocrisy. To say that the ancient philosophers could not find out peculiar faith, is contradictory to history, as they had nothing else but peculiar faiths that are polytheisms diversified only.

Peculiar faiths have no peculiar virtues; all have their vices.

The law protects all peculiar faiths claiming the name of religion, and all that is not too monstrous to be permitted, is protected by law. The pulpit is the arena, and the people can adopt or reject, without any benefit of testing the correctness. Very rarely is that side heard, as the discussion of the truth is interdicted. There is religion in the world, and has been, necessarily, from the first rational mind, from the nature of things, but no thanks to peculiar faith. There is plenty of religion in churches, but no thanks to churches. Rational religion was before churches. People are too disunited in the universal matters. The appropriate legitimate means should be fairly, rightly and universally used, to rescue mind from its agrarian peculiarities. Can there be anything meaner than bigotry? A female bigot hates, with all the fury and meanness. You might do her all the favors practicable, but such a bigot is a bigot still. Though the talents and merits might be of the first order, they would be the best reason for bigotry to assail. Peculiar faith tells you to look to the master, religion reasons you into conservative principles. The spirit of ill-feeling is kept up in the world by peculiar faith that has its own peculiar interest. How can any be exempt from suspicion of motives, when they persist in that non-entity, peculiar faith? What will not peculiar faith do, when united to all practicable despotisms?

Can freemen overlook the eastern barbarism of degrading man to the Eunuch, and possessing the liberty of murdering slaves? What degradation of the east, yet! The exposure to sale of women, for wives, or worse, concubines, by their own relations.

The world must act for principle, not for fanaticism, plunder nor blood, as the peculiar sects and faith people do. The phalanx of peculiar faith people, is a great one, and their conscience is hardened, because they are steeled by monopoly and usurpation. All that is irrational in peculiar faith, has no existence in religion. Now all we are, and have in this world, is based on rationality. The world cannot always be fanatic. All peculiar faith is purposeless.

Let us have all the good faith that the world is entitled to. What if two conflicting armies about to engage, having peculiar faith, were to offer up their petitions, as they are called? Thus peculiar faith is such a monster, that both armies would be sacrificed to its unholy requests! Prayer is to reform the petitioner, not the petitioned. There is where the world has been mistaken so long. As to prayer, two hostile fanatic armies meet to fight, but first pray as the Christian and Mahomedan, and if God hears the prayers of both, he will have to destroy both, annihilate them; thus peculiar faith is such. It brutalizes mind, to the lowest beastiality. As an evidence of the effects of peculiar faith, the priestocracy cannot or will not give a fair analysis of religion, but assume that they have it, and make war with contemptible antagonism on monotheism, as if that God-given inheritance was to be excluded by their ignominious monopoly.

Their priviliges have only been tolerated by the stupid ignorance of the people, for monotheism was the only God-creation in this respect, and all that are after truth can see it by the fairest comprehensive analysis. But how many have sold their birth-right for a part of the millions of dollars that the world is plundered out of yearly? Society is cut up and many cut out of its universal rights, by peculiar faith documents and bibles. This exclusiveness ought not to be at all.

Can the fanatic bigot become a good citizen, after he is informed of better positions than his peculiar faith, that has no existence? Who that has rational education is not perfectly astonished at this state of things in an intelligent country?

On what can Christians and Mahommedans, Jews and Mormons, peculiar faiths of all kinds unite?

On principles? They have no conservative principles. Where did they get them? Monotheism had all them from God! On faith? That separates them. On revelation? Which? The latest? Will the Mormon do it, after expulsion from three states, and confidence in none? The Christian says the Mormons have no pretensions. On what basis? Reason. That excludes the Christian! If a few able and patriotic men come forward and do their duty, Monotheism, the law of the universe, will be carried out in this age, and not be deferred. Let bigotry cower before the altar of religion. A man that is exclusively devoted to peculiar faith, becomes nearly infatuated on that subject. One party finding another party peculiarly recusant, is still worse excited. What a world spirit! Where are the great and legitimate bonds of brotherhood of this world? Has accursed peculiar faith produced them? How can even this country be united in brotherhood, without the principles? How few of the world know that all peculiar faiths, as the most valued Christian, or any, are all humbugs, and yet the people expect something of the kind, and will have the humbugs. The priestocracy and the peculiar powers of united state or government, profit by the popular delusion.

If the world were to investigate peculiar faith, Christian or Jewish, Mahommedan or Mormon, it will find all such nothing—a counterfeit, spurious coin not worth the paper written on! I know one thing, that all such is humbug of the worst kind, manufactured by the priestocracy for their peculiar benefit, and they have to fight it out with all that controvert their position by all the falsest pretences.

All peculiar faith is not worth noticing or receiving, even on premium. All are deceiving. The only true way is that which does justice to the unity of God, that does not derogate from his dignity, worth and perfection. All peculiar faith men make the God of the universe imperfect. But this is their peculiar God, in their bad faith.

All such christianity, or any reduced to truth, renders itself ridiculous and absurd, and the advocates foolish; they know little or nothing but for mind, which they libel and outrage. Most of these peculiar faith people read but little, and analyze less. What will they not do? The vilest bigots, and yet they do not know that they are the veriest infidels to rational religion and God! What, christians infidels? The very worst sort, and nothing less.

Let all peculiar faith people discard the follies and crimes of their peculiar faiths and bible, and all unite in religion. The first has been the strong arm of despotism, nay, despotism itself; when the last has modestly borne her meek honors thick upon her.

Not only does the world sustain, by reason of peculiar faith, undignified contentions, but hypocrisy.

The spirit of love for the world and mankind is entirely eradicated by the world nuisance, peculiar faith.

Sophistry is a part of this world's magic invariably.

But for peculiar despotism and faith the world now would be deeply united. Science unites much of the world now. Truth, reason, mind, will exclude peculiar faith and all its bibles out of society. Experience proves that all such bibles are the explosions of an age long since past, unsuited to the moral, social, national, and world mind. Let there be no alienation of good feelings in the world; we should diminish all such.

There must be no pandering to partisan, sectional or peculiar views. The world can take new starts on conservative revolutions. They will come; do not arrest them, for it will be like damming up mighty rivers, and the radical injury, the radical revolution, will be the consequence. The most hypocritical electioneering is brought about by peculiar faith. This is not really American. Give us, besides the noblest American constitutional government, holy religion. No! give us not one iota of Jew peculiar faith, no more than of the Jew government, or his barbarisms. All these things have been stolen from mind, whose noblest rights have been oppressed.

Christian peculiar faith talks of civilization, and it is quarreling with each other's professors in every country among themselves, and with the whole world of peculiar faiths.

What can you do with peculiar faith or medical bigots? You may do them any and all favors, and their black ingratitude can see nothing but their own peculiar prejudices and interests.

The world has been thousands of years, and has not yet got to pure religion, impeded as it has been by the adulterated self-interest of peculiar faith. Peculiar education begets prejudices all peculiar.

The world needs unity of love, and how can it get it?

Peculiar faith has not the elements, as material necessaries. God intended for no speculatious in religion. As much was the ancient world short of the full comprehension of true geographical position before the discovery of America by Columbus, as peculiar faith bibles are of religion without the bible of the universe. The world possesses the right elements of religion, pure and natural; it must drop the speculations of peculiar faith to do right. The intelligent and thinking religious world should be cut out of all means of mind perversion as far as practicable, hence exclude peculiar faith matters at once. All peculiar faiths will go down necessarily as the principles of religion advance, and rational education gains the ascendancy of mind. Peculiar faith, as christianity, is sectional, sectarian, partisan, whereas religion is comprehensive as the globe, the universe, adequate for mind, suitable for all mankind and nurtures the world's union and peace on principles most conservative to rational minds.

The world, the universe, cannot be benefited by peculiar faith policy. Let the intelligent and just world teach the whole professors of all peculiar faiths the noblest lesson of religion, that has naught to do with such stuff, but recognise all mankind, as far as practicable, as one universal brotherhood. No one can be a true friend to the brotherhood of the world, that goes for peculiar faith. All this peculiar faith is the real despotism of mind. There should be at this age among citizens no enslavement of mind. What is the condition, under absolute governments, but this establishment, a sacrifice to one-man power? The colossal power of Russia centres in her czar for emperor and pope-god of his church. With absolute military and clerical imperial sway, he assumes faith when he is showing the most horrid bad faith to religion, and of course to the world. If he did it ignorantly or wickedly, he should stop it.

What is the emperor of China perpetrating, but the same despotism?

The world needs the noblest characteristics of human nature, the noblest specimens, the worthiest conception of rational mind, that render human nature the most lovely. In what light do these emperors appear before the world? Peculiar faith distorts what is rational, and proscribes what is right, the dupe, the bully of superstition. The opinion of the supposed great who uphold the bibles, their power, is preferred to the truth of reason. You emperors have it in your power to teach your numerous people, your population of many millions, to be men, to forego all the hypocrisy of peculiar faith, and take hold of all the requirements of religion. All the heads of government are bound to advance their people as mind, in all the legitimate precincts of rational education, government and religion. But the glorious legitimate amity of the world is broken up by all the curses of peculiar faith, that does the rankest injustice to mankind. It is one of the vestiges of ancient barbarism, and has escaped the shrewdest perceptions of the people by its sagacious and unprincipled sophistries.

Religion has to be put in abeyance to peculiar faith, that does the greatest injustice to the world's peace and dignity, its loveliness and welfare. How comes it, Christian, that you war on one hundred and forty millions of mankind because they are Mahommedans? Suppose, now, the world was equally divided, half Mormons and the other Christian. Would there not be the bloodiest war that the world ever saw—ending in the most outrageous barbarism? If the Romans had power to-day, the inquisitions past are nothing to what the world would suffer.

If the pope had his own people slaughtered by French bayonets, what would he not do with strangers?

Well has it been that the Roman pope is bereft of the power of the Greek church pope. And mankind has assuredly mistaken all this for religion! The world cannot stand at what it is. It must go forward. It has stultified itself enough, and dearly paid for its experience by too much of its blood, treasures and sacrifices of mind. What an idea of separating the world by such lines of demarcation. There is nothing rational about bigotry. A bigot in a republic or monarchy is a bigot still, and is as proscriptive in either as power permits. To counteract all this, the permanent organized plans of mind's progress through rational education must be arrayed. Exclusive control of religion is claimed by the advocates of peculiar faith, one of the falsest pretences imaginable. Why such claims? Does feeling that is a delusion not verified by facts, give it when the principals are false? What a collusion between sophistry and bigotry! What a compound has the Asiatic become, a vassal to despotism of peculiar faith. The Brahmin expelled the Bhuddist, by whom he was expelled, both giving India the blessings of civil war instead of religion; and thus it would be in England, if mind was not too enlightened for the bigotry of peculiar faith that fills the world even now with civil commotion, when it cannot embroil it in odious civil wars. Has not all Western Asia been ruined that way? Has Egypt ever recovered from the baseness of the priestocracy dynasty, a blasting kingdom wherever its inquisitorial and proscriptive despotism is exerted? Mind has been worth nothing under its most odious and execrable dictation.

The preservation of the public is more important than peculiar faith. Of course, the people do not know, but have self-delusion about peculiar faith, all of which is in the same category of error throughout the world. Lay aside all the bibles thereof, and learn of the moral sublimity of rational religion.

Peculiar faith embroils mankind, in families, countries, world, and universe, unfit for all. She is the pest of society, and the curse of mind. She is not trustworthy in the humblest cottage, nor the royal palace, where her sovereign rules her out, and turns his back on her for another pet, no more correct, but more subservient tool, to his whims and his despotic policy. All such creations are unknown to the Creator. Her little brief authority is most dangerous in the extremity to the tyrant, who exercises it thus improperly. In the name of religion, the universe, mind, God, repudiate all such.

Matrons, who make sacred family, and consecrate mind, by religion, to your God, take not this conglomeration of serpents to your bosom, to render man a conglomeration of all the worst of animality.

The religion of principles will restrain all bad acts, and elevate minds, always to be relied on, as sufficient. Cultivate this in your household, and you will render it the happiest, by the Creator's blessing. Then the world's despots will have no base to pretend to a faith false to all humanity, and abominable to all the purity of honest and truthful minds. Such despots will all be scouted from the face of the earth, and will be remembered for this their deadliest mental poison.

Nicholas, imitate the example of Peter of Russia, and give a constitutional government to your people. Cast aside that church sanctuary, and come into the rational church of God. Do not be associated in peculiar faith, with the inside barbarians of Asia. I am one of the sovereigns of America, your equal; conservative principles are paramount to, and take precedence of all peculiar faiths and bibles, and necessarily exclude all such as in antagonism therewith.

There were peculiar faith tests, to hold office, until very recently even, in New Hampshire, that has abolished them by the present constitution. That is, only a protestant could hold office! How green the people about religion! Have they ever considered the impositions of the whole world, and that the priestocracy are the heads of the most damning faiths? The fixing up of this world after man's fashion, not God's ways.

You, Jew and Christian, complain of Mahommedans and Mormons. You have taught them the degraded way to deceive man and brutalize woman, to outrage mankind and degrade humanity.

The peculiar faith people have no foundation whatever for their bibles, not a particle but false pretences. Peculiar faith has been setting the whole world at variance, in odious, murderous, criminal hostility, and yet the whole adopting it cannot prove its first point. Let it get out of the pulpit, and depart degraded. The world antagonisms, through peculiar faith, are as abundant as the collision of solar systems, if deranged. What section of the globe has not peculiar faith, its bibles, and priestocracy set at variance, pitting father against son, the household against itself? What part of the world is not full of vulgar deadly conflicts of peculiar faith? The whole world has labored but to little purpose, to get only peculiar faith. A wise and just man looks to his proper duty, not his peculiar faith, to mankind and God. Now peculiar faith certainly does not give any peculiar guarantee to the whole world, that has no particular safety but principles that are conservative for the universe.

How can you put the world at peace? By the noble principles of rational religion. But peculiar faith obstructs all that, and causes improper conflicts. Take away such, as all means of antagonism. History of the world now tells the tale, paints the facts. When the people, under christian influence, drove the Mormons out of Missouri, Illinois, &c., if the last had had the full power of the sword, what a bloody war would have deluged America.

Would the world have seen an end to it for an age?

Has it yet seen the end? The feud is silenced at present.

Why then, not stop all such stuff; we will begin at the fountain-head. Can you call any such religion, that sheds blood? That of God? It was evolved by the worst passions, the most flagrant outrage on religion. Peculiar faith, christianity, Judaism, or any other has no truth, no honesty, no foundation, all built up to fool and defraud the world. Give us the dignity of religion and liberty, that comprehend the proper courtesy due the whole world, the official acts of the world-brotherhood. As often as any other peculiar faith is built up, so often is a base for peculiar squabbles, conflicts and antagonism, with the pure principles of rational religion, and the unity of God. Nothing short of rational intelligence, virtue and religion, can elevate the world, and keep it at its rightful point. All peculiar faiths are exclusive to their disgrace of having religion.

How many millions ruin themselves by partisan views?

It is all to no purpose that peculiar faith prevails.

The wise and virtuous world must look through all such designs of man, lustful and ambitious, to God. Religion is the highest link carried out in all its practical duties, that binds mind to Deity, the moral world with the universe. The peculiar faith-people, and their bibles, have no pretensions to principles, consequently their frame-work for society is destitute of truth, honor or honesty. Which is most destitute of these, the priestocracy, pettifoggers, who seek to cloak all the pretences of law, or the doctors of the old regime, who impose on the people their fraud, that the people cannot cure diseases?

What can correct all this? Conservative revolution.

The unprincipled, so far from thanking, actually war on conservative reformers.

Those who adopt peculiar faith-bibles, are prepared to advocate fanaticism, and all its absurd dogmas.

How much longer can the world be gulled with peculiar faith-bibles. What rational mind would ever think of making them the rule of his faith or practice? My reverence to God and truth, forbids. A total conservative revolution alone can effect what is needed, as everything is wrong with monopolists, who usurp the support of the world.

Why are all peculiar faiths in such deadly animosity, antagonism to each other? Is it for holy zeal to the God of the universe, or is it to the god of profits? Are the people blinded, that they will not see all this? The God of universal conservative principles, desires the best of universal brotherhood, but the elements of all peculiar faiths are alien to all this. As some of the monopolies that have overrun, they have corrupted most feloniously the whole earth.

The advocates of peculiar faith act like aliens to each other—deadly hostile, and this they call religion, that unites the whole world into one universal rational, honorable, most friendly brotherhood.

Kings, and the priestocracy, have broken up the world's brotherhood by usurpation, and monopoly, among themselves, and no doubt, have secretly gloated at the peculiar faith mock-auction farces.

As one little Jew peculiar nation is to the whole earth, so is their peculiar faith in ratio to religion.

Peculiar faith and its bibles all absurd, incredible and blasphemous, that desecrate God's functions and creation, are due to the degraded regime of stupid, abominable ignorance, and despotism, that profits thereby. As go despotisms most certainly, so go all their machinery, as state faiths, and their livings, bibles, and all that fatten on the spoils of the people, the world, who are defrauded, contemned and laughed at, as fooled. Who could expect less than opposition from all the tribe, that is so unprincipled?

All the advocates of peculiar faith kill each others' faith.

Do not adopt any peculiar faiths that arise from the school of ignorance and fraud, that cause the priestocracy to support it by sophistry and falsehood, the people to maintain it by sectarian hatred and conflicts, to teach children the same, to the disgrace of parents.

There is no peace, nor can there be, between the different peculiar faith people. Under the influence of peculiar faith, bigotry, an unmitigated vassal of usurpation, runs through all the social rights, a curse to man's character and the world.

Peculiar faith will create millions of peculiar lies. What but the silence of their churches must follow? Stop the desecration of morals and religion, that are too holy for preachers and churches. They are the holy property of mind. I will do churchmen justice, as possessors of mind, what they do not do themselves, their souls, minds nor God, justice in the first best capacity. If all will carry out uniformly the unity of God, then they will act consistently with truth and facts.

Peculiar faith takes away mind's merits and worth, and presents in the eclipse of mind, the darkest storms of fanaticism. Religion cannot possibly arouse up the storms of the world's conflicts, for she calms and soothes men's passions by the most legitimate rationality.

She holds all peculiar faith in abeyance, as a vile caricature, a detestable, contemptible demagogism. And all its bigots will carry out their infamous conspiracies upon the rights of mind, the conservative principles of the universe.

Peculiar faith talks of idols of heathens, the outside barbarians, under the dictation of its priestocracy. What odds does it make whether the idols be of stone or flesh, whether manufactured by hands employed in statuary, or fiction of imagination? Whether books called bibles, or images of any kind? Whether the polytheism has many gods, four or three? Whether in America or Europe, Asia or Africa, India, China or Japan, whether called Christian or Pagan, heathen inside or out, backwoods or forewoods, barbarians?

Who to-day, is defender of the faith? What faith? Peculiar faith. That is a piracy on religion, a petty larceny.

The spirit of perjury is extensively diffused throughout the world. Why is this? Because the foundation of truth is not permitted to take her legitimate sway in rational mind. This is the evil that peculiar faith diffuses over the world.

The proper and efficient system must be established, to abate the abominable world-nuisance of peculiar faith. That is the world-wide legislation on principles, and that is religion. What a conviction is forced on the world, that has been harassed its age by peculiar faith difficulties, that rational religion alone will vanquish the whole proposition.

As to the intelligent people of the United States, they have not investigated the subject of peculiar faith, being scared off by the ministers, the priestocracy. Let this matter be wisely discussed. All good men, whether deceived priestocracy or not, ought to seek consultation of mind's light by the best investigation, and drop their errors, if discovered, or adhere to truths.

What are the crimes, the taints, spots foul and reeking with gore of peculiar faith? She commenced with human sacrifices as her spoils, the weak, those in the way of others, and thus her infuriated morbid appetite reeking with gore, cried for more. She slaughtered millions of adults. Did she ever sacrifice in America? Yes, among the outside and inside barbarians, in every land. She erected the demon's altar, and Christians presided, and horridly did they perform the oblation, for two hundred victims were the offer! That was not all—that is not all—that will not be all. They have sacrificed all over the earth. The only protection to man is through rational mind, rational religion. Send missionaries to Pagans. Let missionaries be sent to Christians. As long as the demon peculiar faith stalks over the earth, in Christian, Mormon, Jewish, Mahommedan, Brahminical, Bhuddist or any other cloak, man's life, property, reputation, conscience, religion, is not safe. All are at the mercy of the demon. Take rational education away, and man must see, for man will feel. Toleration goes, and intoleration with her base proscriptions ensue. Let the last strong hold of gigantic world-sophistry, be dissolved, before the light of the Creator. How curious is it, that the world with all its mental improvement, adheres to the juggler's superstition of all peculiar faiths, and think that they are something. Why does not every wise patriot in the world, rise in the majesty of rational intellect, and put it down? Because hitherto, it was only a change of peculiar faith, for some other as iniquitous. They are all flagitious, and will be superseded by rational religion, the only thing to sustain the perfection of laws and the proper position of mankind.

The rational soul could not receive any of the pretended gifts of peculiar faith, with all their bribes, no matter what the slander of human nature by sycophants, that every man has his price. But the priestocracy affect spiritual faith.

Peculiar faith has no kind of religion, therefore it has none spiritual. She is a potent engine of deception and injury to the world; is a dangerous thing to handle, both for professor and the world on which it is used.

All peculiar faith, as Christianity, Mormonism, &c., is sordid sectarianism. All that is valuable is under the banner of rational religion. Analyze peculiar faith.—All that it is worth is the borrowed, yet ever unacknowledged capital of rational religion, the balance is its own peculiar vices. Its virtues are those of rational religion, its vices and their results are its own. Who would own such for a slave? Peculiar faith has filled the world with iniquity, dissension, and ungodly antagonism, perfectly irreconcilable for ever.

No peculiar faith people can convict another clearly. They are all equal, but have to bow to the majesty of monotheism, that convicts them all of petty larceny on her domains. Why are the Jews silenced? They are not allowed to speak in their own rights. What verdant people; when all might act as men, honestly and truthfully, in rational religion. The peculiar faith tuition can never teach the world its duty, for it has not the elements.

To whom can mind apply? To peculiar faith, that has wronged it so much, and crushed its rights? All peculiar faith people miserably neglect impiously the word of God. There is no evidence but what is rational. God is the only standard in all this matter.

Conversion is necessarily rational. Profession of faith, is it? The operation of the spirit is so powerful, as some pretend, as to cause the hysterical to faint, jerk, &c.

Who is at fault, the preachers that preach, or the smart people who desire it? Will you, good citizens, pay a preacher to help cheat you with the most wily sophistry, and both cheat your God; no, that cannot be done; cheat yourselves, truly. You have to admit that it was bad faith that set the Christians and Mahommedans together in arms for two centuries.

Now, what is that which keeps you Christians from a feeling well disposed towards the Jew, Mormon, and Mahommedan, on the one side, and the Gentile on the other? Because of the sectarian spirit wherewith you were inducted into your church, the vile spirit of antagonism to rational religion and the unity of God. In all peculiar faith there is no intrinsic religion.

These peculiar faiths commenced in the deepest corruptions with false pretences in oracles, auguries at first, and have become worse steeped in guilt as they have grown older. They have some plausible sophisty, if they had not God's only universal word contradicting themselves the world over. Peculiar faith makes polytheists, who make atheists. Rational religion makes monotheists. Every peculiar faith has degraded the God of the universe. Not at all; they have blasphemed him and degraded themselves, substituting their peculiar imbecile god therefor. How long will the people hire them to do so much wrong?

As to peculiar faith, which is to believe any things the priests told, that is too uncivilized, too peculiar for my mind, constituted as it is, for the reception of universe facts, to believe or know. The present age needs civilization and religion, not peculiar faith nor its ignoble priestocracy.

What is the difference between Jewish idolatry and peculiar faith, human sacrifices, butchery of mind, and those of other nations? There is no history in peculiar faith as Christianity, it is all story. All peculiar faith is totally unprincipled. Peculiar faith, like a base usurper, is not grateful to mind, that she has conspired against in all ages and governments. The world does not need any more church or world idolatry, to ruin mind by the sophistry of peculiar faith.

Superstition is dovetailed with ignorance, both of which must be removed by rational education, the great world lever. All bibles are built up by superstition and ignorance, and retained by bigotry and absolutism. Peculiar faith of the world is dead through rational mind, and it is for the American people to act first in the burial, the sooner the better, that the world may reach an equitable distribution of its own rightful perquisites. Peculiar faith is destructive, cannot be conservative, it is a doll, a vulgar and dangerous plaything. It is a humbug, as irresponsible power of all kinds is a humbug; so also is military prowess piracies of all kinds. What can the world-freemen care for peculiar faith, the world's deceiver, enemy and curse? The world has been fooled and injured by it long enough, to banish all such to non-entity, by rational education.

These peculiar faith people, Romanists and Mahommedans, bullied the world, Asia, Europe and Africa, for nearly 200 years, producing the worst of fanatical wars, bloodshed and massacres. What they did, their posterity can do, would do, but for mind that rebukes them. We need not go out of our own country. The puritans drove the quakers and baptists away. The Christians drove the Mormons out of Missouri, Illinois, to the western wilderness. Did the Egyptians drive the Jews out of Egypt, to the Arabian wilderness? That is the question? Now if the Mormons had had equal numbers, the world might have seen bloodshed for centuries. As it is, who can answer for the result? When did peculiar faith absolve itself from power, without compulsion?

Leave off all the pretences. Poor bigoted villages—yet cities are made up of villages—that is the world. Let the potency of rational mind rise in its might. Persons must be weak minded, to adopt any peculiar faith. It shows a vitiated depraved taste, to seek error, as all such faith unquestionably is. The world has to avoid most clearly, soul-smugglers. I consider all peculiar faith nonplused. The priestocracy have introduced a harlot before the world for religion, and the two first have destroyed millions of the people and deranged with mad superstition. Give us religion, and remove all these the farthest from us. Do not give us absurd copies, or copyists.

Who could trust their rights willingly with one who would deliberately affect that faith as an equivalent for credulity, was a governing principle. The present peculiar faiths are permitted by sufferance, not received. I would not commit myself to a cause that could not defend itself, and that required sophistry to deceive its adherents. The ancients could not distinguish between individuality and peculiarity, in their polytheism. The Jews were as bad as any, and the adopting moderns are still worse.

As to getting religion, the notions of all the pulpit sophists, the priestocracy, through their peculiar faiths, are positively absurd. How can one get what is not elementary, not there—a non-entity? Polytheists and atheists cannot defend one single point of their peculiar faith, for both stand peculiarly affected to the God of the universe. All that they do is to uphold all by sophistry, false pretences, the curse instead of mind's blessings. What perfect absurdity is there respecting these would-be world-guardians, when they are destroying their own best prospects by their own perversions? But what if the advocates of peculiar faith go wrong, how can the matter be remedied, without a right and competent standard? How came all to differ so exceedingly, if there were a right standard? Suppose one is not baptized right, ye rigid sticklers, what if false preachers, as some baptists, have been excluded the pulpit after baptism of others. Was that valid? This question should be submitted to the only competent, because only proper tribunal, rational mind's supreme functions. The whole family of peculiar faiths is a desperate set of fraud-mongers, manufacturers, and inventors. You emperors, brothers of the moon, in your lunacy of peculiar faith, pontiffs, you are held in abeyance to the religion of God, who estimates man not for brief authority, but for personal merits. None of you can govern yourselves right, much less your people. Resign, and act like men, not as world-impostors. Down, all ye priestocracy absolutists and all, in your vilest, basest ignorance. How many forms of peculiar faith-superstition, as Millerism, have deranged people?

Peculiar faith will not do for any government of mankind, as all the world absolutely needs Monotheism. The social circle is cut up by sectarians, overrun by secret societies. Peculiar faith is dangerous to the world.

The world is fanatic enough, but it was as much as a man's life was worth to oppose the ancient faith. Now he is looked upon as accursed—recently he was burnt at the inquisitorial stake, and in the times of Moses, as Korah and the nobles, their lives paid awful forfeits for defence of popular rights by proper discussion. Is this the truth on which the gospel has been admitted, when blood was the forfeit for its resistance. At first and last, blood and sophistry were its defences. The dynasty of the priestocracy is felonious and despotic in the extreme, that offers up human sacrifices in the ignorant ages of the world, and keeps it, when mind knows better, bound as a vassal to the accursed car of superstition, bigotry, and sophistry.

Do not disturb this faith, as it has a hold. That is the doctrine of monopoly and usurpation. What is worse, Jew-bibles, faiths, priestocracy, or the council-smuggling of bibles, or the priestocracy-smuggling of sophistry ever since? As to society of Americans, people think such, protection; truly none is, unless principles are uniformly adopted.

The spirit of peculiar faiths is demon, arising from perversion of mind peculiarly acted on. All such must be corrected by the spirit, soul, religion, that evolves high-toned sentiments, and the manly actions becoming the light of mind. What would the world be at any time, now or for the future, but for enlightened public opinion, that keeps down the power of peculiar faith and malign influence? Mind in its best rationality must be ever invoked by the liberal spirit of mankind, the world, to protect against bible-clans and absolutism-bullies, above all the covert, concealed, insidious, ensnaring priestocracy-treachery.

The vulgar idea of keeping the people out of the only means, philosophy and science, which are keys to detect all false faiths, is a doctrine of the jugglers of mind, the priestocracy. What good will false positions of faith and morals do the world? Abolish all such, as bad faith and injurious morals, to the whole world. Let them be blown sky-high. Of all the absurd talk that ever was uttered, this thing of faith, the food of the designing priestocracy, beats all. There is no sense, truth, or honesty, in it. It is the craziest, most rickety sophistry of all the world sophistry.

Mind needs the highest improvement of mind, acting on mind, instead of that false pretence of self-sufficiency claimed by the priestocracy, who affect the perfection of their old rickety bible; that is all the reason, despite of all these miscreants, in the progress of mind's expansion, why the modern peculiar faith excels the ancient, being a nearer approach to monotheism, as to all improvement most rational. Now there is no reason to delay the full improvement at once, in discarding all peculiar faiths, as a world cancer or incubus, an ignis fatuus. There can be no distrust of religion, but there is of all peculiar faiths. There is no hope but on facts, as faith. Any rational mind knows that no peculiar faith-bible can be sustained, and if any member chose to have joined the church without knowing anything about it, that is another question; that is his difficulty. Peculiar faith enabled the absolutists to carry out their base designs better. The Druids, who were priests, commanded the people in all things. They sacrificed human beings to any amount. Of course they were savages. All the excesses of temple expenses, are robberies of the proper world treasure. The world requires justice to the people, not a vain and idle idolatry. All peculiar faith is analogous and untrue. How many wars have not been excited in all countries, for peculiar faith, miscalled sacred?

The world has groaned under them, for centuries. Greece can tell the horrid tale, that her liberty was desecrated to that unholy spirit, and was swept away by Philip, king of Macedon. What cares peculiar faith for victimizing mankind, barbarizing him, so she gets her ungodly aims? Sacred wars. Accursed were they, indeed.

Will you sacrifice yourself, soul, highest interests, religion, God, to peculiar faith and myrmidons of any kind, no matter the name, that are entirely worthless? There is but one religion, and that is rational, and that you can only have by one universal Creator, too powerful for a messiah, too pure for a priestocracy. Nicholas and Chinese emperor, lama, pope, and papa, bishops, and all the tribe, you make yourselves lower than men, to be one of the priestocracy, and prate about faith that is the foulest blot on man's mind, the craziest of all thoughts. Do not desert religion for peculiar faith. It is not opinion nor any peculiarity that is to prevail, in regard to the bible

All are matters of facts, not opinions or manufactured faith. The change cannot be contemplated, when the certainty is fixed. Peculiar faith bibles have nothing to do with religion, no more than counterfeits have with the currency.

Let the world, mankind, decide on what is religion, and their deed, by a firm resolve, is done. Religion is a practicable universe problem, while peculiar faith is nothing, trading on false pretences, false capital, and in a constant false position.

The will indomitable, arising from free agency of mind, is that to meet the religious solution. You speak of enemies to the Christian or peculiar faith? How came you an advocate of any such faith, but by the devices of man, tory, traitor, deserter, base, execrable deserter, to monotheism, pure rational religion? You talk of its defects, who have no religion. Why, sir, monotheism has no defects that you, deserter, ought not be ashamed to help to remedy, when arising from imperfect state of mind, that much short of rationality. Is Japan partly cut out by priestocracy sectarianism from most of the world? While rational religion exalts the world in all its highest expansions of greatness and magnanimity, peculiar faith debauches and ruins. The world has no need of the last, while it has to pay bounden duty to the first.

The contingency of peculiar faith depends on peculiar education, both monsters of iniquity, that can be anything and everything as dark ages permit, and cannot possibly form any part of the uniform possession of religious elements in every mind. Peculiar faith debauches mind, but religion enlarges and liberalizes it to its sublimest expansion of rationality.

The first does not enable mind to reach the true resources of man's intended position in the universe. and must be dropped as utterly faithless and worthless. If any peculiar faith was true revelation the whole world could not be kept from it, as part of the functions of mind. On that view, then, rational religion should secure rational minds. So it does, in proportion to the rationality of mind. That is certain. This subject is exhaustless, and impregnable by peculiar faith in every iota, that has been effectually exhausted, and only proves the assaulters impious traitors to God and mind.

Dispensations is it that the peculiar faith advocates claim, and that always the last. The Christians took precedence of the Jews, who doubtlessly had theirs of their older neighbors. Next, the Mahometans take precedence of their predecessors, with the doctrine "to fight for the faith was an act of obedience to God." Since then, the Mormons are the orthodox, but all hold on to their faith or their interest.

How many hundreds of years has England been harassed between factions of contending faiths, neither party having aught but peculiar interests and motives in view? In what country have not the bitterest feuds prevailed respecting peculiar faith? All the large grand divisions of the world have sustained the deepest, bitterest feuds. France has had her portion; India, England, China, even free America. And how often have countries had to change their peculiar faiths! Of all the most atrocious butcheries of the world, that of Paris was the most barbarous, not less than of 70,000 people. Now, can any one inform the world that such was one iota for religion, but that it was just the reverse? Peculiar faith brutalizes and debauches mind, while rational religion commands, civilizes, enlarges, and ennobles its faculties. Not but pure rational religion and mind prevent the false claimants, the peculiar faith people from constantly agitating and deranging the world; thus the whole of mankind must see that they constitute not only the duty but the highest only protection in mind's especial providence.

What are the court faith and Romanists now doing in England, that has had such dissensions for centuries? Now most of peculiar faith people are perfectly psychologized in all the self-delusions of bible follies.

What a miserable framework of society, the people of free governments are slaves thereby to superstition, all in abeyance to perjury to swear to it.—Traitors, if not supporters; hypocrites, if not sincere; and perjurers, if upholders and endorsers.

The world cannot be too guarded against all the evils of peculiar education, that kills off billions of the human family. Peculiar faith bibles were to fool and cheat the world, mankind with.

Good, honest, truthful citizens, do you want such? Will you endorse your character worse than your worst enemies can do that? What can you be thinking of, to despoil your own soul of its God-creation birth-right, the elements of religion, for robbers and pirates, the priestocracy?

You church vassal, what are you, though in name a freeman? Would you refuse to-day the exposure of peculiar faith, tory-like, to have your selfish folly concealed? You help to fool yourself in helping cheat the world out of right government and religion. Think of that, emperors of vast empires. You present mockeries not worth trash. Peculiar faith approaches the most masterly of all supreme sublime subjects, and has been mistaken in all past ages, even the present, for religion. This subject has not been analyzed, and now only proves a more exalted state of rational mind, progressing to an indefinite series of happier solutions, the mighty creation-gifts of a perfect Almighty. What can polytheists, who are crazy about peculiar faith, know of religion?

Atheists are deranged about nature. All their tribes will be dissolved, when religion will be self-portrayed as indissoluble to all eternity. The bibles of all peculiar faith are necessarily the most arrant forgeries and false pretences. Now, will not the world have to sustain, as long as it permits such, all their combinations and collusions to maintain the whole swindling operations? There are some members of the peculiar faith persuasion, even members of the church, that are not corrupted by the association. Some people at first know not how to decide respecting their faith, and only had as all the world had it, by peculiar education; hence their motives cannot be impugned. Let not your vulgar peculiar faith pollute the soul of man in any respect, nor let its bibles taint his lips, nor its demoralization influence his actions.

What a monster is peculiar faith, reeking in bloody, murderous sacrifices of those sacrificing, in place of religion, that consecrates the pure soul to God—that, with the universe-problem, consecrates the soul's immortality. I impeach all peculiar faiths as the most murderous and blasphemous trifling with souls or minds.

All peculiar faith doctrines cause the world to be still in barbarism, to build barbarian walls around nations, families, and though Christ did not draw the sword, his followers have too awfully done so, and that not for two hundred, but nearer two thousand years, and will for two millions, if mind will permit. Now, the world-problem must be solved by mind in sincerity of soul and zeal of spirit. Take away Christianity and Mormonism, Mahommedanism and Judaism, Brahminism and Bhuddish peculiar faith from man, the world, mankind, and how can any quarrel? How many peculiar faith people act outrageously wrong at times? What better can be expected when churches present no principles by peculiar doctrines. Do not blame the churches, but the priestocracy, who, if they do not know better, ought for that reason to quit the pulpit as a case of hopeless ignorance, and if they do, they should quit for want of honesty; they should quit any how.

It is utterly absurd to expect aught of peculiar faith but the base elements that injure the world. It is impossible for peculiar faith, that is conceived in fraud, to do good. Give no excuse for felony. The world has no excuse nor apology for peculiar faith or its bibles, as rational religion is the only proper basis.

As to peace conventions, you may have them to eternity, but if you do not take away this earth-curse, peculiar faith, you cannot get a brotherhood. Take all such away, and the mighty question is solved, for the world will rush to it. The proper choice of life calling should be made, that no reproach be sustained.

Sectarians reproach each other with charges of spurious and corrupt faith. God help all such, when the whole faith is counterfeit. Stop this deliberate fraud, this sacrifice of principle, this means of hypocrisy or duping, for intelligent preachers cannot believe what is preached.

I protest against all flimsy reforms of peculiar faiths, as nothing short of entire utter expulsion will do. Rational education is the only very thing to accomplish it fully. Let the youthful mind be fully instructed in science, then it can choose for itself. What kind of morals has this kind of faith, when all the preachers are smuggled impostors on the world, without any license at all.

All the peculiar faiths in the world, cannot demonstrate the first part of God Almighty.

It is your fault and crime that your audience cannot subscribe to your doctrine. Give up all such ignoble policy, and let monotheism teach you and them. Your polytheism furnishes the paternity to atheism. You are doubly accountable for both sins. Your denial of the last does not absolve you, when you are guilty of the iniquities of the first. It is your caricature of God, that forces the revolting and disgusting picture on mankind. The people are to blame when they can rightly investigate for their imbecile credulity in all such characters.

The very primary possession of God's perfection, precludes all peculiar bibles, all covenants thereof. What is light? Is it not a universal attribute? Is discovery of all science at an end, consummated? Hence I ask correction for faith fallacies.

When was any fanaticism ever routed, but that it aspersed the means that did it? When truth is violated for fanatical origin, it will be murdered for its propagation. A code of monotheism declares that no ultraisms should be advanced.

Peculiar faith engenders fanaticism of itself odious. Do fanatics hate the taking the life of opponents? That is disproved by their bloody world butcheries. Do they ever forgive? They hate and war in proportion to their bigotry, &c.

How, Christian or Mormon, Jew or Mahommedan, can you exclude all other peculiar faiths, unless by rational principles that exclude your own? How can you exclude the atheist?

Give peculiar faith power, and whether Romanist or Protestant, it will vindictively, ferociously and piratically use it, desecrating religion of principles, whether in Massachusetts, Sweden, or the world, killing hundreds to millions of innocent children, women and men, their own fellow citizens for witches, expelling others for their faith, or destroying them, whether in Connecticut, voting the poor Indians out of their peaceable possessions of lands and themselves in, as the saints of their peculiar god, preventing mothers from kissing their babes on Sunday, and other outrageous deeds, or whether in South and Central America, destroying millions of Indians because they were heretics.

When the black catalogue of the peculiar bible pirates shall be unfolded, then we see the most abominable of all worldly abominations.

Faith revealed by barbarian Jews: will that do for us? Polytheist, how can you talk of conscience and morals, when you have neither truth nor honesty in your platform?

You call yourselves reformers and Protestants of Catholics, why not reform yourselves out of all the vicious dogmas? Why protest against a part? If Catholic, why do you cut up the social world into fragments? Why cannot you establish universal Catholicism? Because you cannot change universal principles to peculiar dogmas.

The ways of peculiar faith that does not answer to the mind or world's demand, are delinquent. If its bibles were true, truth conquers; but if untrue, as proved, the advocates should do justice to truth in rejecting them. The figurative language of all peculiar bibles, fills the vacuum of imposition. Too much of it is made to mean, as the guesser intimates.

Peculiar faith gives us the trash of men, not the pure intrinsic blessings of religion. It trades on the capital of monotheism, and then acts the assassin. All peculiar faiths are instrumentalities, as far as they comport with monotheism, with the exalted religion of principles. They may seek to appropriate it, but they will be scouted and defeated in the ignoble attempt. They may clothe their intentions in all kinds of false colors, bedeck them with all kinds of garments, still they will be disclosed, and will. in the tide of time, be exposed as usurpers, and monopolists. Religion has stamped in her acts the full character of universality, while peculiar faith has only a temporary and fading locality, and that in spots, that blur and disgrace the originator and followers. as the vassals of untruth. Peculiar faith has nothing to commend her hideous deformity.

If any good be ascribed to her deeds, it is because they are misunderstood. If any value be attached to the crusades, they can be met as too expensive, for the drama is bloodshed of millions of victims, and virtue and religion were mocked and defied.

However all peculiar faiths fill the pockets of the priestocracy, still they can never rise to the dignity of religion, nor possess its richest purest gifts to mind or soul.

Their divinities are all daubs by the vulgar hands of the priestocracy. They are neither human nor divine, for they are fanatically inhuman. Their highest appreciations of their impostor-masters, fall short of the noble principles of deity. Peculiar faiths are incompetent to draw the proper distinctions between the elements of virtue and vice, and pander to all the worst fanaticisms of reckless enthusiasm. They are ignorant of the noblest purposes of creation of mind and soul, and pander to the ignoble fables of peculiar bibles.

What peculiar claims has any peculiar faith? Has Romanism? Look at the pretensions of the Asiatics as the Faqueers. Peculiar faith has no principles. As regards Protestants finding fault with those of the Roman church for idols, have not both, and all such followers of peculiar faith, the rankest idols, as bibles, faith, and church? Who were the ancient people but serfs, and vassals, that dared not think for themselves, having but little means of investigation, few books, and little learning?

The religion of principles impeaches all peculiar faith, and its bibles, all emanating from paganism.

Peculiar faith is the vile offspring of superstition and toryism—treachery. Do you wish to be right? Religion addresses itself to the whole man, through mind the most rational. The absurdities of peculiar faith are endless. They only have doctrines, no principles.

The church, peculiar faith and bibles, have bullied the world, and driven much of it to the rankest infidelity to God the Creator.

Where is an enlightened philanthropy, when peculiar faith always makes fragments of society first, and of itself afterwards, while religion establishes a universal brotherhood, and confirms for eternity?

What are morals and faith built on false bibles worth? They never can reach the dignity of religion, a holy element of mind's purity and excellence.

Peculiar faith has to yield up its tory doctrines to the religion of principles. It is treacherous to the greatest good of the greatest number, that is all.

The teachings of all peculiar bibles and faith, clash with principles, that rule them out, as demoralizing and libelous on nature and nature's God.

Peculiar faith shivers society into fragments, while religion builds up a harmonious brotherhood of this world, prepared to greet those of all other planets of the universe.

The peculiar faithites should surrender their commissions that are false, and their churches should be made schools for religious discussion and rational education.

Peculiar faith advances only peculiar doctrines, while religion, the sublime consummation of all duty, is the evolution of universal principles.

While the first never can attain the last, the last never descends, condescends to the first.

The world must start right or not at all.

Whom does peculiar faith suit best, hysterical old women and imbecile men, afraid to investigate the indelible truths of Monotheism?

All peculiar bibles have their peculiar faith, peculiar causes, antagonistic to religion.

What can you get by exchange of all the first for the last? The highest purposes of creation.

The Mormons, &c., are religious not because they are Mormons, but because they have the elements of rational religion. None but Monotheism will answer as God intended, since all others, as peculiar faiths, the peculiar policies of vain and ambitious man, have been fully tried, and are self-convicted as peculiar curses. There were thousands of bibles more than nations, for the Romans had many, so did the Greeks, the Egyptians. What do we need of them, their documents, when their people, as the Jews, were below the scale of civilization? All were idolatrous, and their bibles represent that idolatry. They of course do not teach religion, that has been advancing all the time by God's universal means of mind. It is all wicked nonsense to adopt such. Is not peculiar faith the result of peculiar education, then a man is Christian, Pagan, Jew, or Mormon, as peculiarly taught? What, then, is to correct him, but rational religion, that gets the only proper standard from the unity of God? Coldness of faith, amounts to coldness, poverty, want of truth and facts.

How convenient are mystery, faith, &c., yet how disgusting and contemptible is the sophistry that employs them. Is the cunning bigot, bigot because he revokes the rationality of his mind, aware how much he cheats his own immortal soul, when he is conceitedly seeking to evade and equivocate on the valid and unanswerable objections of monotheism? When the sophist is cornered, then he does not understand the scriptures. Does he go for rational understanding; does he speak rationally and understandingly, or does he equivocate to commit himself to the falsehoods of the priestocracy? The man who equivocates about religion is ineffably stupid.

Will you force the conscience of children in not only doubtful but false positions? What crime.

No country, no matter how much thought to be a republic, can be entirely civilized or free where liberal discussion cannot be duly had to investigate and exercise the first principles of religion, &c.

All peculiar faiths are necessarily behind the science of the times.

As all peculiar faiths are utterly false, their advocacy is dishonest and dishonorable. What effrontery in their priestocracy. that chide and berate their gods.

Prayers to God are dictation of mind.

Peculiar faith brutalizes mind and libels the God of the universe. The degraded murderer, Moses, upbraids and rebukes his own god! His idol.

Take away all the whimsical vicious shackles of the social framework of faith that is peculiar, and let faith, the rational monotheism, the reality, supplant as she will polytheism and atheism, the shadows. Pursue all that is legitimate.

Can anything but peculiar faiths beget fanaticism? Can a hysterical woman reason comprehensively? She causes the doubt by her perverseness, when mind compromises itself and dearest, noblest interests of soul for bibles of peculiar trash.

The funniest part of peculiar faith is, that each adherent quarrels with the others about the untruths, and they are all hostile, and act like people that lived in glass houses. The truth could not make them do this. Their faith cannot cause them to see principles, for which they have mistaken untruths.

Man's passions are natural, and are liable to perversions and perverted enjoyments. Now, what is to restrain them as lust, murder, and above all, revenge, that is so sweet? Atheism follows blind nature, the apparent plane, and a mere custom of faith rules polytheism. What is to correct all this? Comprehend all the dark and defective points of both. and see where they tend. All these are, with their codes or bibles, most peculiar, most contemptible, below criticism, were it not for the social evils executed by them. Their subsequents falsify their position, and commit suicide of all, murder all. Nothing but rational religion, ever referable to its standard, is immutable and conservative on principles. All peculiar faiths are nuisances to society, the intellectual religion of monotheism. How can the world get rid of any peculiar that is allied to the state or clique influence.

See what a host, a countless family of nuisances from peculiar faith, as Judaism, &c.

It is a vast crime, not less than sacrilege, to misunderstand peculiar faith for religion. God has given full evidence of himself in the universe, the fault is in mind's peculiar perverseness, &c. So far from man falling, it was the fall of the priestocracy, who fabricated the fable of man's fall.

What interest have the sovereign people of the world in peculiar faith, that makes hypocrites and knaves? She is a horrid deformity and base speculation in all the pretensions of the priestocracy. All peculiar bibles have no platform, while that of religion stands on the platform of the universe. Where was the world thousands of years before the institution of all such malign influences? Where was Christian conservation the eighth century, under the supremacy of Saracen Mahommedan learning? How dare any tory peculiar faithite assume one iota of merit, when his faith's demerits are those of the impostor?

Peculiar faith is separable from mind's organization, and alien to it, while religion of principles, a totally different gift, is the only sure guide, as the reflector of the universe creator, to mind to form and insure the perfect soul. Peculiar faith fills the world with sycophants and hypocrites, vassals to untruth and dishonesty—governed as time-servers for timely policies. Is this religion that acts independently of all such trash, ennobled as she is by divine institutions—love to God—justice to man, to whom she presents the hope of best future bliss? Can bigots change? No persons wise and prudent should compromit their dignity in expecting reason from fanatical bigots, who subvert reason by miserable peculiar trash, and are, tory-like, pledged to uphold it at the world's expense. If peculiar faithites were to act in good faith to religion, they would resign all the false pretences of such faiths, and act under the auspices of religion. She should make a gentleman complete, in all the refined courtesies and intellectual duties in life.

Why are so many liars in the world—so false and dishonest? Because the frame-work of society identified with peculiar faith, is thus predicated.

These are the forfeits that vice pays to virtue, faith to religion, after all the disguises of brief authority and despotism now exposed. The advocates of all peculiar faiths are not at all entitled to the term of infidels for their opponents who conscientiously disbelieve their bibles, as they themselves are in the light of impostors till they demonstrate their own position.

Religion is the supremacy of principle to the majesty of which, peculiar faith should bow as long as reason is in the ascendant. Infidel to what? Falsehood, or Truth?

Of course if your peculiar bible is destitute of truth and proof, there is no infidelity, but the bible is an imposture, and the makers, aiders and abettors are impostors. All the illegitimate tribes of peculiar faiths are absolutely dangerous to the peace and dignity of the world. The miserable frame-work of society predicated on false pretences of bibles, cause deception and hypocrisy, and that enables the intelligent to see that there are no real foundations to all such, and the profligate of these seeing that, act as if exempt from all social, moral and religious restraints.

Can there be a worse code than that of the ecclesiastics who are unworthy of such office before the people if they knew no better, and most certainly unworthy of all such if they do, being ignoramuses in the first, and deceivers in the second. The sooner all such are got rid of the better, as the cause of religion is injured by them all the time.

All peculiar faiths are inanities, non-entities, direct impositions, of course all their agents act impostors. Analyze them as you will, still they have no intrinsic religion or inherent merit—not a particle.

Why cannot the world learn to tell the truth in religion, and not turn traitor to itself in its own best interests—is it possible that it submits to be swindled so easily, by all such false pretences? Put all that go to build up false faiths, to rear the most splendid fabric to philanthropy and humanity.

Only think of the family bible of peculiar faith! It had best be called the family folly of peculiar credulity, a nothingariness for religion surely. Its inspirations are all false. Peculiar faith confessional, hurries the priestocracy to the worst of impiety. Is the world determined to be imposed on? Then let it keep up the peculiar faith no matter the name, and its impostors.

The best of all things, the purity of your conscience, is surrendered to those that violate its holiest functions. Never violate conscience for all the priestocracies in the world. The peculiar faithites are disposed to abuse their best friends for peculiar exploded bibles, a libel on God, mind and religion.

Calvin is adored by his followers, murderer as he was. Reformed peculiar faith! The only way to reform all such is to exclude it altogether from mind.

Why do all peculiar faith advocates bring forth trivial matters, when they fly the only essential, an indubitable proof of the authenticity of their scriptures? Why will they not, as gentlemen, quit their sophist theme, never to be proved to the satisfaction of any gentleman? Whence did all peculiar faiths get their bibles? Out of the lying priestocracy. The difference between any peculiar faiths, Roman or protestant, Christianity or Judaism, is nothing, when all are positively pagan, utterly false before religion. That they call religion has no truth; monotheism presents the only infallible authority to rational mind, acting on the unity of the Creator.

The best argument of fallacy, or that destroys the whole position, is furnished by one peculiar faith against all the rest. Come, priestocracies, all to the proofs of your peculiar bibles, that if given decide the question, but if not proved, as they cannot be, estop you and your commission, so much so that you are disgraced to appear at all more in the pulpit.

As peculiar faith people have resorted to thousands of tricks in the invention and fabrication of their bibles, or oracle-codes, as the ancient priestocracy universally did, they have had to adopt all the ingenuity imaginable to carry them thoroughly out or through. The doctrine of mental reserve is that permitted, adopted, advised by churches. What can be a greater perjury, except the perjury of making their bibles, for the other is only the consistent performance of it.

Mind, that has been espoused into the adoption of the scriptures of peculiar faith, has been libeled, bribed, seduced or bewildered. The world-scars show the marks of peculiar faith persecutions all over it. All peculiar faiths commit sacrilege on monotheism. A convention of all the sectarians would destroy all polytheism, and establish atheism on its ruins, unless they could hear the voice of reason, as monotheism arrests all this fanaticism. Peculiar faith is murderous and corrupt. All sectarians, and they are all so universally, that feign, adopt or advocate peculiar faith, go for trash, trifles.

However churchmen affect to be infallible or orthodox, their position is entirely that of peculiar faith that has no infallibility, purity or religion. I concede to all church sincere people, seeking their supposed soul's salvation, all proper deference to good motives and sincerity of good faith, but candidly declare to them that they have adopted a false bad faith to preserve it, which the sooner laid aside the better. They are in the foulest crowd, that has taken the worst advantage of them.

Morals, religion and world's good are all unsafe in the keeping of all such bibles and people.

How could it be otherwise, when there is no proper capital for principles that are vitally conservative for, or bind the universe together? The only thing that commends monotheism is, that she is the true exponent of religion, the only conservative of a world's morals.

Let then all church people, that are sincere in good faith, come forward to this only right platform, and secure all the greatest good to the greatest number, that is all.

Peculiar faithites are incomparably worse than infidels and atheists. Are not their peculiar bibles the base of many evils? They have no honorable, rational proof at all established of such pretences, and all this can be most easily demonstrated to rational mind, on the clearest principles, rules and nature of evidence.

There can be no rational honorable difficulty, on this point. And yet these people persist in imposing their counterfeits on a credulous people. They must know them counterfeit.

Would you cheat or swindle mind for a false faith, to benefit false teachers, world sophists, the priestocracy? God forbid—rational mind forbid. Act for mind, mankind, the Creator.

The world should not go it blind, as to peculiar faith. When the advocates of peculiar faith speak of principles, they should know that such faith and principles are perfectly incompatible.

The question is not to find out anything of recent revelations, as the one contemporary with creation was the only one, and that was by and through the universe. As to revelations, that is most absurd, for they can be pretended and renewed all the time. There is no end to all such cursed foolishness.

God's plans are being perfected on conservative principles, and time on their execution reveals the facts.

How are you to comprehend all rational minds, within the pale of safety? Are you to wait for their peculiar conversion to peculiar faiths, that is doctrines or pretences, with some impostor their head, and some church their demagogue, or adopt the religion of principles, which alone guide and govern the universe forever? All peculiar faiths are but editions of each other, all from oracle-mongers, the pretended soothsayers and augurs; the Jew or Christian no better than the Egyptian or Persian. They are all pagan to religion—all idol-worship, scenting of priests and priestesses—vile impostors.

It is not only the good faith that rules, but action on that faith. There can be but two kinds of faith, good and bad; the first universal, the last, peculiar faith, that is made by peculiar education. Universal faith is by God, for mind. Peculiar faith usurps that of God, gives a false construction to things, propagates false doctrines and tenets, and produces bad actions, evils of opinions and feuds; of course, never can be right. A man, with such faith, to talk of getting religion! Such a fellow has not foot-hold, much less a platform, for religion. Religion is of the soul, while peculiar faith may be of the heart! as the advocates pretend.

All peculiar faith people make imperfect gods equal to no gods, for they are the priestocracy's gods, and none else; hence they play into the hands of the atheists, and affect passion for their own imbecility. But sophists never know what is right, and bigots cannot change, if bigots. What a hopeful pair! The bigot refers you to the book, the bible. Why so? Because of prophecies and miracles. But there are neither miracles nor prophecies, for they are all lies. All the old soothsayers and augurs of all nations pretended to all these; but they, of course, were frauds, to tickle the credulity of simpletons, willing to be fooled.

Is there anything lovely or novel in pecular faith, that had its drama in every ancient nation, the world's age? Is it because it divided the Jews into sects, old Jews and Christians, and has set much of the world together by the ears for eighteen centuries, as pretended in era, and likely to keep all in commotion for its period of existence, until it wears itself out?

Long after the existence of man, priestocracy and tyrants rose, and devised this corrupt and despotic thing, this blasphemy on religion, this begetter of sectarianisms, peculiar faith, and sacrificed mind to its heathenish and bloody dogmas, its horrid statutes. How are we to get out of the maze, labyrinth of errors and false doctrines? By the brightest standard of reason, the supreme standard of Deity, and the proper exercise of mind.

The world is pointed out the advocate of bibles of peculiar faith in monarchies, as if that proved anything, but that such were tories to mind, if they knew their subject, and so much the worse are their imitators in republics, that were traitors as tories to mind, when they were instituted to free mind. Such are vassals indeed. All the ancient nations had their peculiar faith, and of course their bibles or codes of that faith, oral, or written, all analogous, all at war with nature's God.

The moderns, more silly, through their more stupid priestocracy, have adopted them, instead of analyzing for themselves, and eliciting God-written monotheism, the holiest conservative of mind.

With all polytheists who can do nothing without the priestocracy, the last formed a part and parcel, inseparable from polytheism, for their dictates are part of the decrees. It was so in Judaism, it is emphatically in papacy, the more imperial the more despotic. Now all peculiar faiths, all lies and pretences, have been policies or kind of tory government of mankind.

There is only one constituent in faith, that makes it good, namely, that of truth, for if it be false, it is bad faith, and unworthy of mind.

Now the advocates of all peculiar faith are bound to demonstrate this essence of its vital existence, or be denounced as impostors. No wonder they assail the disbelievers as infidels, when they seek to hide their impostor character by this vile cheat and charlatanry. Lies are dangerous for faith-makers and smugglers, in all the departments of mind, that can expose them as felons.

Let all peculiar Bibles, Jew, Christian, Mahommedan, Mormon, Brahmin, Bhuddist, or Atheist, as exploded, lie in the tomb of all nonsense, error and imposition. Do not let the foolhardiness of any modern disentomb them. The world must trust to principles, not fallible human nature. This is the proper and only protection entrusted and vouchsafed by the Creator, who finished his work effectually and perfectly, at that period.

The standard of gentility never can be too high; but may be too low. While despotisms, monarchies, and priestocracies, fall short by oppression of mind, republics, through monetheism, can bestow it.

The days of priestocracy, peculiar faith, and mind-despotism, monarchy, are numbered.

To have the false position of peculiar faith of any name carried through, the whole world must be swindled, seduced! So far from adopting, it had better never know of any such.

Uniform principles for ever estop peculiar faith-bible people from speaking of infidels.

As all peculiar faith-dogmas and bibles, are ignoble failures, endangering the peace and happiness of the whole world, it becomes the paramount duty to organize on the highest God-given document, that of monotheism self-demonstrative.

This is due the constitutional organization of mind, that must have all the benefits of sublime rationality to reach its culmination.

If the world is endangered in becoming idol-worshipper, as it is most positively under the ignoble guidance of the delusive doctrine of polytheism, it becomes such advocates as seek the truth to renounce it, and all its errors, and adopt monotheism, and all its truth. She has no metaphysics, no subtleties, no labyrinths, as atheism, and polytheism. Bible and faith-peculiarities, are alien to mind—non-existent as facts. Are you an American republican? On what principle can you advocate peculiar faith? If you can possibly invent any argument that is applicable to all tory doctrines of universal despotism, and resolvable into sophism. The last faith-discoverer is the true latter-day saints, and that may be the very last speaker, alias impostor. If the metal is a base alloy, of course all the currency must partake of that character.

Why do you, so careful in business, permit illicit traffic in peculiar faith, that was originally smuggled, and never has paid the tariff to truth, when the perpetrators are swindling priestocracy? Peculiar faith, its bibles and priestocracy go into the sordid speculations of earth, while monotheism soars to the loftiest arch of religion. Well, says the enthusiast, I will die in the faith. Good, if he will let it be pure and good, not idiotic, bad faith, not a faithless doctrine to blind and stupify dupes.

What are the statistics of peculiar faith? Her various wars of bloody deeds and costly expenditures will disclose the mere commencement of the world-tragedy. They are too great for the passive toleration of the world. The present light of the world's mind demands the discarding of all peculiar faith bibles. Social civilization demands religion. What but she can oppose the mighty avalanche of delusions of Mormonism and all peculiar faiths? Christianity and Mahommedanism, two vile sectarianisms, emanating from as vile a source, caused the world peculiar faith accursed wars for two centuries. All the good done the world has been through mind's and monotheism's capital. Idolatry, is it, that any of these sectarians complain of? They never dream that they too, the best of them, are in mud and mire.

And sectarians refuse, too, to be educated in each other's schools, though entire ignorance be the result. What a base of fragments!

Peculiar faith is a debauching political enginery and machinery for the corrupt bargain and sale of souls. This real treachery to monotheism is worse than the pictured one of Judas.

As conscience is to be the guidance of mind, and to fulfil this faithful function must be fully enlightened, how can peculiar faith be trusted, that can impart no such light?

All analysts can well appreciate that it arose in the dark ages of most stupid ignorance and bigotry, when there were few or no books, and those the works of sophists; when there were few readers and still fewer writers. Most books were perverted from truth to suit the miserable reign of terror, or misrule of despotism, the vagaries of blind faith. Now, when most can argue, reason on facts of science, on the mind-platform of liberty, peculiar faith, that affects to be all light herself, imposes her bibles as the perpetual barrier to religion's rational progress.

Down with all the peculiar faiths and their books; they are all felons, tories.

The commissions in peculiar faiths are most detestable, and beyond all mental endurance short of conservative correction. There are many people, and they are myriads, revoking all faith, allegiance to peculiar institutions, that need the firm conviction of rational conservation. It is these that are inhibited from proper deeds by the odious, brutal expulsion of religious principles by such faiths.

There are many people revoking all faith, allegiance to religion as it is called improperly, yet evincing most clearly by their actions that they are actuated by God-given elements. All this must be looked at and analyzed. Separate priestocracies from religion in profession, as they are utterly incompatible. Define peculiar faith as monotheism positively defines it, no religion at all. Monotheism is divinely authorized, as that is a God-written document, self-evident in the universe.

There can be but two classes of believers, those, deceivers or deceived. Which is which, reason declares. What is the world to you if you have no confidence in its faith, and what can impart confidence, short of conservative principles? The world people are made to ostracize each other through peculiar faith, when the whole universe cannot be disunited in religion, the universal civilizer, refiner.

The advocates of peculiar faith wish to put down all others but their own. Now let them first put down their own peculiar faith follies, and then they can act rightfully for all, in putting down all. 'Tis idle to cry Mormonism or Judaism, when the professor adopts christianity. Let all the world peculiar faith yield to monotheism, the God-written, not man-written document.

All the councils ecclesiastical, are smuggling circles. Peculiar faith smuggles her dynasty of the priestocracy. There is no sense in peculiar faith preaching, as there is no virtue in the faith. Let us have none of such, to have no world-butcheries or massacres prematurely. Let us have no such horrible feud.

Peculiar faith will fall more and more into disrepute, as science advances in the world. Let all proper purposes be carried out, while all improper ones should be carried off.

All peculiar faiths have been basely smuggled, palmed upon the world by despots and their minions. Is there one plan or base of such operations, but have been fashioned by despotism or fanaticism?

All peculiar faiths are a failure to promote social, moral and religious law and order, but give general hypocrisy or dupery to the world. Why is all this? Because they all are faithless, have no good faith or intention to act up to religion, the quintessence of good faith.

The people, mind, already possesses the right elements, that peculiar faith cannot evoke, but monotheism can. Now the world should be prepared in cultivating what it possesses, qualified to do full and ample justice to all the universal demands made on it, and anticipate in fact all such. The victory is assured to monotheism over all the vices, and can never be to peculiar faith that is unworthy the confidence or countenance of a single mind the world over. For God's and mind's sake, spare the world the silly and felonious invasion of peculiar faith, that fills mankind with countless absurd impositions and mock pretences.

No wonder the smugglers of peculiar faith should seek to excommunicate all other faiths not congenial to their own, but when they do all this in the establishment of their own, to the exclusion of monotheism, they have committed the most heinous blasphemy, and have ruined the world and mind, as far as in them lies, of the holy essence of religion, for they meddle with a God-written document. The advocates of peculiar faith have sacrificed religion to their faith.

The best rites of peculiar faith, are a mockery of religion, as masses for the repose of souls, and money to rescue them from purgatory. What a mercenary prostitution of the agent souls who thus commit sacrilege and blasphemy.

The mysteries of the ancients consecrated peculiar faiths, and subtle metaphysics inveigled, befogged the community into their enthusiastic support. As all the virtues of peculiar faith are from monotheism God-written, the advocates must not sacrifice ungratefully, religion to their peculiar faith. The very existence of peculiar faith is a nuisance to the world, as it is the ostracism of rational religion. But which of all faiths peculiar, has the firm undoubted position? None—they are all weak on an untenable basis. Christians are no more than all other peculiar faiths people. They all doubt, because they have no basis of their own; it is all in that of rational religion, what they have of it. But how is it possible that so many can be mistaken, and especially those devoted to sincerity and truth, cannot speak the truth on this subject? Because they are certainly mistaken, and seek to be consistent, declare for what they do not know. They use faith-sophistry, a sin indeed, and to prevent the proper recognition, the priestocracy-faith-perjurers, conspire against all means to disabuse the world on this subject. What is certain, all peculiar faiths corrupt the minds of the people, as all other depotisms.

Peculiar faith reflects the vices of perverted mind, and positively libels Deity, the Creator.

She is delible, whereas religion is indelible. See the myriads of peculiar faiths of the ancients, that have passed into oblivion with all their originators. Nothing of all this miserable family will be left, when rational religion triumphs forever.

Most dangerous is peculiar faith every way, when the conscience cannot beware too much of the first encroachments, the first aberrations from rectitude, as the end may be the deepest curse, and such faiths are making their encroachments perpetually.

They do not fear to sin. Then mind must eschew peculiar faith as the greatest sin, and the propagators are the greatest sinners.

It is important to begin in time with rational education for correct actions, to conform the cranium to mind's organs and functions, to what is right, to fix right habits. Such [illegible]th pretends to give us a bible for religion: all such pretences are utterly false, for the [illegible]les are of peculiar Jew or Christian faith and pretences.

[illegible]et not mind pretend that I am hostile to it, when I oppose peculiar faiths that [illegible]ve it—no such thing—as the bibles bent astronomy to peculiar faith for many cen- [illegible] they eclipsed the universe by their four cornered earth. When wares are offered for sale, their qualities are to be wisely inspected and recognised by the interested purchaser; now peculiar faith is essentially of this character, and is for sale to the highest bidder. It is a world church-priestocracy, state-despotism affair at auction. Its bibles are so much waste paper.

The best functions of the soul are lost on peculiar faith. What schisms, false doctrines, heresies, and conspiracies, mislead from religion?

Your preachers are eternally complaining of the insuperable difficulty of making the people believe the bible tales—yes, it was making by despotism and sophistry. Get religion, say the faithocracy. That is all trifling nonsense, self-delusion.

All kinds of despotism are perishing before the lights of rational mind, and this, its vassal, goes with it. You need not fear any opprobrium, by a wise change. That change is only horrid that proves want of principles. The faith you affect is sacred, any how you may pretend. It is not at all, but the reverse. You desecrate faith, by adopting false pretences that convict it of blasphemy and felony. What claim has polytheism on the world?

The base desecration to mind, now, is peculiar faith, the detestable incarnation representative of religion. Peculiar faith is constantly presenting strife of its own offspring, spreading disruptions of society, of itself, its fragments are always in view, fragments first, its own explosion last.

Freemen, can you touch this odious tory?

Religious education with peculiar faithites implies, sectarian. Religious agitation is ever in all sectarian church and state countries.

Peculiar faith, when passive, means sectarian bigotry; when in influence, peculiar despotism.

Who can be held responsible for peculiar faith? You, and to your own mind, the most illustrious embodiment. Can you separate your physical from moral and religious existence? Then mind is bound to first examine the principles of unity.

There are some excellent people in peculiar faith churches, and the only way that they can be accounted for is, that they have been the least corrupted by their doctrines. Monotheism, that predominated with its saving influence, has saved them, assuredly. What a fine, excellent thing it is, that they kept their honest, healthful senses, and had God, their creator, to protect them and the universe, instead of man's botches and creation.

Indeed, well may they, all patriots be pleased with their noble country and its illustrious institutions, that they can reach monotheism in its best purity, whereas in peculiar faith they had forgot, overlooked religion.

While rational mind leaves nothing to contingency, bigotry, the stubborn hybrid of superstition and peculiar faith adopts both, and maintains them with fanaticism, when infuriated.

Religionist, do you know what you are talking of, when you affect the company of peculiar faith? That she is a bloody tigress, a reckless prostitute of souls, and that all priestocracies are her tools and menials, herself that of despotism?

When mind is told to seek religion under the auspices of any peculiar faith, the advocates of which tell it that its efforts, then and there, have been crowned with success, by their influence, at that very moment falsehood and imposition are asserted by them, for false pretences, as all that mind possesses is by its own inherent faculties, God-given, and must be mind-improved, and so allowed. The imposition and world-demagogism is still carried farther, when the neophyte is enlisted ostensibly under their peculiar church-banner, instead of ascribing, with most grateful emotion, the mind-existence of their invaluable gift, then and there desecrated and polluted by a series of frauds.

Are not these tender mercies of fanaticism as bad as the domains of lust, unholy ambition, unbounded avarice, beastly drunkenness? The worst and most execrable deception is in taking advantage of emotions, passions, deep recesses of the soul's innate, intrinsic feelings, by unholy, ungodly counterfeits. Of all this the world has to be aware, in all the reckless disguises of sophistry and all its degrading alliances. All bigotry, in its best appreciation, is erroneous education, as it is a species of monomania in faith. All peculiar faith is that assuredly, nothing less, in the wisest analysis. In all this, the world is more sinned against than sinful.

Deny peculiar faith to be monomania? What is fanaticism, her child, but of that character? Like begets like, affinities beget affinities, and only such. Monotheism begets or is rational religion, that begets immortality of the soul, the loveliest family of mind.

Go to the widest oceans, the loftiest mountains, the sublimest cataracts, to secure the liberal expanse and impulse of humanity, the soul's emotions, and to religion, for the munificence of the Creator.

No peculiar faith dispenses herself in this wise, when she dwarfs her mind in the attempt against the God of the universe.

What she calls mysteries are metaphysics. What can she promise the plaintive and soul grievings, the remorse, the deep feeling and anguish that lacerate, the penalty-appreciation, the mental dissatisfaction, when she violates Almighty Providence by messiahship, a perfect incompatibility. If it had been decreed from the first, as is pretended, then the complete mission deferred predicating omission of time and space, precludes its perfect character, and demonstrates it the worst of all impositions. The great holy centre cannot know peculiar faith, that religious people will be ashamed to mention there. What is miscalled sacred history is mostly mind-factured, as all the oracle-peculiar faiths. Mind has nothing to do with cross or crescent, but soul and its religion.

Peculiar faith goes where it is not wanting, and can do no good anywhere, but harm. God's universe rebukes all such. She daubs everything with her peculiar sophistry: appeals to purses, and tythes, and peculiar missionaries. Peculiar faith is ever in the rear, with hypocrisy most brazen before and ignorance behind. Let her gather her cliques and clans, sections and factions of sections, she gathers only fragments of fanaticism. Her garments are died in blood. She carries dissension, distrust, impotency, imbecility, and mortality. Peculiar faith of all sects and denominations can be rightfully branded as the ungrateful guest of monotheism, the tool of despots, tory to constitutional liberty and light of mind. Where is her glorious example of patriotism for this union?

In her disunion and fragments of churches?

Why cut up the world into fragments of petty societies, cliques, cabals? The world cannot unite too strongly on religion, its highest duty, a universal brotherhood, its greatest interest.

Hard and imperfect is the tuition of peculiar faith, that has to travel too much over the same path.

All precept should enjoin proper investigation of all subjects submitted to mind. Those submitted for despotism are different. Is that not the bible of peculiar sophistry?

All the fair criticisms most legitimate against peculiar faith are to profit the mind in rationality. Peculiar faith cannot establish her doctrines endorsed by all world-despots, as she cannot appropriate principles, the universe-fund that God created.

The only way for peculiar faith of the greatest genius to be eternally founded is for that genius to invent, nay, to create principles. As all on this earth are creatures, proved by birth, life, and death, a vital existence identified with atmosphere, the whole fabric of such faith is the veriest fraud on earth, too plain for a school-boy to mistake. Now, rational mind can see most plainly the reason and demonstration of the religion of principles, created by the Almighty Architect of this universe. That settles the whole question at once and forever.

Now, mind ought to be mature enough to appreciate that it is instituted under providence at creation, as adequate for all questions occurring in the universe, and that no peculiar faith can furnish any materials for such solution.

Those who pay homage to their peculiar god cannot expect rational minds to apostatize from the God of the universe, whose supremacy is his unity.

A pagan always claims exemption of his faith from reason, because honest, truthful reason condemns all pagan faith as untruthful in position.

We expect nothing from peculiar faith, that only presents the poorest, the fragments of faith, as she is imbecile, impostor, usurper of good faith to the world, mind, universe, and their God.

She is not trustworthy; mind cannot know, the Creator cannot own, the universe cannot trust her. She is an outlaw, heinous and demented.

Her bibles are all pagan, with bloody statutes; her gods, numberless, are all fictions and caricatures. She knows no true way, sinning and causing all her followers to sin, causing retributive punishment for her folly and crimes. She is a political hack, for her kingdom is that of despotism, unprincipled in all things; she is of the earth earthly, born of mind debased, spurious and illegitimate. She has no functions for she has no titles thereto in any respect foisted by false pretenders; her every breath is mortal, her every acts of that character. Of superstition, she is brazen as bigotry, seeking for ambitious power, which she of course always abuses.

Her perversion of mind is too dangerous for any one to be intrusted with her available intrigues, as she urges to perjury as traitors who called for perjury, false positions and influence against their own government, to which they acknowledged no intrinsic indebtedness. Peculiar faith is a part and parcel of government machinery, and is always dressed in the garb to suit the complexion of the times, being an arch-enemy of mind, ever despotic, ambitious, thirsting for power. She is a dangerous thing to meddle with. The world should never know her, and only knows in its self-delusion, superstition, ignorance, ruin or ignominy.

Republicans above all should have nothing to do with her, as in despotisms she forces herself on mankind and forces them to support her in the most sumptuous cathedrals, palaces and the extreme of tithes.

And her books, man-mind, self-deluded, call those of religion! What desecration of thought, what a prostitution of mind! Religion only asks of mind justice, that is to do itself justice, that it may do justice to her and through her beneficence to God. This is all her own, but peculiar faith seeks all that is not hers, and grasps all with her iron will that only asks for power to be enforced at all times. She is the after sight of perverted mind's creation, vaunts herself in the demagogism of affected republicanism, the greatest friend of the dear people, caring for their souls.

You affect not to be amenable to any of the obligations of public opinion. But you are to all social obligations. It has been decided that man rational, is not mere animal the brute, unless peculiarities make you so, therefore you are not to act whilst in rational society as it does, for your sphere is urged by its appropriate principles to remain there. So you are bound to all obligations that comprehension of principles embraces, not stopping short of the universe. Do not pretend to escape the past follies of mankind, as expedient. You thus adopt folly, with crime. The universe can no more rest on the isolated principles of one solar system, than your position can be sustained by exparte social doctrines. You must take all, or none. You expect most rational protection from all principles, thus you are bound to exhibit the best of good faith contribution, as your part necessary for the whole consummation of universal safety.

After all, what is peculiar faith? Analysis will demonstrate that peculiar church and state-faith-despotisms, are inseparate and indivisible. Both are peculiar nuisances to the world, and must, will be abolished by mind when liberalized by rationality and religion, vindicating, asserting its own immortal dignity. Peculiar faith people follow the teachers, not the principles, but the policy, doctrines and measures: their mind is psychologized by peculiar faith bibles and worships its idols.

If the advocates of this doctrine had ever considered the measurable difference of mind over its pretensions, they could not hesitate a moment.

See what mind has accomplished for constitutional government in this union; what it is accomplishing in all of life-problems.

The mind has interminable difficulties with peculiar faith in predestination; its doctrines are tortuous, and cannot be straightened. They must die, and let those already advanced under mind's glorious free agency be properly estimated. I grant that the adherents know their faith but not their religion, they cannot assert any thing more. But all their coin is counterfeit, for all their metal is dross, not pure. The intention is every thing; if the motive be wrong all is wrong in mind. Monotheism alone carries out the legitimate blessing of free agency of mind, while an inconsistent predestination is peculiar faith's.

What finer exhibition of mind can be given than its adequate appreciation and responsibility by conscience, firmness, general and particular. Whilst, personally, I feel a gentlemanly courtesy towards all people, I must desire to see the serpents of peculiar faiths to be securely handled at once, or not attempted.

The proper function of mind is rationality, not faith, unless admitted thereby. If it gain admittance at all, it is on these premises; and if not true rationally, it must be spurious. Custom is one thing, and principle another, in regard to all sham-faiths.

We have to make principle sacred, for the more faith is talked of nominally, the less religion: all such is counterfeit. It is man-worship, mind, and soul-sacrifice, these faith-mongers are dealing in all the time.

But you profess to be in horror of atheism? Then you should unite yourself to the only tenable position of science. Instead of bibles, you might tell the atheist to scan first the universe, solve that problem ere he could understand godology. He should fathom the depth of creation, ere he could penetrate the character of the Creator.

That science is too deep for him, when he had not fathomed the elements of mental rudiments, that of mind. He who denies conservation in all respects, physically, morally and religiously, denies to God his creation.

What good mind, with a world's patriotism, wishes to see that vindictive spirit unbridled and let loose all over the world? Does that harmonize with religion?

The world is indebted to old Asia for despotism, monarchical, ecclesiastical, military, vast ruins of edifices, and above all is mind's prostration to the vandalism of all these. Such scenes of iniquity, that this trio trinity, the triune of peculiar god-head, has enacted is enough to arouse any republican man, woman, or child, to never let the accursed books of that detestable compound of sophistry, superstition, and faith, darken their doors. All of it, is belial indeed.

Let freemen, America, teach the world religion, and its purest principles. What redress has the world if it violate principles, that will preserve it to eternity otherwise? Is it not complete suicide? Is it not the duty of the soul to make their sincere acquaintance?

Adopt no faith that will cause you to think reproachfully of your maker, whilst your mind is rational, but elevate it rationally to the very best supreme of purposes.

Now, what less than monotheism can make a man God-like? He can well say, I am a man, and what monotheism made me, and all this, through republican constitutional principles. I only asked to be estimated in that light, no more nor less. What despots can be more?

I am opposed to peculiar faith, as it is opposed to civilization. Mind has to look above peculiar faith, and all life's errors, especially all associations, if suspicious.

The moderns must know that all peculiar faiths are unquestionably pagan and superstitious. The pulpit sophists have been taught a faithless faith and depend on it.

They have chosen a miserable false position, the fault is in them, their perverted minds, whose proper functions all the time is best wisdom.

Now, they should not sleep one night, much less die in that fix. When was peculiar faith ever modest? She usurps mind's rights, and then scouts at reason.

The world is initiated into peculiar faith by peculiar education, and thus indoctrinated, is utterly incapacitated to rationalize the subject; you cannot do justice by reason of sectarianism; cannot investigate it for your bigotry, self-interest, and superstition. You have put your bible between you and religion—between mind and religion.

The worst of all is, that peculiar faith debauches the whole world! What can be expected of individuals, when the platform of the whole world is thus prostituted?

It is a wholesale evil, and that too when there is not only not a particle of necessity, but on the contrary, is an obsolute necessity for its expulsion and exclusion. Peculiar faith, is it? Rather peculiar curse. Regeneration is too small a calibre, when conservative revolution of rational, not peculiar faith, is due mind. Peculiar faith is actually dangerous to the world, as if mind did not counteract its unholy objects, unceasing blood would flow. To establish any peculiar faith, no matter what, the worst of human nature has to be invoked: the worst of passions, superstition, false pretences, blasphemy, sacrilege, the worst imposition of mind, instead of the praiseworthy straightforward course of honorable, high-minded religion. Now, good citizens, you are not identified with all the most malevolent position to your God and country. You only need the proper view. Investigate independently of all influences, and decide religiously in good faith, to your own mind.

Gentlemanly deportment is the height of monotheism aspiration, justice to mind, world, God, religion. Has peculiar faith done all that? Has she started in truth and honesty aright? One of the most singular exhibitions of the world is to affect mind is not right, not in the right pursuit, is deranged, when genius attempts conservative revolutions of old exploded customs, ways, faiths, and of all the pitiful hacks of life, and in this, the monopolists and usurpers act the worst for their miserable and corrupt self-interest. If they did it with reason, truth or justice, the thing would be right.

Peculiar faith that has always libeled mind, is indebted to it for putting an end to most of her evils. Mind will close the balance by closing all peculiar faith, when reason can get audition. In being the peculiar god of the Jews, the peculiar superiority must be shown, or the avowal stamps the assertors claimant as unmitigated stupid impostors. From this dilemma they cannot escape. Peculiarity of god or gods, stultifies the claimants invariably and absolutely. How does this thing stand by the side of monotheism, that directs mind with the noblest, purest, chastest thoughts, exacts justice, beneficence, no superstition instead of religion? She exacts justice in place of charity, that is a trifle to the poor, who are to be cared for by the best acts of state and mind. She inspires all with true confidence, and tells them not be dispirited.

Atheists, you have to come by the side of your own abused compeer polytheist; you are a nature-worshipper, the other is a partial creation-god-worshipper, both pagans. All the intrigues of creation, the most unprincipled ingrates who seek to libel God's character, cannot invalidate his claims.

Rational religion presents a smooth road, while peculiar faith's is beset with quicksands. It is hard to avoid vice, unless the other side of the picture presents rational education to counteract always. All governments and states should furnish an adequate one, not empirical or peculiar, the curse instead of the world's blessing. When you educate peculiarly, to teach to hate peculiarly, you give an impulse, a wrong bias and influence to mind, the potent lever of the world. How little of the world can be depended on? Why is this, but from the malign influence of peculiar faith? How can we resist evils? By peculiar faith? What, the prolific authoress?

Upon what principle can peculiar faithites arraign rational religion, one iota, when they are amenable in both honesty and religion? When the monarchical head turns his back on all but court faith, and persecutes, expels, dishonors, maltreats or insults the balance, as is now done in all the five grand divisions of the globe, then the curse of this world abomination, comes home to the deceived. There are no people in the world more interested than peculiar faithites, in putting down peculiar faith that trades on their capital, as that of mind and religion. What in the name of the Creator can they want with the very means of their own degradation? What is to stay all this abominable ungodliness of self-interest, but principle, and what better than its consummation, the religion of principles? The majority, the world, as far as it properly uses rational mind, uses monotheism, while religion exists without peculiar faith, that has to borrow her main plumage from the former. How was it when Luther arose against Romanism? Was that peculiar faith against herself, or was it not most clearly mind against her iniquities?

Cause and effect will rule out all of peculiar faith, that cannot get a foothold in rational mind of this whole universe! Polytheists as atheists, her defenders, can be nowhere.

When their minds err, religion still sustains them, as the gift by God's mind; the fund is still there.

As the position of all peculiar faith is diametrically opposite God's principles, to carry it out is perjury certainly. But peculiar faithites affect a devil is necessary. It is in their devil-machinery, not in God's, nor in that of monotheism; their position is too much of their devil. Let it all go, especially to get rid of all such.

The priestocracy, above all, have repentance to seek. If you do not wish any corrupt evil faith to arise, do not corrupt the world by your peculiar faith. You have to act thus, most certainly.

Your very existence depends on principles, social, physical, moral, religious, to be conservative. Now, you have to find out these, to render you conservative. You, sir, are not to clash therewith in any of your opinions or acts. If you adopt peculiar faith, that decides you have a false position.

When partisans tell us that past scenes and acts of peculiar faithites were not sanctioned on their platform, that all such are not pagan, they do not speak the truth, only as they admit that the whole category is wound up by plenipotent rational religion, monotheism. The real position of religion is in every rational mind.

All that check peculiar faith is mind, the better as more rational. She has the worst evils in peculiar education. Education to be really good must be most and only rational, not peculiar at all.

The world mistakes in supposing people are so rational, just, good and true; it must take nothing for granted, and grant no powers but the most necessarily rational; else they will be awfully abused where peculiar will rules. All the peculiar machinery most corrupt will be put in requisition to sustain it, as prophecy, that is, for which must be read always sophistry. Mind can be God-like on principle, supreme completely to the extent of its capacity.

Now, it is not for the benefit of churches, whether cathedrals or not, priestocracies, nor their peculiar faiths, their paganisms, all their temporary advantages, made for that express purpose by the original intriguing designers, but what will be the elevation of your immortal souls, and the promotion of the religion of principles identified therewith and its Creator, that binds both in one indissoluble amity and unity.

You have nothing to do with peculiar faiths, priestocracies or their churches, much less their follies, crimes, strifes, bickerings, tithes, despotisms or foul designs, but you have with religion, rational discussions, universal brotherhoods, and all the highest promotion of the world's benefits.

You are bound as a member of society to exercise your best religion, and carry out the legitimate purpose. Reason, that holds all peculiar faith in abeyance, is the creative power, with the certain elements of solid happiness, emanating from rational religion. The last will give mankind the nearest approximation of perfection. Her innate qualities are adequate for the whole universe. Her word to the wise is sufficient, and her capital creates wisdom, not peculiarly but universally.

She will enable the valiant to rout ignorance, superstition and oppression, and aid the zealous by her principles. It is perfectly useless to pretend about faith of any kind being an absolute matter. That was the tory assertion of the smuggling tyrants that introduced it, a miserable imposture on the world, a false pretence to uphold a false pretence, taking advantage of the God-gift by their treacherous enforcement. If you receive any such by surrender of your mental citadel, how are you going to get rid of all the insurmountable difficulties your own produced? Religion cannot possibly regard peculiar faith, no matter how blazoned by meretricious ornaments, as a rival, when she has plenipotent supremacy.

We must estimate the false glare of the world's treasures, powers and possessions, that influenced and perverted mind, that oppressed the world for the purpose, losing its equilibrium.

Rational religion must now restore it.

CHURCH MEMBERSHIP OF PECULIAR FAITH: PAGANISM.

A loose state of morals, arising from insincerity of more than a majority of members, it is said by good observers, evinces the relative state of peculiar faith doctrines throughout the world, from a want of truth at the foundation, and hence arise a general use of sophistry, and its attendant bigotry, among most of its professions of life.

What can all mortal messiahships avail the world, or those not absolutely rejecting, yet not adopting; not in the pale of safety, though belonging to the various churches?

Millions thus neutralize their own good, taught certain family and church worship from youth, they do not dissent, yet in years of reflection and maturity they do not assert or avow the doctrines that they cannot conscientiously believe. They die, martyrs to custom of inherent nothing, abstracted from the true and essential belief, the eternal ever living Almighty, the universal Savior, because the universal Creator, having a power equal to his goodness.

Such persons neither adopt nor reject the doctrines of messiahship, but live and die good citizens, certainly no avowed believers, yet indebted to their Creator for every breath of life, and every elevation of mind, whom they overlook most ungratefully and irreverently.

Past teaching, and habit in such tuition, all over the world, thus present an immense number of the human family of doubtful change, yet preserved despite of all these circumstances by their Creator.

Pride, habit, the wish for consistency, the institutions and laws of the world, fix the opinions but not the conscience in all false positions of education that asks for peculiar faith independent of reason.

The sincere faith, certainly the pure acquiescence of the mind, triumphs by reason, the only acceptable and worthy offering before its Organizer.

Church membership confers power; but—

Each clique and sect cuts up society into clans, and curses it with its foul breath.

God Almighty never made such a world.

Let sects and clans unmake and undo their deeds.

Trifles of mere puerile contention will be erased, because the corrupt base will be discarded.

Some sects look on others with perfect contempt, and hardly recognise them as anything at all; in fact, exclude them, as not orthodox, from communion.

But the eternal principles of universal brotherhood, which are those of God unmistakably, admit all rational minds within the pale of safety. What a glorious position!

Here there can be no conflict, whether water by sprinkling or by immersion be the way, when the purity of the soul will be the acknowledged universal means of eternal safety.

There can be no contention whether the elect or any peculiar sect in place of all shall be saved, for no particular merits of the believers, as the leaders of all such doctrines, the originator of such faiths, are all sinful mortals, mere created beings, alike infatuated and corrupt, who pretend that universal safety is approachable to such that have rational minds on rational principles, through a rational God.

In peculiar faith there may be no end to trifles, as there is no end to mind's corruption when it is perverted. Mind is always subject to perversion, under influences arising from all power; and that of church power is too great to be missed.

Before God, what matters it whether some are excluded from communion with others in peculiar faith? God cannot recognise in the foundation any other than corruption?

SEVERANCE OF STATE FROM CHURCH.

Bright was that day that American freedom saw a severance of state from church. That act constituted an element of popular power of mind, the richest in the annals of rational religion, the noblest friend of man, that gives to freedom of mind all that is hers, the kindest for mind, the most triumphant for reason and God.

Rational religion yields this as a sacred right of the people, of mind, and reason, and God, and asks only for a rightful participation throughout the world. None better could have been done by wise statesmen for religion, as rational religion only asks for the good of souls for all past and present generations and posterity.

She asks for due and prompt atonement to be made for past errors accursed by the blood of millions, by aiding man to find the most direct path to his God, and to take away all means of mind's perversion.

If monotheism asked more or less, she would be unworthy of God's countenance and man's confidence. Of course, she asks to be independent of any corrupt priesthood. She does not wish any such to be her ministers.

The annals of this glorious day ought to be had in rememberance by the nations of the world, where civil and religious liberty has her votaries, and enlightened mind her friends.

It is a day that God blessed, and that freemen will consecrate with love and appreciation.

Her light was holy, and her atmosphere pure and vital. It will be known as one of the great days of freedom and rational religion.

The benefits shall go abroad on the earth, and the globe shall be blessed with their presence.

The mind of man and of the human race shall praise it, and honor its sacred name!

The present age has witnessed that the papal Roman states had asserted their freedom, and had exchanged the errors of the past for the improvement of the present, having excluded their pontiff from temporal government, whose see was once so powerful by mind's delusion and infatuation, man's corruption and degradation, that its mandate governed much of the world, to the astonishment of subsequent ages.

But what availed the acts of these noble descendants of worthy patriotic sires, in their assertion of fundamental principles essential to the only kind of correct government, constitutional republican representation, clearly showing as a necessary consequence, that religious faith is truly placed in the minds of the people, not in the power or possession of assuming rulers, who are hostile to the best interests of the people, if those rulers be connected to speculation in rights and principles?

But popish faith has not responded to true civil and religious liberty, and its malign influence has caused even a sister republic to aid in crushing with horrible inconsistency and iniquity, the birthright of freemen. This is one of the execrable abominations of peculiar faith.

This is the most conclusive proof among hosts of all kinds not to be invalidated, that the peculiar faith of any sect, and under any form, is incompetent to the rights of man, and has nothing of religion.

Sectarianism so far from benefiting mind's rights, has crushed them with the iron heel of absolutism for the most part of her existence, after possession of power.

All proper blessings will redound to mind in a true republican constitutional government, excluding all shackles of any character on mind, that must be true to itself, to be true to God who made it.

All blessings will follow in order eventually, as the mind of man is more generally enlightened.

What a step Europe had already taken, under the example of her younger and energetic sister, America! Had the hundred millions of free-thinking people only been united, and used the appropriate moral and intellectual power, they had thereby effectually overcome all the malign influences of absolutism!

What a step the balance of the world has to take, to assert first principles, already enacted from the foundation of all things!

If all the world to-day, in its present state, could be in the church of partial and defective doctrines and peculiar faith, none could be assured of any nearer approach to a full and sacred fruition, from the character of the elements, that have no especial claim to him who created the purest, as all deny his purest Almighty attributes.

How can such believers face this supreme God, with just hopes, or conscientious minds?

Their God is not the pure, perfect God of happiness! In fact, most are, from the essential character of their peculiar faith and worship, farther removed from God's approval, did he not take the will of the ignorant for the deed of the best enlightened.

The Creator, then, is the only being that can recognise the proper analysis of mind, and all its character. The best compliance with his requisitions, is the strictest conformity to the requisitions of his great principles. Thereby all other masters are necessarily ruled out.

Church membership opens, in its present organization, the door of temptation to corruption and hypocrisy, by giving decided preference and clanship to the members, without reference to merit.

Many are proved, by the best documents, to merely pretend to membership. Why so? They are doubters.

The conduct of several expels them, not only from church, but from society. Many stumbling-blocks remain.

But all such are arrayed in false character, many joining the church for sinister and worldly motives, become workers of iniquity under such a banner desecrated.

What can prevent it? Enlightened conscience will tell.

Priests and preachers' churches of peculiar faith are those of superstition and paganism, and their ways have been those of violence. Let not their acts cause any more curses on the world.

Their churches are mutually condemned by members of the same representative, who proves no diploma from God, fit for credence in any intelligent court of conscience, enlightened by reason and principle, either by his presence, in time or space, before the present world, where reason proves the Creator to be unmistakably prior to both, or the existence of creation.

The contentions of co-churches, under this representative, are endless, and bitterly antagonistic.

What but for worldly power do they feel hostile?

Can they act thus for religion? That is impossible. Such is of the world, worldly.

What is the world to all such, proving themselves thereby most amenable to correction, but for worldly considerations?

Who wonders, on the analysis of peculiar faith, that not only its sects are arrayed against each other, but that all the primary peculiarities of the world are deadly hostile to the death of all the other faiths?

Though some have begun to admit that others can teach the ignorant barbarians of the world some good, they will not admit that principles and truth are common, and are the appropriate sphere of mind, that sheds the light of the Universal Creator.

They will not admit the truth, that is adverse to their position, but direct the common property to secular and peculiar benefit.

The protestant leaves the mother church, as he asserts, on account of its articles of faith, and corruption, that is depraved action, growing out of that faith; and thus contends with co-equal protestant churches for demoralization of self-agency, and the possession of power over dissenters!

One church affects age for distinction, as if truth depended on years, and character rested on mere time.

It is to be regretted that the beauties of creation, the glories of immortal mind, are thus marred, in silencing mind, whose right to tell the whole truth is best and indisputable.

Let us not sacrifice, with blind infatuation, the noblest qualities of mind to the erroneous customs of the day, neither upheld by reason or light of philosophy.

What, has it come to this, that in the most enlightened age of the world, that the professors of peculiar faith cannot trust each other, all claiming a common vicegerent and representative of God, or affecting to claim? How can they expect the world to trust them?

The members of one church are afraid to trust their children at academies, perhaps rightfully too in most instances, to the tuition of teachers who are members of other churches.

As this distrust in several matters is very serious, it argues the absolute necessity of the world righting itself, the sooner the better, in all such matters, on universal principles, and then if there be difficulty in intrusting youth for education, depend upon it the objection is necessarily, conclusively and rightfully personal, which reason can be entirely valid with the world.

How can ministers give up their calling, their church power and possession, custom and supposed consistency, however forbid by paramount truth and wisdom, when power, reckless of justice, rarely yields at the last, not gracefully, but with vulgar resistance, especially after so much bloodshed by false faith, with all her horrid tortures and ignominy, her savage butchery in many ways?

When the wars that were engendered by and about church faith are referred to, as most barbarous and outrageous for even superstition, dark and ignorant, the greatest curses of the world, church members become indignant, if such be not ascribed to false faith.

This admission uses up the whole category, having its exposure at last, that false faith, the very point we condemn, engendered the abuses.

When we convict of interminable abuses the whole spurious systems of faith, in the name of God, how can any such system be exempt from censure, as it has inherent elements of abuse? The elements of abuses are referable to the nature, the incurable nature of the systems, that must be eradicated.

The abuses of any system being unlimited as these, can only end in the system, no matter how modified.

A system that begins its foundations of libels on God's uprightness and attributes, engendering blasphemy, is full of evils only curable by its termination.

Are the conflicts of churches done with? Are all rightly settled? Are there no bristling bayonets to uphold any of its representatives over citizens seeking right government?

Are there no gorgeous salaries to enslave human rights?

Are there no poor people, with but little property, heavily taxed and burdened for its support?

Has peculiar church faith no peculiar interest with the state power?

Is there no exclusion of sister churches from equal rights and privileges? No desperate and ungodly bloody intrigues?

By what honorable standard can this measure of state-policy be instituted? Are not all social and religious principles violated?

Is not this certain proof of the acts of absolutism most complete? Is not all, the institution of ecclesiastical and monarchical despotism?

Do all church professors act for the pure love, unadulterated love, of the dear people? Do they then live without hire? Is it for the souls of the people, or the interests of the churchmen, and the despots, tyrants, kings and monarchs, that union of state and church is established?

If for the first, all is useless, as all such are vain.

By what authority is all this done, and still maintained?

Has not time corrected all such views as outrageous and hostile to the sovereign people, destitute entirely of religion?

If disinterested love were the case, why do not they prove the facts by absolute refusal of all pecuniary, church and state power? Let no intervening object cause the loss of sight of the one pure Being. How could the loudest professions be otherwise than very suspicious?

Has the question ever been submitted fairly to rational mind, by free investigation and inquiry, or rather has it not been scouted upon, and the investigators been libeled by priests and clergy, and all their vassals?

Have proper measures ever been taken to have the free people institute all researches and proper best means for mind to reach, by rational means, the true issue of this paramount subject, before a competent committee of disinterested citizens in convention?

Is this momentous question, the most important of the world in all its bearings, to be blindly passed by, and left to the incompetent and interested stock-jobbers of the world's morals to botch and tinker with for indefinite ages to come, without redress?

Is an intelligent and free people prepared to suffer all this in satisfaction, without saying their souls are God's?

Forbid it justice, peace, mind, reason, that are to be consulted.

True believers in God Almighty, of duty to man, with no church emoluments for their proper and satisfactory belief, could never begin to war therefor.

The thing is impossible, because fundamental principles prevent it.

The whole world, so far as rational religion is applicable, would then be in peace. Who would not go for such a glorious result?

Will your omission of duty, your neglect and silence longer prevail, to rebuke you for your priceless advantages?

You are one of a billion of voters at the ballot box of conscience, enlightened and liberal, to decide to-day for the settlement of this principle forever.

It is absurd to say that the people will not act on it.

That is the siren song of those that misled the people to their injury and wrong, to the interest of the leaders, who assume to think and act for, and dictate to the people.

Let not that exploded doctrine be repeated before a self-governing people.

We seek to rid ourselves of all exploded doctrines of absolutism of church and state, and adopt the only safe principle of mind for the sovereign people.

No one can libel this position, to which none save tyrants are antagonistic, for the pursuit of right and title beyond doubt, otherwise that very position supposed of right is error.

Freemen seeking such invaluable rights are antagonistic to none who are advocates of justice, honesty, and patriotism.

Counterfeits are not to be passed as pure jewels on them, or to their detriment.

Freemen are of the billion to legislate on the pure currency of the world. All good citizens are thus interested, and intelligent freemen acknowledge none true but such as is of the right mint and genuine coinage.

The right stamp easily proves the genuine.

Again and again is the attention of all good citizens in life, of elevated and refined qualities, worthy of the world's respect, and of their race and kind, invoked to aid in sealing and closing the world-wide difficulties, conflicts of peculiar faith opinions, and the consequent interruptions of peace, in rescuing the state of society in its noblest base and object, in the exaltation of man's dignity, greatness, and happiness.

The end of religion is not church membership, clannish or sectarian, doubtful or visionary, but sound and substantial views, with definite and wisest prospect.

The Creator of all has vouchsafed the best co-operation in the institution of inherent principles, that distinguish man from animals, and elevate mind to soul from time to immortality, and that bespeak the union of all minds of conservative character.

As wide as the most conflicting differ, still the divine author is pre-eminently characterized by a universal virtue that can harmonize and tend to universal good and union on principle, and that alone.

On principle, man is linked to man, and all to their Creator, who thus endowed creation with self-preservation.

All the sects and denominations of the world can never unite but on one single platform, that of principles as universal as creation, to which all nations must look, and by which all wise ones will abide.

Come to this all must; the sooner the better; there is or can be no other.

God has instituted it, man must not usurp it.

Man is the worst of his race to deprive that race of it.

It is clear that the improved state of general mind needs an exalted system of civil and religious code, that may rally mankind to their true feeling and duty, to realize what all need universally.

Millions this day cold and indifferent in action, put on hostile feelings as to the points of faith that they are conscious are not of the true character for mind, are sensible that they owe allegiance only to their Creator, but they are silent when the still small voice of conscience speaks for that God.

It ought not so to be in any country, much less a free one, where at least free and open discussion should be elicited on all subjects, to rescue true thoughts and their originators.

But individual attempts are frowned down, their works are banished or libeled by impudent and outrageous arrogance, accompanied with as much assurance as if all were divine oracles, and that all decisions of exploded custom and men's opinions, were all right, and that lay freemen had not a sovereign right yet to be investigated, acted on, and matured by the only way of reaching the subject, the proper analysis of mind and its functions.

If religion be in the keeping of church membership, characterized by this spirit and faith, what is to become of the large majority who can never be professors to such creeds?

Why should there be masters of peculiar and partial creeds? Because mind is universal, not peculiar or partial, then faith, an action of the mind, must partake of mind's character.

No, it is not possible that man should be excluded from the pale of safety or society, because he cannot enter the pale of faith and church, believing most sincerely and truly in the only living God, ruler omnipotent.

He who believes in more, believes in a plurality of gods, and is compelled to admit a solecism, a contradiction, the existence of their Supreme, an Almighty, the Great First Cause. That great first cause has attributes beyond man's vain notions, and must command his highest deference.

Men's professions, independent of shining actions, that tell with unerring certainty, in the course of a long life, are never to be taken for granted until proved.

Mind cannot decide the whole question by professions, that wise men ought never to entertain exclusively.

Life is made up of professions and their practice, all to be estimated church or no church, duty in life is plain, not to induce evil, the negative and antagonist of good. of the world we cannot safely take anything for granted in common matters of little moment,

This admonishes professors of the sects, how then can we expect safety in regard to the faith, the very hierarchy, that does not practice in unison, that is proved to be distrust-om youth to end of life, under the evils reflective on its character?

What advantages does all church peculiar faith offer, that can equal her world-wide evils, either in the great primary benefits of life by government or religion? Under all her auspices, the results reflect on each other.

Hierarchy gives us promises of supreme advantages under dictation on earth, of its creeds, but unfortunately does not recognise with certainty, the character and person of the payer.

The hierarchy presented the people dealing in prescriptions on this earth, and in promises that must be inefficient in another state of existence, seems not to have drawn on the only payer that mind can recognise through reason.

The hierarchy known to us, bows ever to a plurality of gods, or worse, makes a man born and died as a mortal, a god, and inevitably libels God, imbecile as man. In the face of all such hierarchy, the belief expressing the pure teaching of monotheism that gives mind its best inspiration, adopts God Almighty, not god imbecile.

All principles are common, the exclusive property of God their author, that only require a right tuition and direction in their employment by mind.

Has hierarchy any exclusive pretension to their appropriate tuition and direction, when she does not meet the wise tuition of proper honest sense?

How does she prove her position right? She proves the reverse.

Hierarchy has been sundered into fragments by her corruption, and the fragments are running out in minuter divisions, in objection to inherent elements of corruption.

The whole foundation is baseless, and must run out.

What more than name, have many church members?

Is it in the unimpeachable veracity and honesty, and the secret actions of such? While they only act to the promptings of their own uncultivated and perverted minds, miserably balanced and fixed in that miserable state of bad habits, that grown and strengthened to their matured and ripe age without due correction, prove the necessity of continued light of mind, to guard properly all its avenues. Whilst the best church members are no worse than the the best members of society in general, they are no better in respect to true chracter. Both are preserved by the same principles.

Membership in peculiar church society confers no new principles, but detracts from the purity of God's perfection.

The most extensive theatre for mind's correction is that which embraces the whole legitimate comprehension of God's perfection.

Nothing but a right action on universal principles that recognise no peculiar faith as an exponent, can bring back all actors to the right thoughts and actions.

The right position in any society is to be sought by a recognised and practical society and certain base.

Belief and action are mutual, and reflect on the actors.

What else can possibly result than that too many of mankind are deceivers, on the present code of justice and virtue?

Look not to what tradition says, but in unison with mind and reason, all to be proved by the result.

Patriots, philanthropists and philosophers, men and women of common and proper sense and honesty, are reminded to assert the dignity of mind and the pre-eminence of rational duties.

In self-defence, a proper analysis of this whole subject is necessary. The ignorant ancients had too little of wise knowledge, to be examples to the moderns.

Man is not in general prepared to see his case, he must investigate it, and by the true lights alone.

Look not to mankind's opinions, only as recognised by tested truth and facts.

Man needs the superior developments of enlightened mind for ever, as he is subject to the loss by perversion and collusion of others in his own ignorance, the prey to all that seek to obscure the gain of mind's light.

Man then enlightened must ever hail the hand of Deity too plainly needed to be mistaken, in all man's pretences that he can discover, to be miserably, stupidly defective.

Then by observation he can correctly see that many in the churches are stumbling blocks to others, by affecting sanctified conduct and looks, unnecessary and impracticably beneficial.

Social rights are violated in regard to different persuasions, as conflicts arise not so much from personal as professional pretensions; principle alone can heal or have prevented them.

Such church proceedings engender among the people a state of insincerity that is ruinous, and requires the highest elevation of character to counteract all the malign and evil tendencies of all such radically erroneous systems.

The people have the command of this mighty subject, in looking to its true anaylsis and themselves the proper means for correction, and have only to permanently institute principles. Millions in such circles have no idea of belief in the church dogmas of the day, yet it is most obligatory that all the world should be civilized and know who is God, and what he requires for man's highest duty in regard to all, for social and personal safety.

Mind owes it to itself to decide rightly and act on that decision in all such matters, as the signs of the wolf besides his howls, are too clear from the blood-marks and wounds.

How in society, where means are ready and furnished for wide-spread and incurable evils delusive yet most insidious, can mind ever rest satisfied in leaving such momentous matters at the mercy of relentless elements, to be lightened at the shrine of fanaticism so often used in the world under high sounding names and pretension?

To the everlasting regret of the good, men are possessed of such fanatical intentions enacting them too often in the present age of the world after all its boasted light, and are sustained by military force to perpetrate them, in defiance of the true sovereigns of the land, the people, by union of church with absolutism, or civil and military despotism under the hypocritical name of a republic.

The state acting this degrading drama, that ought to protect all alike! The best codes of all duties ought to counteract all this, that the people cannot do and know too soon.

Do all the church members, even many of the very preachers, believe in the bible of peculiar faith? How can any enlightened mind do that?

Can any affect it but those whose mind is peculiarly warped by peculiar prejudices and peculiar education, unknown to the recognition of purity?

Can any pretend to such, but those whose trade and vocation cause them to speculate in such faith, in the face of reason and paramount truth?

But do they act honorably to the author of their mind, that he has created for reason, truth and honesty?

Do they act honorably to their fellow-citizens of the world, whom they viciously seduce and contaminate?

The Romanist considers the Protestant a heretic, unworthy to be thought entitled to the rights vouchsafed to the christian.

The Protestant thinks the Romanist is too corrupt and ignorant, ever to see his heaven.

While the numerous subdivisions of this whole persuasion, including the Greek church, and all other christians of any pretensions, exclude each other necessarily, by their peculiar notions, from all the pretensions of orthodox peculiarity.

Now, what must be the inevitable righteous decision of rational religion, and its author, God, who knows no other, but that none of these, according to their own showing, possesses it, especially if we go to their various sects?

Where then is the rest of all peculiar faiths, and all absurd theologies, pagan, or any claiming more than pagan, but no higher than man-worship?

No wonder that the corrupt peculiar faith-world, the most iniquitous of all, should call to its aid the worst of tyrannies, and the most insidious of sophistries.

But all such have not availed, however they sought concealment.

The day of reckoning has come, and the decision can be had.

The concealment is like that of the ostrich, that hides its head, it is said, but its body is disclosed.

It is absolutely right, and at this time, that the millions now held in, should be freed from thraldom of peculiar doctrines, as they, but for shame and tyranny of misdirected public opinion, would be among the lights of mind.

One church is opposed to another, as heretic, esteeming itself only orthodox, because of the youthful age of the other, as if truth required age to become respectable.

Such is bigot opposition, having various pretensions to its own orthodoxy, and no base to true faith, affecting that its peculiar faith is the only true way, and that the world must be indebted to that for its safety.

The Creator has made no such world or faith, nor has he thus constituted mind.

From want of feeling and experiencing such faith that cannot be fortified by mere words or sophistry, in the time of need, when the only God, and his facts, are wanting, an immense number of church members of these persuasions, thinking in the excitement of conversion that they have the true faith, as the priests tell them they have, doubt at last, whether they have any or no.

It is not their deeds that are to be scanned, as they, when good, are as good as the best of the world, but the foundation on which they lean unknowingly.

When they know that position, they have found that they have left God for man-worship, a pretended messiah or prophet, and what an exchange!

A mortal blasphemer for the only Immortal Supreme God!

What grace is there in that membership?

What is the grace of God?

The prayer of good actions, correction of one's self, by the aid and inspirations of mind, lessening the evils, and increasing the universal benefit of the world, causing love of a universal brotherhood, best representing God's mind.

Persecution and bloodshed necessarily result from all the licentious spirit engendered by church governments, as compulsion and sophistry, not reason, have to be used in propagating such doctrines.

Much of church membership that has no pretensions to the dignity of faith, is brought about by various causes. Temporal preferments of diversified character, come in for a very large share.

The custom and fashion, the fault and vices of the times, of being "all things to all men," as the popular current directs, not as mind but as the social dynasty says, bring about many world-conversions to church membership.

Church-belief and association often result from feelings, and them by sympathy, aroused animal passions, the fear of superstition, with all the thunders of fiction and ambition too, no less than sinister designs, and credulity aroused and captivated by theatrical representations and recital.

What extreme youth is taught as household words, are fastened, if possible, in the circle that is interested in carrying out the peculiar faith, and the power of the priestocracy.

We see that many sects arise and fall under such influence, and though they rose like the morning star in their faith, they fall by force of true faith that must supersede all others.

Religion must be rational to exist at all, as it depends on the attributes of mind for sustenance, and is not, never can be, of church or state, but is identified with the soul's incentives, and the deeds of the conscientious individual who does right.

It breathes too holy an atmosphere to be trifled with by the vulgar intermeddlings of priestocracy, for if its essentials be lost in its own positions, it is lost in the quagmires of such odious vices.

All differences in church can and will subside, when honesty has her sway and religion her brotherhood.

Even in this union, distinguished for elementary fundamental principles of government, that the enlightened world recognises right by progressive adoption, where mind is untrammeled by absolutism, the most of church faith is no test of sincerity or protection, as but few members are absolutely sincere professors of pure faith by action.

All churches are subject to the infatuation of priestocracy, as fundamental power for their incorporation.

There are many individual exceptions in all such, that are more or less removed from improper motives, but they all are liable to improper positions and resulting injury; of course, they must be weak-minded.

Well educated persons of proper standing, add nothing to their standing in the church, except on the principles that have reared the blessings of their minds.

But the analysis of their position is not clear to their minds.

Many carry all their blessings into church-membership, and are a means of raising the most of the balance to their standing, but then they could elevate that whole position on the basis of rational religion.

But there are also stumbling-blocks in such churches, from the popes and bishops to the humblest layman, and unfortunately, they have their influence by church-membership to a certain extent.

It is not in the power of church elements to do justice to the world.

Their vices are ever extreme and revolting to social principles, that can never overlook, as the soul of the whole question.

The ignorant are often prejudiced, not by what results from a proper system, but are superficially misled by the inherent defects of previous bad ones.

All the intelligent minds of the world untrammeled by errors of peculiar education, and the influences of intriguing power, acknowledge the correct principles that a constitutional representative government gives to the people.

Why, then, is any church power expelled, and depending on gunpowder influence for restoration, if her faith is in accordance with the benefit of the greatest number?

Shall all possessed of absolutism, finally be utterly destroyed by the very influence it has invoked, to secure universal freedom?

Shall the noblest attempt of the brave citizens be its perpetual disgrace, through its excommunication of those people?

Freedom of religious conscience is incompatible with one-sided decisions of compulsion!

We observe here, that church government stands against conscience and freedom.

God creating religious and governmental freedom, never made them inconsistent. One or the other is wrong, and should be corrected, by proper submission to and decision of mind, most rational and free.

Enlightened freemen sovereigns, who act, or ought to act for themselves, can alone decide a sovereign question. There is no other rightful decision of mind and reason. The principles of religion and government being for society, morality and God, are compatible, or else a good and evil are mixed, which is an absurdity.

The correct analysis of rational mind, in her universal operations, insures the right decision.

The great good that has been accomplished in the world, is very clear of being due to forms, sects, or denominations of peculiar church-faith, but oftenest in defiance of them, when they have interfered.

Church peculiar faith-sophistry is not to usurp anything of reason, under any pretence whatever.

Much good, that has been accomplished in the world, has been the result of natural causes, that always have a conservative result, else the destructive would predominate. It has been the great result of social intercourse, where mind has acted on mind, stirring up the mighty latent powers. Commerce, also, has brought about an intercourse of sentiment, a knowledge of science, facts, and truths unknown, reflecting vast and mighty improvements in the condition of men, and in despite of errors and their narrow prejudices, encumbered with the deepest impediments of all alien designs.

Too much has been ascribed to others, that are legitimately and solely due to the principles conservative of the Creator, who has been unappreciated by vain men, and their vain and evil intentions have been paraded, as something for the gratitude of a world, injured by them!

The absolutism of the church is the worst of all, as hypocrisy is there. Her pretensions have been palmed on the world too long.

What have the adherents to respect, but force or sophistry?

The whole hierarchy, built up, as it is, by hands, is rubbish, and that on the fee simple grounds of others.

Why cumbereth it the ground? Honorable minds, answer. All previous church governments, with their gorgeous hierarchy and priestocracy, in all the fascinations of wealth and power, to bewilder mind and beguile reason; in the pomp of courts, the beauty and grandeur of architecture, the lustre of paintings, with the magnificence of statuary, backed by all the state powers of absolutism, securing potentates, armies and navies, their protectors, combined with exalted talents, aspiring orators and eloquent defenders, and untiring zeal subsidized, have failed to procure its greatest jewel, unity.

Without unity there can be no sound basis of religion. The unity of God Almi requires unity of religion.

Principle cannot present antagonism with itself, that is impossible. The first chu of Judaism had dissensions, and the second church, Christian, had dissension, an successive periods it has been divided; and the whole Judaic, Christian, Greek, M metan, Mormon, Protestant and Roman, are the church, divided against itself, that fall in time. All peculiar faith churches, throughout the world, are divided.

The reformations and their wars have proved the falsity of the faiths.

The subdivisions have been continued, among each kith and kin. Faith-antag has become the duty and the game of each other, and all are a spectacle to th Unable to secure unity, much less to strengthen the church, they fail to comm necessary moral and intellectual power of the world, that, however needed, it impossible for them to possess.

They have traded on the principles, the capital of God, without referenc legitimate authority, thereby acting unwisely and dishonestly, without ackn to the God of themselves.

The times that saw kings travelling barefoot to the holy city, so miscalled ...ting days for audience of the pope, to get absolved from his curse, are thought to be past, but the dark clouds are yet lowering on the horizon. Of course the more humble subjects were subject to more awful tyrannies, and not the least was the pope's excommunications, that even at this day are fulminated with all the vindictiveness of bigotry. Only to think of the holiness of the pope, so miscalled, united with such a curse! The burning to death, to create religion! And these claim to be the source of science and philosophy for the world, in whose keeping mind is murdered, and its most worthy attri-...es crushed!

For many years, the predominant absolutism was that of the pope, whose very feet were worthy the lips of other potentates, who thus degraded their lips below their feet, and their minds below them! And all this, because mind did not assert its rights, mind that was sovereign to rule the world, was ignobly ruled by its lowest minions.

And these the keepers, self-assumed guardians of mind's richest treasures!

Talents then were buried for fear, as they were dangerous to their owner.

There was mind all the time, but its tyrants exacted the deepest curses of men of talents.

No science or philosophy could rear its head that did not agree with the dogmas of superstition, and her sophisticated ignorance advanced in the bible!

Can mind begin to feel the infamous tyranny of the priestocracy that excluded all science and philosophy, if they presented the conduct of these worthies as antagonistic? The dungeon or the faggot was the tribunal!

Disgusting relics illimitable in amount, outrageous legend, ignoble miracles assumed, were the science of those days. May they never be repeated. May they now end.

We must cling with the more sincere tenacity to rightful principles, and invoke their best protection, whether spiritual enthusiasm or peculiar faith regeneration be diffused or not.

It matters not whether all such unholy notions be the prevalent dogmas of any day, if men be broken on the wheel for conscience, or libeled now for its correct maintenance.

Absolutism will insinuate itself into every department of human rights, and above all, the human mind, then becoming perverted, leaves its rights subverted.

The combinations of peculiar faith to exercise collusions and insidious designs, are numberless, and hardly credible. Never will this matter be appreciated, till the purity of truth be duly elicited by sagacious analysis, which cannot be too highly estimated.

Mind must lay aside its abeyance to the master, and resume that to principle, and give up its devotion to the assertion of the dogmatist, no matter of what standing, and adopt the faithful portraiture of its own facts.

How long shall vain and puerile, but hurtful trifles, occupy as toys, the minds of grown-up children, who lose sight of the substance that men need?

What need is there of church prerogatives to the world, except so far as duty to God prevails, and that, these impostors have essentially failed to impart?

The people do not need them for temporal, and they are useless, perfectly so, for spiritual governments.

What benefit are they to foster all the ambitious views and intrigues of numbers, many of whom make religion subservient to their selfish aims, faithless, reckless, and of no account, reflecting on their connections with the church or state, contending for non-essentials in forms, rites and ceremonies, made by man and for man?

What does the pure mind of man care, whether a part of the body or the whole, should be bathed in water; whether the opinion, that the elect should only be saved in place of all seeking safety, by self-agency of mind, in its best aspirations, unless it deplores the miserable position superseding correct duty?

What does this all arise from, but degraded designs on the one part, and on the other, fundamental ignorance and error, never to be corrected, that go from bad to worse, till all shall be swept away before the Almighty, the only object of pure religion, that only satisfies the wise and virtuous?

What character so base, that will defeat the right direction and tendency of what so controls man's happiness?

The department of all sectarianism shows an irreconcilable antagonism to each other, horrible and depraved, for the worst purposes.

But some sectarians hate sin, that is, vice and iniquities.

Do not all good and wise citizens hate the same, if well raised and bred, their brain balanced, their education right, their social circles of elevated thoughts, which bespeak the reason of such position?

Learning, is it in the church faith, causing all countries, receiving its peculiar faith, to flourish as countries never flourished?

The very best evidence of the reverse is the fact, that a counterfeit faith, a superstition is adopted, showing the ignorance of people, not knowing it instead of religion, showing the unsoundest state of science, where the very first principle is violated, and ferocious and insidious absolutism has been, and is invoked in all its forms to carry it out.

Is that an honorable position of learning and science, where faith is made use of over mind, faith superseding religion and truth, causing the most odious church vassalage?

Absolutism that advocates any such divine rights of potentates, civil or ecclesiastical, must be discarded.

Protestantism, as advocating such, though the least of evils, as to Romanism, and other peculiar faiths, only as it emerges from superstition more, and gives more latitude to mind, as it commands the reading of the bible, when Romanism had excluded it once, is more tolerated, but the conscientious freeman is yet frightened by its libels, as old women, and children, against free rational discussion of the essential principles of rational religion, and the visionary position of its faith.

Is that freedom of mind, when reading of intellectual works, about free agency of mind, are prohibited by all fanatical expedients, creating church member vassals, and degraded ciphers of thought, of demoralized pupilage?

If that faith be sound and just, honest and truthful, membership will be high-minded to meet all opposition as the best thing for all the world.

But opposition, that is principled, defies all church faith that is or has been the avowed enemy of mind, as long as free thought and independent action can be estimated, as the noblest position of man, and execrating all forms of peculiar faith that have crushed man's spirit, by all basest expedients.

What is rational free discussion for, but to clear the whole world of its rankest errors, and its most obvious prejudices?

There is no limit in this world to its varied superstition, in any age or country, except by the light of mind, that rules out the bigotry of action.

What wise head of any church faith would wish it established by intrigue, malign influence of military stratagem, bribery?

Are such appropriate to create the solid foundations of any faith?

What is thus established by such force is the work of fraud, and is amenable to the tribunal of the highest justice. What is established by force may be speedily prostrated thereby.

But all such never can suit civilized man, or any state of man who needs the best gifts of civilization, not the curses of superstition and barbarism.

Man has a social and religious duty rightly to perform, from his organization the innate foundation therefor.

No church faith personal or absolute power can alter or endow this, the pure gift of an untrammeled conscience.

No wise observer will wonder to see that all church power has its days numbered, by the spirit and action of science. The wiles of hierarchy and the papal potency suffered badly, when the light of philosophy truly dawned.

Its meridian light will scatter all such by a total eclipse. When its blessings are diffused, all the ambitious aspirations of superstition yield their temporal pretences to those of heroic virtues as patriotism and self-denial, exhibited by the greatest men devoted to enlightened mind's institutions.

Enlightened codes and precepts properly prepared are the safe-guards of the social world, enabling all to appreciate their duty, and to feel the necessary penalty on social and moral violations.

Time will be known as the great vindicator of eternal truth, when man knows himself practically.

How many numerous oppositions do sectarians show to each other, and still they affect religion, doing duty to God and man, fostering the very elements of strife; any thing else but good feelings of mind you may call all such.

Where is that courteous toleration, nay, rationality, that adopts what is rational, that suits the rational spirit of this age of freedom?

We are bound to give all due respect to the feelings of all true members of all churches, though myriads do not believe, but join from various impure motives, hence all such faith originates the curse of hypocrisy on man in all departments.

What good citizen will affirm this to be right?

All have innate faculties, functions and principles of religion, and if rational religion exist, these professions must be sound and pure for ever.

Religion and worldly affairs as church professions, must never be mixed, but invariably be separate. The priestocracy have nothing to do with religion. Not only separate church from state, but from money and all peculiar power that intervene between mind and God. We must nurture such morals that science can originate, reason approve, and philosophy seal.

All these are proper resources, and will do to fall back upon.

We must have just action on belief and adoration of Deity, to cut down selfish sectarianism, bigotry, hypocrisy, impiety, blasphemy, man-worship, polytheism in all its disguises of members as trinity and idolatry, under their various and disguised forms.

All the church establishments are money-power engines.

What benefit can they impart to the world? The preachers have "calls."

Who can dispute their thinking so, if they choose and if the call be profitable?

When the true adoration of the true living God will supersede the various worships of superstition, and destroy hypocrisy by his immutable principles that keep the universe in the proper sphere, and direct moral agents to their proper duty, we shall be puzzled to see what preachers and priests can do for mankind.

All had best retire forthwith, as unneeded at all.

Analysis of mind leads men to appreciate its principles and ideas, that lead conclusively to God a fixed fact of all facts, but many church people have partial conversions to messiahs and fall back soon afterwards. What do all such avail them?

But what rational mind can fall back from its recognised God? As well ask for the destruction of the universe.

What protection is the church against evil, sin, or vice, independent of the vital principles of God?

As far as churches embrace conservative principles they do good, but those principles are universal to mind, not peculiar to any individual body. Churches corrupt the right impression about those principles.

The foundation of all those very principles must begin rightly with mind, not church membership.

Principles, then, have acted the world's age, where messiahs could not possibly be heard of, and where they could not possibly go, and that all over the globe, consequently messiahship is inefficient, defective, deceptive, and degrading to all minds, churches, or any body corporate.

When the mighty hand of time shall sweep all traditions into the dust, as the folly and crime of mind perverted, then shall arise the beauties and strength of mind enlightened, and God's temple shall be in such mind, and all will acquiesce in one universal brotherhood, that will be appreciated on the principles of universal union.

Then churches, faiths, creeds, or sectarian clanships shall be no longer a shield for bad members.

Then society will be on the right basis, and God's blessings will be aroused in a more sacred cause.

Then the necessity for all secret societies will be dispensed with, and the great objection to all such having a malign influence of some popular members oppressing others, and interfering in some of the social relations.

Then crimes will be punished as they deserve, and universal society cloaks will be stripped off as unworthy mantles before the majesty and honesty of mind, that leads man to his God.

Then the sophistry that a school-boy can detect, of God's character not being recognised by his works alone, will be silenced effectually, whether coming from open atheists or those in the disguise of any kind of polytheism or priestocracy.

Then the base impositions and abuses of God's works, dwarfed into a bible of tradition, under the false pretence of sacred character, will be exposed as ignominious acts of degraded men.

Then the thousands of disreputable people of all nations, that have never sworn the truth on the bible in a Court of Justice when it was not their interest to do so, will learn another code, to speak the truth from their infancy, and affirm it, not swear to it, in their manhood. He who speaks the truth will do so without a bible. He who is perjured in conscience will not speak the truth if to be compelled by bibles.

Then we shall see the difference of a wise education, that teaches mind its first lesson, that of truth, and that gives it its last blessing on this earth from the truth.

Then the ignoble distinction that engenders sectarian differences of reaching the truth, whether on a cross or on a bible, will be swept away, as swearing of any kind is worthless and degrading, but that affirmation is truthful, endurable, and consistent, because it rests on the only principle, a sure foundation, a right tuition from the mother's breast!

Intelligent citizens whose age and observation entitle them to due consideration, speak the sentiments of many, that more than a majority of the christian church members join for sinister motives; while other citizens, high in the estimation of their circle, speak the opinions of many when they say, such very people are these that they have to be watched most above all others.

Due credit must be given to all worthy people in or out of churches or peculiar faiths, according to their motives, as proved by their deeds, not professions; the only true estimate, actions.

Let none complain if there be hypocrites in their church, the sooner they are exposed the better, as stumbling blocks. But the sooner the fundamental position is corrected that makes hypocrites, the better.

We do not complain that there are hypocrites and evil doers in all churches, as they are more or less abundant; they would be greater, did not the light and lustre and worth of mind guard them so well; but that the only position is not secured that makes the least.

But all churchmen will find it impossible, under a peculiar faith, to have any other than those of peculiar motives.

As long as the system of peculiar faith is sustained by trade and speculation, the highest bidding for hypocrisy will be made, unfortunately for the race of mankind.

What will not absolutism do, under all her disguises? Now the issue should not be left open at the mercy of the elements, when all liable to injury have immortal minds, that should not be thus perverted and necessarily corrupted.

Romanism has sought to prostitute principles to its peculiar purposes, but corruption drove to secession and Protestantism, that has itself been subsidized into state-churchship and all the various secessions.

All these have been distinguished in the annals of persecution, hatred or ill-will.

There can be but one catholic church, that must recognise God as its head, and all members as equal, no more.

There can be no aristocracy of power therein, for corruption will follow necessarily otherwise.

The errors of churches otherwise ordained have been so open, that all that open their eyes cannot mistake the signs.

But the fundamental error creates all the difficulties, as the door is wide open for future errors, from the doctrines, precepts, maxims and practices of peculiar faith.

In our time, new sects have arisen with all their novelty and fiction, but the Mormon faith is only a branch of the old superstition.

A previous branch was Mahommedan faith.

Upon what tribunal but that of mind will you put down all peculiar faiths?

Then you must, as good citizens, adopt rational religion.

The Mormons are as good as any peculiar faith, no Christian faith or sect at all excepted, if they use the same light of mind and all its proper teachings.

But this reformation is not adequate to the demands of mind and civilization. Nothing short of conservative revolution can rescue out of all such quagmires.

To get rid of all other peculiar faiths you must first get rid of all yours. You need not hesitate, for you only lay aside the trammels of superstition.

And, patriots, are you not most vitally interested?

The Mormons may vanquish the regular churchmen, standing for centuries before, on doctrinal and biblical arguments, to their greatest triumph.

The older churches cannot object to the Mormon platform, as all stand equal on fiction!

How is this, men of truth and mind?

All look upon the Mormons as impostors, who pretend to have found a new bible and golden plates!

A plagiary from the novel of some preacher!

A preacher a novel writer! Are not all preachers in this category? Is not every sermon a novel, if connected with any bible of tradition?

In Mormonism it is only a little plainer that thousands are deceived or deceive themselves, if not others.

Had it existed thousands of years past, and had commenced by improvements in mind and morals, testified to by assumed authority of pretended saints, affecting miracles and revelations, it had been reverenced much of the world over.

Now, people in these latter days may begin to see the curses and fruits of superstition.

Wars and conflicts have arisen therefor, and the advocates of this peculiar faith have been driven from several states, one after another, and finally to Utah, where they seek to emerge from a new and distinct territory, with all the functions of government and their faith.

Now, church people, you see only Mormonism, one of the errors—and you have it in power to arrest your part of it.

Touch not the impurity of peculiar faith; for you cannot tell whither it will lead. You can only head it by monotheism.

Pity it is that we had not had conservative revolution for reformation, for then all such impositions drive us back irresistibly to mind, as having the best data, and that recognises all rights, human and divine, through reason. Reason is then, the divine attribute of rational religion. Without reason, no such thing as religion can exist, the miserable opinion about faith, by botches, to the contrary notwithstanding. The interested tinkers are not able to analyze the truth.

We would have the beauty of their curse, in this our age, if the Mormons were equal to half of the people of America. This country would have to take war, or adopt their superstition more extensively.

What if the various hierarchies of peculiar faith had the mastery of the world now, what but the dark and dismal days of superstition would be the result? Let any one get the supreme ascendancy of the world, and farewell liberty of mind, as well as its light; even the proper and necessary benefits of toleration would be abolished, and the most horrible of all tyrannies would be repeated the world over. World-patriots arouse, for your present and future safety.

Let not the church sectarian lay any flattering unction to his soul, as he ever stands on slippery ground. It is his highest and best interest to correct the miserable state of things, in peculiar alias false faith.

The great object of religion is not to alienate, but be enlightened, or enlighten beforehand friends to be made, not foemen worthy of the steel, to be slaughtered and butchered.

All rational beings must accord to all the worthy people of the world, who have adopted their faith about religion, the sincere intentions to save their souls, knowing as we do many church and pulpit members to be most worthy members of society, as now directed by mind.

How could they otherwise be by this universal standard, at this age, with their organization and education?

Their peculiar faith proves nothing at all—no addition to the benefits of such society. They may expect that their church professions prove it? But not at all.

They love the brethren, but hate the other sects?

If not, why attack sects then, and say all the things said?

We cannot refuse the sectarians, however mistaken, their claim for their faith, but we must say that peculiar faith has no peculiar claim; that all rational minds must see.

How often is the same church at loggerheads, and split into several factious divisions? All had better quit then. What is a church? Is it anything of mind, then it is at once what is rational religion, so far as that mind is rationally free, otherwise it is vassal; hence the interminable difficulties and squabbles, and consequent demoralizations. All these are not the fourth of mind, only as it is perverted by peculiar notions.

But the feeling is taken for the evidence of religion. That will not answer. What church factions and squabbles, showing that one party have no principles. Cases of accusation about unchastity may occur, and the most partisan views are advanced, to promote vice as well as doctrines.

When the fact is affirmed that a church member of standing is converted to the Mormon faith, and stated that she never had before any religion, this thing of feeling is no test, but self-delusion and fallacy.

When many converts of all churches fall back, and have to be converted over again, then the world can put its own estimates on all such.

When long standing church members fall, and fall disgracefully, the whole question is yielded that all such systems only fail, as others analogous fail before them. All must fail.

But church organization embraces trade and speculation, that are hardly expedient in God-given religion.

The tithes of the people are better appropriated to the best light of mind, and would go far to the civilization of the world.

What expenses of religion could there be if the experience rest, as it should, with the possessor, who is the professor before his God?

Honesty and truth, the foundation of purpose, would never show any half way designs.

Youth would not be committed about creeds, but would prove her sincerity in acts from generous impulses of religion.

Many church members deceive under the broad mantle of profession. Never should there be credence for aught but good works and upright behavior, based on pure religion, that is rational.

Correct views are to be estimated forever, in language that gives due weight and appreciation of man's actions.

We must arrest the facility to vice and perjury, that is too common.

The members of churches are members of the human family, no better, no worse than most of that family in similar circumstances; but it is a miserable policy to have abuses in the world that can be corrected, and to have them aliens from unity universal.

The church emoluments are an incumbrance upon the face of the earth, and an evil of corruption to freedom and equity of the people.

Mind should duly estimate those affairs that bring so much reproach upon the churches, as adultery, seduction, fornication, &c., whether by ministers or lay members.

If, then, all church members are as amenable as human nature like the world, what can protect better than conservative principles rationally avowed and adopted?

As no one but God can know of another's religion by profession, whether the individual seeks membership by design or purely, and in the first case acting the hypocrite, the worst of characters, we have to take him or her by their conduct for life, not their profession, consequently the system of reception on experience of feelings must be utterly fallacious.

All must be truthful and honest, otherwise they cannot be religious, for truth and honesty are the foundation attributes of religion that requires humanity and other virtues.

How, then, can we know of religious feeling but by conduct?

Some churches initiate members on personal experience, and declare them religious; but if the members do not act uprightly they are excluded as defaulting.

As their church advocates the doctrine that converts cannot fall from grace, these members are considered never to have had religion! Peculiar faith has, then, no test at all.

The advocates admit persons as fit members on their assertion and profession of faith, and then exclude them as never having possessed the very essentials of admission! Here is a total failure of peculiar faith and its pretences.

It reduces itself to probation in or out of church, which probation excludes very many.

Some leave in process of time, believing that they never possessed religion; others are expelled for various unmemberlike conduct.

Many of the balance, more fortunate, are not turned out till found out.

Of course, then, they are not indebted to church membership, but the principles of God evinced by rational religion.

This all proves that religion should be between man and God.

Now, if church members of the various sects and systems, to an extraordinary extent and number, have no sincerity in their profession, but by profession from policy have joined from various impure motives and designs, as increase of influence, of power, money, self-interest, matrimony, combination, clanship, collusion, the sooner such a state of things is exposed the better. All societies that interfere with social principles are nuisances.

The pure who have joined for pure motives will certainly see the necessity for looking to a purer source than man's foul designs, that all perish.

They will feel the harm it does to have a Christ instead of a God; an usurper instead of the Proprietor. The present-day papers show a spirit of proselytism to or from papists and protestants, yet all will not avail against the final decay of peculiar faith, protestant or Romanist.

Look at the tithes of state churches, their gorgeous incomes and the pretences of their priests.

Some of the churches have arrested this in part.

What deadly hate and rancorous animosity prevail among different sectarian churches, even of the same country.

The mutual scandal will hasten their death-blow.

The exile of the pope of Rome showed the feelings of the people, who ought to know best, though excommunicated by their pope!

Which is the true, the infallible, the orthodox church? None. Rational religion can tell the balance. What would it avail the world, if we were to seek only to reform the faults of the protestants, or the vices of the Romanists, and not to revolutionize for the true adoration of the everliving God?

As to the length of time the Romanists have been in existence, for eighteen centuries, we see pagans have existed thousands of years before their commencement, and are not overthrown by Romanism.

Judaism, the parent, and Mahommedanism, another offspring, still pursue their course.

How can one superstition triumph over another?

Here rises the youngest born, Mormonism, as good as the best, if she conform as well to outward appearances.

Polytheism, in some form or other of idolatry, is still before the world in its disgusting characters.

The penitent is in a troubled state of mind. His anxious state of inquiry is met by those who have been over the ground. As preachers, of course they must speak the truth, for who does suppose that "divines" stretch their conscience? The mediators are at hand, whereby the penitent can only be saved. He is not able to investigate, in his new-born zeal, and must act as told by custom, interest, influence of the peculiar predominant faith. What despot ever made greater vassalage of mind? The church-gospel is unquestionable, and the authority of its expounders is dictatorial for the poor neophyte. He is duped at first, and of course must be consistent in his inconsistent and untenable position of faith. Where would be the world but for Deity, where else but in chaos and confusion?

All feelings about church-faith may be perfect illusions, as we may see at times of revival, when, out of fifty thinking themselves converted, hardly one-fifth persevere in that conscientious belief?

And of these, how many are really the religious? Have they started with the first correct point? Is their position not the farthest distant from religion? For, if God be considered the Creator, as no sound mind can dare deny, he has provided universal means of the best happiness, and that thousands of years before a pretended messiah was ever thought of.

The priests and preachers affect to know all about it, as it is their profession; but this is all false pretence, necessarily of the worst character, to mislead mind and gull the people. They are the most ignorant analysts of the whole world—a disgrace to mind.

Because some have been members of churches, they think they ought to know all about their peculiar faith, of no account to the world.

But they have been under self-delusion. There can be no such thing as church-faith, from the nature of things. There is church-faith enough that is peculiar, and to spare, and all that is man's, certainly, opinions.

What and who are church-members, if they be not as the best circles of civilization guided by social benefits? How often is it, that church-members show no compunction of conscience, hardened in guilt, and steeped in iniquity?

What hold can the world have on such portion of men in payment of their debts, if destitute apparently of property, if, above laws made for debtors, they are below honor?

Sectarians say they know they have a saving faith, because they love the brethren. What brethren? Those of the same church? The stumbling-blocks and all? But what do they mean, when they hate those of other sects? "When they would not stay in a church, only a few years over a century old"?

If time be the criterion, then they must go to the oldest, though the most corrupt in peculiar faith.

If protestant, they hate the Romanist with a bitter hate, for that has perpetrated horrible wars in protestantism.

If they truly seek the most ancient and trust-worthy, they must seek rational religion. The world, then, is only on the safe side surely, when it seeks the great ever-living God, Creator of the universe, whose soul expands and sympathizes throughout creation. If we adopt God, as necessarily sound minds must, we must adopt his universal works that require universal, not peculiar laws.

Again, we recognise in all other matters, the highest kind of best evidence of sense and science, but in faith, that is the highest attainment, a blind superstitious belief is to be foisted on the intelligent minds of freemen, who are not to be deceived out of one living God of justice and mercy, by any of the frauds or frailties of poor human nature.

Should they be defrauded, or scared out of their life-rights? All virtuous, high-minded, and honorable citizens will ever seek to protect the society of the world, to keep people from being hypocrites.

They must have them all judged properly on principles of sense, honor, and honesty, not by professions, but by deeds that speak.

None of God's principles can permit hypocrisy, therefore the means that lead to that result by temptation, are to be excluded.

No pure men can tolerate any speculative priestcraft, or preacher-craft, that results in that.

Hierarchy is a petty monarchy, the most tyrannical government without soul, as it is without sympathy, basely hypocritical and criminal, especially with inquisition,—intolerance, a most hideous tyrant.

With all the boasts of church-laudation and priests' pretences, for their centuries, we see yet how deplorable and sad the condition of the world, only to be improved by mind directed in her best efforts.

Feeling has been pretended as a means, the spirit of God witnessing with the spirit of man, but all this, if peculiar faith, has been a failure in churches, and proves nothing.

All that is addressed to man, is through rational mind, by a perfect not peculiar God.

Are not the rich and influential persons pre-eminently sought for, by the ministry? Is this religion?

How shall we estimate the customs of churches as essential, when some shout, others do not?

Some shout at church, join as members, and then leave the membership.

How far is this all from self-delusion, mere excitement, or enthusiasm aroused by sympathy?

How far does this theatrical representation, by shouting, avail in rational religion?

What has it to do with God's religion?

Why should it prevail, when at revivals the preachers tell the shouters to stop, the noise generally soon ceases.

Youth is generally taught to look at much of this as the only safety, and it becomes a part of their education, and at last they assume it as an indispensable matter.

Others, through sympathy of relationship or feeling, join them, and even men of minds, that ought to know better, shout.

Who will admire the locomotive worship of the Shakers and Jerkers, as essential to any but their peculiar doctrines?

Predestination is pitted against the free agency of mind, and then we see the antagonism of sectarianism in the last or in both, as the advocates narrow it down to their peculiar notions, and in the way the first is used, it does away with the responsibility of mind.

God's spirit bears witness with man's spirit, that is God's inspiration, is the only one on mind all the time, and all others are excluded.

When did God's cease? To say that God's spirit or inspiration is not with man's spirit, is a horrible libel on Deity.

O, but as you have never been in our particular church, you have not our particular spirit! As if there could be more than one in God's universe, and of course not his. This is part of the quintessence of church sophistry.

Every nation of old had its particular gods, that, in their opinion, were better than the gods of other nations.

Now, the churches have—well, we submit this case to respectable people, who had been members of a church, claiming free agency of mind, but who become Mormons, and declared that they had never known what religion was before that feeling!

Did they have religion then? Who believes it? Feeling cannot prove it, except with the principles of God, that prove it completely, and satisfactorily.

The sense of the soul is not by feeling, but by mind, that has the universe to analyze, but has been most cowardly deserted for the most miserable false pretences.

Church membership cannot create anything essential, that is not in the universal principles of God.

Messiahs and their ministers, may pretend to monopolize for a time, but their pretences are false, and will fail.

Religion, the advocates of peculiar church faith, assume must be spiritualized, or taken in a spiritual sense.

Do we know what we believe? If we do not, but intrust ourselves in the power of suspicious and badly-raised characters, we are in the chains of absolutism.

As to churches, it matters not, as to age or creeds, since sectarians need not contend about either, as all is peculiar faith. Triflers will contend about trifles.

The divisions are abundant, and the contentions will continue to demoralize on their basis.

Rationality, the best essence of mind's functions, does not seek churches to hear of Christ, but hear all proper principles of God, who governs men's best actions.

But "that change of heart" is to be effected.

What is that, but the proper effect of the light, previously existent of Deity in the mind and soul?

It must be the mind and soul, and not the mere heart, a mere blood-organ, that is represented.

But the natural man cannot see; it is the spiritual!

The mind of every man that is rational, recognises things, rational or spiritual, on this sphere.

No obstruction that is valid, can be raised by bible sophistry, that is derogatory to reason.

It does not become an authority, not yet established on rational proof, after all its pretences, to dictate instruction to mind, its superior.

If man were all spirit, it might do to talk of the spiritual man, but his is a mixed state, spiritual and physical, corporeal and mental.

The Spirit of God that pervades all space, operates on mind. Whence conscience otherwise?

The purer the conscience, the brighter the light and deeper the inspiration.

In great excitements about religious revivals, the animal feelings may be deeply aroused by fear and other kindred passions, that move speedily to superstition.

When cooled down, the individual experiences a change in his feelings, but of what kind?

This may be a speedy education, and that depends on the circumstances among what peculiar faith people he happens to be.

He joins himself with what he is taught is the house of God, and acts to his appreciation of duty that may lead to the future reward.

All that are intelligent and honest in or out of churches, know that there are many base people of the world, in or out of churches, with no honesty that adorns all good institutions, above all things, names at least. Then church-faith is a non-entity, and cannot have any existence at all.

What men are despite of church-faith, they can be much better without it, putting all the best at the best appreciation.

Peculiar faith revivals show sometimes forty or forty-five out of fifty, return back to their original position.

All such are mere excitements, and yet all the forty-five had religion purer before the revival. Did they know this?

The five left are retained on mere peculiar considerations, evidently so, but the balance are preserved on the best principles of rational religion, whose inherent elements they can never eradicate.

Sectarianism cannot be religion, for it hates and wars, as its name proves, on the brethren.

Do the brawls and fights of church factions, of whole churches affecting to be leaders of light and peace especially, their splits, divisions and subdivisions, prove less than the inability of all such polity reaching the essential point, a proper brotherhood? All such have not the very first principles of right. The people see all this, do they properly heed and correct all such? Rational religion can eradicate all this, certainly. But cannot church membership and meetings do some good?

The meeting of the sexes and of all classes of genteel society, on the Sabbath, produces a state of civilization of itself, high-mindedness and sentiments.

The messiahship thus promotes the improvement of social virtues, when rightly put to account. All this is enjoined by monotheism, the only promoter of civilization.

How often have some been deceived by members of churches, in payments and settlements of money? Does church membership make any preachers or members any better? Freer from violation of promises? We should estimate the numerous schools of the world that influence mind, that is independently good, despite of church influences?

What creed of responsibility and restitution, like the certain punishment for crimes and sins, will deter some? Do we get that from churches, or their founders?

None but that founded on the best appreciation of principles, can be obtained.

Do principles belong to God, or messiahs? All sound minds will admit, to God alone.

What then can messiahs do? Where is their employment? In churches? Mind if cultivated in principles, can find no manner of use whatever, with them, their antagonists—away, then, with the imposition.

A proper knowledge of the world and man, gives us the best insight into duty and science; such will show us that most affect more than is real.

Many amusements of innocent character have been precluded by creed abiding persons, as they think that they are required to act with an eye single to God's glory, but in peculiar ways.

But such must recollect that in promoting the true physiological principles, all do that in a universal way, the only proper one.

Now where monotony and dullness can be well relieved, where actions are seen teaching wisdom, arousing exhilarating spirits and feelings, an important part is obtained even to drive hypochondria away.

God does not know sectarianism, as that is anti-god, hence a reformation of reformation, a constitutional conservative revolution is needed.

Why should members of different churches fall out about apparently mere business transactions, that ought to be settled by a court of conciliation?

Even members of the same church, of several denominations, including the most peaceful, fall out and fight each other, in respect, too, to their own church matters! Correct principles of mind can do better.

Ask one of peculiar faith how he knows he is a christian, and he replies, because he loves the brethren.

But they are brethren who believe in the same messiah, and yet sectarianism cuts down this test at once! For do they love other church members? All the world, with all its various peculiar faith doctrines, are brethren, disjunct because they believe not in the same God of the universe. How can sectarianism abjure all its prophets and messiahs and peculiar machinery to reach the universal brotherhood?

They have to sacrifice all their pretences of superstition to reach the sacred precincts of rational religion, that can only induct them to the right position. They must doff all the machinery of peculiar faith to reach rational faith.

Whoever is of rational faith, and all the world must be to be right, must be of a universal brotherhood.

In what respect can any faith exist that conflicts with our views of rational religion, that inculcates the divine grace of the God of the universe by inspiration of mind, and the very best lights to cultivate, cherish, and adorn it in full?

How many Jews and Gentiles convert themselves for the temporal rewards! Take away all the world-machinery of corruption.

How many ignorant and deluded people fall into the Mormon miracles, that would have filled volumes had not the present age been too intelligent from science and philosophy for them?

How many intelligent minds perverted by lucre, power, influence, passions of ambition, and various inducements, cater to the morbid taste of the customary fanaticism?

As it was with all the lights of the age hundreds of times better than the dark and bloody ages of antiquity, when at best the fewest could read, and less could write, how many poor minds prostituted themselves for want, to this superstitious order of people?

But this is a day when the people's mind, befriended by science and philosophy, can counteract the base efforts of priestocracy.

The more the intellect diminishes, or is less enlightened, the more feelings are displayed as a part of the exercises.

This proves that the less rational the less religious.

Shouting, of course, must be indulged in as the blessings are felt, for with some this is the only best evidence of God's grace shed abroad in the soul.

But mind, the only beneficiary, conclusively proves that the feelings are utterly deceptive, and that reason alone can decide on facts, to which alone imposition can demur.

But the advocates of peculiar faith doctrines affect to object at the impotency of reason reaching a God's appreciation, and the proper means of man's salvation, without the gospel dispensation.

They have absurdly regarded the impotent conclusions of sophists of ignorant ages, when their own ignorant dispensation was assumed for mind, and its purest blessings, reason.

They have not analyzed the paramount question, not understanding its splendid principles, nor its glorious results, all the time dwarfing mind to all the vain circles of their narrow bigotry.

They must begin rightly to do justice to God and mind.

We need take but one simple proposition thereon, in which all mankind are most concerned.

What are the guarantees of best societies? Are church ethics? The ethics of any church that has not the very first elements of true faith, truth, and honesty, the proper award to the God of the universe, who fills all space, all the inherent attributes of omnipresence, that by all the principles of mind excludes all messiahs? What other guarantee can meet the world's demands but rational religion?

The science of all sciences, the philosophy of all philosophies, rational religion, that necessarily makes the best of good citizens, who look at the sincere good of the many.

In rational religion there can be no hypocrisy, no deception, for speculation is not a part of her trade.

Her purest motives are above suspicion, and beyond envy.

Her advocates are the pure adorers of God, a perfect and pure being, who needs no advocacy but pure reason.

She looketh to the universe for her residence, and to immortality for her home.

They now see that it little avails to have a church faith, that produces stumbling-blocks in and out of the same.

They see that a wise institution of general principles, is what God intended.

The censorship of the inquisition will pauperize its faith, ere it ever enrich the world with any religion.

Madeira may drive out her poor exiles, and torture her worthy citizens by persecution for reading the bible, till the day of retribution, not to be very long deferred.

What, peculiar faithites afraid to trust the word of their peculiar god to the light of truth?

What a stigma on her name and character!

Who that visits the scenes and dungeons of the inquisitions, can otherwise than execrate these horrors of iniquity and superstition!

When will civilization, religion, and truth, assume the mastery of this world?

The answer can be given, when intelligent freemen act up to the analysis of the case. No other position answers.

Who rule out that bible? Reason and mind, the gifts of the universal God. Here is an awful clash: the peculiar is done.

Some of both sexes join the church and seem above suspicion, after a life of prostitution, fornication, adultery, murder, &c. It is well, if this be not during the continued perpetration of such crimes.

Reformation of errors, vices, and crimes, is essential, but exemption the most of all in moral deportment is worthy of God's attention and reward.

All that enjoy the right benefits of a good liberal education, received at the proper and right time, and way from parents and society, cannot do less than exhibit a sound, natural, ripe, and honest judgment, that is one of the superior faculties of the mind along with conscientiousness, that characterize the man so eminently.

A zealous member of a church admits that persons of ignorance and small minds, knew but little of moral and christian obligations, as most of such members proved their incompetency for religious appreciation from intellectual weakness.

This concedes the question that peculiar faith has impracticable difficulties, whereas rational faith addresses all rational beings, the uncivilized as the philosopher, and is received with facility by the universal mind of rational beings.

After the triumphant testimony advanced, of the capacity of mind for rational religion, from the improvement of which it has been perverted by all varieties of peculiar faith, of priestocracy, deeply interested in its monopoly and usurpation over the rights and minds of the people, we now refer to one more sect, "the Druids, who were the priests or ministers of religion, (so called) among the ancient Gauls, Britons, and Germans. The honors of their birth, &c., procured them the highest veneration of the people, as the interpreters of religion, and the judges of all affairs indifferently.

Whoever refused obedience to them, was declared impious and accursed. They were the priests, poets, augurs, civil judges, and instructors of youth.

Their high priest had absolute authority over the rest, and commanded, decreed, and punished, at pleasure.

The Druids believed the immortality of the soul, and worshipped the Supreme Being, who made his abode in the sacred groves of the oak, governed the universe," &c., according to the acknowledgment of "their religion."—Buck.

These people were as much the chosen people of God as the Jews. Who can pretend to dispute this opinion?

They worshipped the God of the universe, that none of peculiar faith now can surpass. That is certain.

Religion has been constituted a matter of rites and ceremonies by all of peculiar faith. The Druids consecrated the misletoe as "the peculiar gift of heaven."

Rational religion sublimely consecrates the mind, as the sacred gift of the omniscient Almighty, and only thus enables it to reach its immortal fruition.

That mind is not to be misled by enthusiasm of feeling, but must be enlightened by the potency of reason.

In the chief priest of the Druids, we ask, what more fearful power could exist, than the union in the same person of priestocracy and civil government? Who could withstand that powerful influence, of temporal tyranny and spiritual superstition? But these were pagans! Who are the best of others? Christians. What is the difference, before the God of the universe?

The one consecrated the misletoe, the others consecrate a mortal for a God! The last exclude the first by aid of the martial power of Rome, that had the imperial sway. It was the power of the sword then that gave the mastery; now it is the insidious power of sophistry, superstition, and social despotism.

Imperial power of absolutism adopted Christianity over the Roman rites of augurs and soothsayers; the various sects of the world then as now contending for supremacy of mind's vassalage.

The four great sects of the world, the Christians, Mahometans, Jews and Pagans, with the hosts of minor sects, are hostile, with deadly hatred and animosity against each other; yet all are analogous, and in the same category.

Their world has lost sight of mind, that is the eye of the universe, and that must take cognizance of all things therein, either now or hereafter, in time and eternity, with a full and proper employment of all its resources.

These sects, the world, must reverence deity alone, do duty to man in all parts of the earth, and mind in its true analysis.

These sects, all, cannot ever absolve themselves from the least of these universal duties, as mind is the bright particular creation of the God of the universe, must have his best particular care, and may be thereby entitled to his particular preservation, for future improvement, leaving but little more than the elements of its ignorance behind it, in this world.

Never, then, can there be any peculiar people or mind, when the creation and purposes of mind are universal.

This cuts down dead, forever, the pretence that the God of Nature ever had any peculiar chosen people.

The god of Judaism was necessarily a peculiar god, whom it is essential that intellectual freemen should never know, as he is degradedly abominable.

The peculiar gods of the world, ancient or modern, are the creatures of creatures of the God of the universe!

How unspeakably magnificent, then, must be the majesty of the universe's Almighty!

His immutable laws demand the duty of man to man, and God, involving universal love, fidelity, and purity.

Where, then, is sectarianism, in its duties?

The polar star for all on this earth is "the greatest good to the greatest number."

Corrupt society, under its present organization, has reversed this memento.

Peculiar motives originated all peculiar faith, whilst universal principles caused religious faith.

The more ignorant the ancients, the more peculiar their gods and their character, the more peculiar their faith. All polytheisms have peculiar faith.

All honest minded wise men can never be convinced that it is indispensable to be in a church to have their souls saved. Not at all. They can never see the utility, much less the necessity of putting society into clans, and promoting individual views and interests, at the expense of demoralization, whilst the whole nation, the whole world, demands mind's universal assistance and rights.

The peculiar faith that calls for social organizations distinct from the world, has not rational religion.

Those of philosophical science wish to see religion's benefits as universal as the world, and know that universal principles alone secure its execution.

The primary principles of religion were implanted in every rational mind at first and cannot be superseded, therefore all others coming after are pretensions as they are after the time and necessity of the case.

Many persons are taken in on probation and trial, in church-government. The church endorses members, but who endorses the church?

The necessity is proved to be direct and absolute, when we come to observe the fearful state about oaths, that result with facility in perjury.

In or out of church, this state of things prevails.

We can easily find members of one church, speak of the perjury of their own church members!

What horrible iniquity is otherwise practiced by admission of peculiar faith-worship by sects, that arise every age or so, a false branch on false stock.

Sectarianism cannot come up to its promises, the wants and expectation of the world, but religion can as designed by the Almighty.

Take fanatics or moderately educated persons, and shouting can be secured in churches. Is enthusiasm rational religion?

The Jerkers will show muscular contortions, the Shakers dancing, and the Mormons may exhibit a delphic prophecy or oracle, unknown tongues!

What has all this to do with religion?

Will any honest man in church or out of it in the world, ask for faith in any thing without sound logic.

What are all claims of sanctification, regeneration, and justification, but sinless perfection, and therefore arrogant? Rational religion upholds reasonable views identified with earth, and forbids any set seals of demarcation except for conduct.

No peculiar faith can be other than presumptuous, to affect any lives growing out of faith. God alone can decide, in mind's purity and merits.

What mind is there not sinful, or what mortal can live without sin? Consequently all that arrogate the title of saint or holy one, increase their sin.

Where would you look for the greatest and best characters? In any church? No more than elsewhere. We must try all men on earth covered with breast-plates of honors, only by their actions in the case. The full science in all the schools of human nature in the world, warrants nothing on trust or granted, but all on trial in all professions church or not. As life is a continued trial ordained by God, let not vain man presume to define it different.

His is the part of humility at the fount of philosophical science to learn, not dictate, much less affect the world with false delusions.

There can be no saint, as there is no perfection.

There can be no sanctification, from the real nature of mind. Hypocrisy would take precedence, if pretended. What produces so much corruption in the churches directly professing these things of virtue, yet most obedient to the deepest degradations of vices as lust, avarice, violations of truth?

It is the sin of hypocrisy that degrades all churches of peculiar faith, and proves most conclusively, that no system of peculiar faith can come up to the requirements of mere fancy or peculiarity.

With all its prepossessions of prejudices, what rational mind could now desire any established church or clergy, as all such are dangerous to individnal and national liberty?

Wherever it is established, absolutism is rendered more severe.

Who had greater power than the patriarchs of ancient times, in civil government, domestic policy, and peculiar faith? They had the offices of priest, king and prophet, that gave unlimited sway over the lives and liberties, the persons and property of their subjects. What could rational mind do, with such an avalanche of despotism?

All the nations of antiquity were under analogous dynasties. The most civilized, as Greece and Rome, had their state and faith policies. What now, is the case in the world?

The koran is the imperial code, that governs nearly one-seventh of mankind in law and faith.

The druids were the autocrat sovereigns of a great part of Western Europe, being their priests and judges, and these were prototypes of the papal supremacy.

Who have borne greater sway over one hundred and forty millions of Hindoos than their priests? And what enslaves and reconciles the mind to all despotisms worse?

In China, the emperor is sovereign pontiff. Under such regimes of mind-vassalage, most of the world is unfit for liberty.

The Incas of Peru, it is said, claim that the ancient faith is still preserved, and its rites are still celebrated in secret, even amid the apparent devotion of the Indians to the worship of their foreign masters.

They have their ancient prophecy and mysterious lore, to the confusion of the assertors that the Christian faith has excluded all others where it has taken hold. Power is the same all over the world, and assumes all the pretences to advance its usurpation. In no department can an exception be made, for the greater the sphere, the greater the exertions and the corruption to uphold it.

Who could be a partisan, on the principles of justice? Inaction in all instances would be preferable.

A higher order of rational mind forbids the union of church and state, in order to put down the potency of both tyrannies, that effectually filch from the people millions of money and treasure, lives, and all that life is worth.

Let the anathemas of such corrupt dynasties of superstition thunder, what rational mind cares?

With money, and its concomitant power, enough, people enough can be found by the thousand, whose minds are perverted, to perjure themselves for all crime and corruptions in church and state, to oppress or deceive man.

Why did the Romanists take away the bible from the laity or people? Why exclude their flocks from the use of protestant bibles? Because mind could see the entire falsity of such a work.

Why do all sectarians exclude the people from the bible of mind, the free and rational discussion of the subject? Even people of mature age, not in the church, are so ignorant of all this principle, that if you talk of excluding all this corruption, they will expect to drop into perdition right off! Was there ever worse superstition? The old women and children will crouch before her dogmas and despotism.

The mere singing and shouting are acts of the mind, that avail nothing unless accompanied by the solid and substantial sincerity and honesty of mind.

In peculiar faith pretences the adherents assume a standard, and seek to tyrannize over all others, to whom they dictate by the standard of their assumption.

It is not only absurd but criminal to be merely taught any faith or belief.

As to the "love of the brethren," if that love be not as comprehensive as mankind and the globe, it is partial, sectional, peculiar and sectarian, and subverts God's attributes of universality and general love.

But the church may offer some protection better than the world? What fallacy!

Those in the church may commit many errors that lead it to crimes. Why add church and faith-crimes to life's sins?

Innocence of those out of the church is preferable to error in the church.

One church sect affects to act, as if it thought all the rest of the world would go to perdition without any redemption at all, surely.

What miserable envy prevails among sects.

What kind of a world would they make it, if they had their way? It would be thus unmade in a short time.

If the Calvinists, those who say that a certain number was predestinated from eternity, was to be exclusively saved, were to preach this doctrine, the articles of their faith and creed, they would have but very few to hear them, as where would be the reason, seeing that all the balance were to be damned?

This savors of doctrines that make priests indispensable to the performance of various rites, as funerals, &c.

Now we see the schools of different sects, possessed of jealousy and opposition to each other.

Parents will not send to each other's schools, if possible to prevent it, and this rivalry runs through all their business transactions.

Sectarianism is bad enough, but hypocrisy is the worst of all characteristics, as the actor is prepared to do anything needed.

Now let the faith-pretensions be exempt from all this temptation, and we will even cut down hypocrisy.

Let there be no speculation in professions of faith, as the practice is with the conscience of the individual, and his God, and no more.

What has the world to do with a man's religion, except that he conforms to rational conservation of society? Before the world, profession is mockery.

Before the God of Nature, religion is the highest and most sacred obligation.

As to orthodoxy, who can claim that in peculiar faith?

There it is a farce, when it is not a tragedy.

The Greek and Latin churches deny it to each other, and their Protestants, and the last repel the first as corrupt. The whole world of peculiar faith denies it to all not of their creed.

If all be in this fix surely neither can be right.

Rational religion affirms this. All such faith is positively in direct antagonism with her and God.

A republic, so called, caused her soldiers to butcher a sister republic for dismissing absolutism, and adopting a free faith feeling, independent of temporal power. This is the worst species of hypocrisy.

Rational religion asks for all that is legitimate, good and just. It certainly never can butcher individual, much less national liberty.

Toleration is not a boon, but freedom, bold, and independent.

Already, many a church has been split to pieces by internal elements of discord.

We see that some of the great churches of this union, of the very same persuasion, are now separated, and with bitter feelings of hostility. This has helped to foster disunion, a parricidal blow at our noble constitution.

But can we maintain our position, free from division of sentiment, when we advance the religion of civilization? Religion has no peculiar faith or divisions.

She organizes mind-institutions on a different basis.

How many corrupt people are received into the church? What good will they effect?

All this is worthy of the deepest investigation.

If the God of Nature be for us, we have enough.

It will profit us naught if the world be with us, but God be not for us.

No church-institutions can be available, but through God alone. Who is infallible? God.

It is enough to make rationality excited, to see the degraded tyranny of hierarchies, whose heads assume God's privilege, infallibility.

What stay deity's electricity, but his universal principles that vindicate him?

None can be free till they discard all such sectarianism and peculiar faith.

Who is a bigot, but a base charlatan and slave, that seeks to crush every noble principle of mind?

Who shall be punished by fallible mortals for rejection of peculiar creeds, that have involved the world in moral, intellectual and social darkness and misery?

The infallible God of nature has given plain facts and laws to the point. Who can mistake them?

It is the height of folly for any to talk of sanctification on this earth, as there cannot possibly be any one not sinning in thought, word or deed. To sin the least, is the best security for mind in this life. This is religion that constitutes the most exalted actions, according to light and knowledge.

Why should there be any intervention, national or individual, to assault the independence of mind of a republic or the world, in any faith that is between conscience and its Creator?

Can any but blasphemy prompt all governments or faith advocates to any such?

The triumph over such people and hierarchies employed in such base acts and intriguing designs, is their shame and disgrace before the best benefits that they seek to destroy.

Truth will scatter all such, to their confusion and ignominy.

What shall insure confidence in the world's community, as we see all professions fail?

Hold all perfectly accountable for their conduct, and answerable for their actions at all times.

It is strange that those of unsound mind are exempt from responsibility for lack or defect of mind, yet rational men are free from penalty for superstition at the tribunal of man, who affects to advocate rational principles.

Bad governments with assumed powers and union of tyranny, depress the people to their downfall, but the blights of superstition are unnoted, till the people are degraded or rescued by the popular mind.

The great object of religion, is to stop sectarianism of all peculiar faiths. Freemen should know their highest duty. Has the christian or any other peculiar faith done it? Not at all. Then all such are not trustworthy.

The hatred of the Greek and Roman churches, is proverbial, no less than between them and their Protestant brethren, and no less so between all these, and the followers of Judaism. They despise the Jew, but take his bible. Yet prophecy is the sacrificial altar for all these iniquities, and that, God's word denies most positively. All such must be false prophecy for a messiah, for whom the Jews and the world have suffered awfully for centuries, by the loss of millions of people.

What distinguishes sectarianism above all others of the world? Love, they claim.

But hear the beloved sects preach, though all professing Christ.

They impeach all others, reviling or slurring them, thereby condemning themselves on the inherent elements of their own category.

This is a sore point, and no wonder that all the machinery of inquisitions and despotism have been employed to silence all but themselves.

The New Englanders were the scions of European persecution, yet they cruelly persecuted the Quakers, and through idolatry of the bible, they disgraced mind about witchcraft.

We have to judge all mankind by their deeds, not by professions of church, or any other than orthodox faith of rational mind, that looks to the unity of God, and his divine attributes.

None of the human family have exemption from frailties, in or out of churches. Church membership adds to them when it involves hypocrisy.

It is all sophistry and hypocrisy to pretend otherwise.

If any claim it they are all degraded impostors.

The improved age proves the necessity of looking to the right point of mind, and the true deed of God.

Does not the very existence of denominational strife decide a warfare base, degrading and unholy? Do you call this religion? So far from it, that it is its desecration.

All superstitions are an abomination before the Almighty; and all church impositions on men are base, no matter the pretence.

What is more obstinate than the prejudice of church bigotry?

It is self-willed, vaunteth itself, is proud, arrogant, and full of errors.

Modesty, then, pre-eminently becomes the sectarian, when the Greek is against the Roman church, and both are against their Protestants; the church-statesman is against the dissenter, and the last against the reformer, and all against religion.

All the religion that you can possibly have in purity, in or out of churches, you had at first by God's principles, that impeach all preachers who affect that it is obtained at their churches.

And if, then, they corrupt the fountain source, how can they ever carry out the noblest gift of things to mind, whose brightest ornament is thereby obtained? Church or no church faith, rational mind can only show the best actions as the best prayers.

Much is said about charity, but dignity of mind and soul, as man is constituted, will preserve the best charity in justice and benevolence, right actions.

Associations on rational religion may do good, but when we see the church squabbles and divisions among members, criminating and recriminating with all manner of accusations, some proving their unworthiness as to be discarded by their church-creeds, that make them hypocrites who never had improved rational religion, whilst others are discarded as falling from grace, a demoralization as the first change, then we are highly gratified at the decided triumph of mind vindicating itself before God.

Have not the christians by gross infatuation and crime, involved themselves in war for centuries with other grand divisions of peculiar faith, and with still greater butchery to their own sects, horribly perverting correct and good governments, and the blessings of social existence?

The church has been a part of the state, the machinery of absolutism; abolish one and the other falls.

The perversion of education, that makes most bigots of superstition, results from peculiar faith.

The very idea of members being in churches does not render them any better, but worse if they join with sinister views, and affect to be better than the world that is civilized. How can any be better?

People become bigots and narrow minded the moment they affect that any sectarian union is going to save them.

Will the whole church-world continue to conceal all the iniquities of peculiar faith, that helps not the excellence of the world?

Thus sectarian creeds cause inquisition over their fellow citizens.

Do any people thus governed need anything more than power to show their character?

The bloody statute of Henry VIII. that denounced death to any that should deny the doctrine of transubstantiation, or that auricular confession to a priest was not necessary to salvation, proves to us the absolutism and meanness of bigotry.

It is not church membership that does good to rational mind, but a whole soul-justice is needed for all the world in its comprehension, lofty and noble character. Every honest common-sense person can see at once how much imposition and fraud have been practised.

Let all good citizens draw the line of distinction between ignorance and imposition on one side, and science, with sincerity, on the other.

Every thinking mind has its own ideas about churches and their derelict members, their half-concealed crimes and meanness, unworthy of members, if not of churches, at least of society.

Then church membership comes far short of the universal good of society.

Investigation will show many stumbling-blocks in most churches, many dark clouds too, that would blush to see the light of God.

How many conspiracies are there in churches?

Do not drunkenness, lust and brawls invade the soul of too many preachers and laymen?

To usurp and feign the divine right of church-faith, superstition enacts all that is wonderful.

The statue of Jupiter was changed by false pretences, by some mysterious power, into that of Peter, at Rome, by one of the popes.

Its great toe is kissed by the Romanists. Is this religion?

Where does the ecclesiastical oppression, characterized by so many forms, stop!

Mind must act universally upon its own dignity.

In the inquisition at Rome, the book called the Solecetarione shows the government lately expelled made use of this tribunal, strictly ecclesiastical in its institution, also for temporal and political objects, and that the most culpable abuse was made of sacramental confession, especially that of women, rendering it subservient both to political purposes and the most abominable licentiousness. "By means of confession, the most odious licentiousness was insinuated in the confessionals."

Will the protestants stand on half-way ground of reformation, when the exposition proves the necessity of conservative revolution?

But is all this denied?

Then there is something wrong in the accusation, unworthy of rational religion.

In church and private life how much hostile enmity prevails between Romanists and protestants?

Ay, even among protestant churches?

"The presbytery and episcopacy are declared to be two opposites, as the presbyterian system involves error in fundamental doctrines." If it had been declared that all peculiar faiths were in this category, the truth had been told.

All peculiar faith does. Are the people asleep?

Who is infallible but God?

Is it any other than man-power that institutes a pagan superstition-worship, and calls it religion! That pretends to have as many mediators as there are angels in heaven, and saints in their calendar, with altars to the saints, and adoration of their images and relics! Purgatory, with masses, a speculation, is an abomination before God.

The order of universal brotherhood can organize suitable universal societies of general and public character, that may cause the universal good contemplated, with which all the peculiar societies are nothing in comparison.

Such are the world's societies, and no peculiar people or order, not even the peculiar people of God, could have assimilated the world, as all peculiarity in faith acts unworthy of the mighty comprehensions.

God's designs must be duly appreciated by mind to lead it to its true glory and power, through benevolence, humanity and liberal justice to the world. God's principles serve to unite all into one general mass, more or less, certainly not render them hostile and belligerant.

Assuredly mind's corruption through its perversion has spread many awful blights that the good and true citizens of the world must arrest.

There are general and world's sins—as the present universal idolatry, man-worship, money-worship, and guilt-worship.

The world, assuredly, has its scourges and penalties.

Who expects to see order and beauty of order, if the system of the worlds of the universe be disturbed?

Who, then, in the moral world of mind, can do less than preserve that equilibrium, that advances the full dignity and best perfection of mind?

The high tribunal of reason has cognizance of all mental things. She, in the best reference to herself, best holds the balance, for the world and mind.

But the word Catholic takes with some, who have not investigated this whole subject carefully and sincerely to their good, and the best, noblest interest of their country, but have adopted peculiar faith by force of a peculiar education.

But words are shadows, actions are substances.

Religion and constitutional government must accord, not clash. Catholicism and democracy are the property of the world-people, of none peculiar.

Then why did not the government of Rome accord with the rational faith, the popular catholic faith?

The citizens, as sovereign, with their rights as divine, had the only decision of that government, and established it on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number. Then this peculiar faith was hostile to mind's highest interest, dignity, and right.

Moreover, another so-called republic forced the people, by brute power, to nullify their government, which was protective of the rights of the people, for the power of the pope, the inglorious minority.

The world cannot have its eyes too open, its mind too erect.

Discuss this as a world-wide subject, and all peculiar reverence must bend to universal reverence, to God alone, as the only Catholic rational religion.

All others are usurpations and sophistries, bloody and despotic, a world's age.

What shall we say of him who adulterates ardent spirits, but that he was a base poisoner, and how much more shall we estimate those who poison common sense of mind?

But then Romanism is so extensive, the pope must be maintained.

The Roman is only the twin-sister of the Greek Church. Which is right? The Romanists are the most numerous, and the Roman pontiff was a greater sovereign.

That only proves the evil to be greater. But the Chinese peculiar faith exceeds that. The Chinese emperor is the high priest of his nation, that has nearly one-third of the world's population. Yet he worships his heaven, and sacrifices to it, with incense and victims.

The emperor-priest is worshipped with divine honors, and an homage, like unto Deity.

His edicts are law, his power irresponsible; the government is an absolutism, and a system of centralization.

The Chinese state-faith has ethics and politics derived from the system of Confucius, that inculcates the worship of their heaven and the earth.

The priests of the state-faith, subordinate to the emperor-priest, are the court-priests.

What are all such morals, when rational religion is held universally in abeyance to priest-craft and king-craft?

From their bigotry, the people have not advanced to the science of the times. Force has caused them to tolerate other faiths; a contingency dependent on imperial whims!

But many Christians suppose that it was absolutely essential that their dispensation was revealed especially by God, otherwise we could not have had the partial appreciation of him thus obtained!

What professors of peculiar faith can believe in their own peculiar dispensation, as an especial favor of God, when it is all from the world's priestocracy?

All this has been done through mind's perversion, most plainly, assuredly, certainly, and conclusively.

The only dispensation of God is through mind that is rational, and that reveals a universal rational faith, as the indispensable function of rational mind.

What delusion in sanctification, what senseless ambition to become a saint! Yet how idle the effort to all mortals, and how much false pretences about them and their relics! What could the leader, the head of ignorant multitutes, the monarch of the little circle, to be enlarged to their most ardent hopes, have of any divine power when it was not rational religion?

It assumed to be spiritual, but could not be of the right stamp, when it was a temporal absolutism of revelations or miracles!

This is no new thing at all. But sectarians affect to be better than all others. They can affect, that is all. Are they more patriotic, humane, intelligent, honest, truthful or sincere? Do they know that the world appreciates them now in their doctrines of peculiar faith? That their mantle is stripped off them?

The advocates persecuted each other to death, and even at this day, republics, so called to their eternal shame, persecute sister republics to their utter ruin. What confidence can freemen put in peculiar faith?

Do you call any such, religion?

The Greek faith in Russia, teaches that the Czar represents God on earth. It is here that priests are often drunk, and passports are made out by the priests for the dead to go to their heaven! And what sort can it be?

Here czars have been buried in churches, the image of the virgin has wept tears of oil, and a second coat of Christ has been found! Which of the sister churches are the greater evils?

Here foundling hospitals are reared, where children are matured that know not their relations, and lose sight of the propriety of the laws of consanguinity. Incest may be one of the incidents.

With rational mind, no morals can be worse than what results from superstition and the dictation of hierarchies, and it acknowledges no code that permits absolution of sins from any priestocracy, that is thereby still more corrupt and sinful by their false pretences.

The prayers of liberalists and peculiar faith doctrinists, when they are in mutual conflicts, cannot be both right, as they are antagonistic! And this is the perpetual state of the world.

By the same rule, preaching must be vain on its present basis, and its advocates are ignorant, corrupt or debased, worse or more ignorant than their congregation. Their doctrines are constantly clashing, as predestination against universal salvation.

"The Jesuits sought in Russia to increase their power. The impostor to the kingdom had the assurance of the pope of the support of all Catholic Europe in exchange for his promise, to unite Russia to the Latin Church."

What a character the pope is, who pretends to excommunicate the people from their inheritance, at the same time when all the world is equally entitled to all the blessings of mind, by a universal Creator, and much more after his imposture and blasphemy, or his degraded usurpation.

Love characterizes especially the christan above all, it is assumed. But does it, like the charity of too many, only remain at home? What especial claim to love has christianity over any other such faith? What is the circle of the love of religion, but the comprehension of the whole globe? Nothing less is God-like.

Where was the love to man by christians, when one-half of the world was embattled against the other, in the crusades?

The world is the church of God, the mind of man his temple.

All institutions of rational religion must be established on the principles of mind. All their functions are in reference to mind, and all the time, reason presides. Religion then presides where there is rational understanding, and nothing less, if real, genuine, true, rational, not spurious nor mere stumbling-block, but good faith rules.

The spirit of God Almighty, the architect and preserver of the universe, communes with mind; neither God nor mind requires any intercessor, as that would be an imposition.

The moral as intellectual light of God proves itself, and that principles from the nature of creation can be the only messiahs, to execute the commands of the Creator for all.

Let none deny by prayers any of God's all-sufficiency, man thereby intimating that God ought to do more than he does do for mind. Prayers addressed to God in mere words, are rank impiety and blasphemy.

Mind has to do a greater part in the world, than has been ever executed.

No church can be pure where impure doctrines are advocated, as of the messiah, a useless, inefficient and blasphemous non-entity, that cannot exist at all before the attributes of Almighty God.

Some of the Roman clergy take the bible from the people, and preach up a creed of saints, &c., to act as mediators, but there are no half gods before the Supreme. Let these ignorant pretenders be silenced by the wise voice of the world's rational mind.

Miracles are always a part of their dependence, as that of the holy fire at Jerusalem, all unworthy of notice by rational mind, that knows them to be falsified by God's word, cause, and effect, in his whole universe.

In Spain, oaths are taken by some military orders, "to defend the conception of the Holy Virgin."

Virginity of a woman is thus entrusted to perjured oaths, and not on the principles of chastity!! The military followers are involved in perjury, as the chastity is negatived.

What protection have the people in church-membership? They have complete falsehood and sophistry in the pulpit, exceeding all the balance of the world, and that sophistry is self-desecrated by perjury.

Peculiar faith, though of church, is divided into many and endless secessions, construing its ideas of faith differently from all others.

All make sectarianism, none of which is religion, that pays due respect to the Creator exclusively.

Sectarianism separates the natural affections of relations, friends, and citizens.

The papal kingdoms, Roman and Greek, are deeply iniquitous for enslavement of mind; would that this were near all. Such religion is it by peculiar faith?

Who has not sought unsuccessfully, religion, for years, under all the guises and pretences of peculiar faith, that has ever led the mind away from the true object of its devotion! Will an ignis fatuus do for the world's light? Let mind-analysts declare.

In what part of the earth can religion be found, but as a rational and just view of Deity, his creation-gift, that has only to be cherished and rightly cultivated, to become the most rational of all rationality?

The death-bed scene fixes the true fidelity, by her creed. The world, sooner or later, will cherish her holy spirit. Even now, legions are increasing, with the light and freedom of mind.

Her substitute will be discovered to be a deformed and ghastly being, miscalled in her name, but really, superstition, whose attire is steeped in blood.

Her speech is fair, but foul—her thoughts are wicked—her ends selfish—her devotions are earthly, and her faith idolatry, man-worship, and even beastiality: all her ends are seduction, and her termination misery. In anguish and sorrow, mind enlightened turns away from her thousand fields of carnage and savage butchery.

Who will not discard superstition for God's religion, that is made up of forethoughts and principles, the loftiest aspirations and the noblest aims?

Man's faith is made up of after-thoughts and ruin, instead of pure principles, having a world tinkered on and botched up with peculiar faith, by which it is bankrupt.

Religion has operated from creation, all the time silently and modestly, even by moral influences and conscience.

Peculiar faith is only for a time guided by force, sinister devices, self-interest and delusion.

Religion yields all the very best system of accountability for the wants of mankind, sets forth all the legitimate influence in the world, from which result the best governments.

"About 606 the most profound ignorance, debauchery, and superstition reigned. From this time the popes exerted all their power in promoting the idolatrous worship of images, saints, reliques, and angels.

The church was truly deplorable; all the clergy up to the most flagrant and abominable acts of licentiousness.

Places of worship resembled the temples of heathen, more than the churches of christians." Of course the improvement is due to mind in civilization: what else?

To propagate their doctrines, the anabaptists sought by holy fraud, which being ineffectual, they had recourse to arms, declared war against all laws, governments, and magistrates of every kind, under the chimerical pretext, that Christ himself was now to take the reins of all government into his hands.

Sermonizing is not argument for religion, and does not touch the point or question. It is all one-sided, the most warped at that.

What is the world about to suffer it? Its duty is to fully investigate the other side.

Does any church of peculiar faith stand on the truth? Does priestly domination prove it satisfactorily? All proof must be rational; there can be no other in the universe.

Can we forget the stumbling blocks of churches, the ministry silenced or degraded by lusts and all human nature's inquities, with their vows broken!

Of all the sophistries in this sophisticated world, is the presumption to supersede mind, the only pilot of the world, and the sole means of communion with the universe and its Creator, by the bibles of miracles, prophecies and mysteries.

The only bible is that of mind, commenced with all rational beings, more or less with creation's birth, and vital existence.

Why do church people affect to be better than the rest of the world? They are stupidly or wilfully ignorant of their false position.

God is the judge of all, not church people, whom he cannot know in that or any peculiar light.

When all nations are judged, the people will show some dark spots left of dark and sinful ages.

The proper result decides the question in the most available characteristic under the whole circumstances, as wise men prefer those for their general best character, not adopt church membership for the selection. Which of the many churches contending for orthodoxy, is orthodox? By what test shall the solution be made? Faith will not decide of course, without mind and reason, that bring out all the mental and soul capital, and resources.

In orthodoxy, mind and reason, not faith, decide.

Faith will be false as interest inclines, therefore mind and reason must counteract it.

The exclusive test of utility is reason.

The mental seed must be good, or the harvest will be spoiled: now orthodoxy is right thought, and that implies rational mind, whose banner is reason, not faith.

The last is foolish, not correct thought.

But the bible exacts a peculiar faith, else the damnation threatened by the makers, aiders, and abettors follows.

The idea of our God negatives any peculiar faith, as his attributes are universal.

Any one who believes the bible not written by man's collusion and designs, cannot have an honest but peculiar faith.

God is too pure to require any but an honest faith. Wise and good men wish no other.

Our immortal interest guarantees the best, and that is in God.

There must be reason that follows the will in such a decision of mind, for all must be truly convinced to believe truly.

If miracles are performed now by the members of the Roman church, how came the pope not to prevent, as a supreme minister of peace, by miracle, his own expulsion from his government, to prevent the slaughter and butchery of thousands of his countrymen by foreign bayonets, of a sister republic, clashing with a sister republic before his restoration, and save the clash of principles, one of the mighty difficulties that would have benefited all his people? Then was the auspicious time to have stayed the effusion of blood, and have performed a miracle worthy of mind and the world, for its universal conversion! But all peculiar faith is ever in conflict with God's principles. How long can smuggled faith supersede religion and reason.

Do not expect much from the peculiar faith of any preachers who play cards, or commit any licentious and lustful vices, though they may show many beautiful bibles, or noisy church membership.

With christians, their good are saints, but they estimate the good of the world besides, as sinners. Who made them competent judges? Have they analyzed the world-wide subjects, that mind in its most exalted civilization can do?

Mind must be thus false on preconceived notions, however exploded the absurdity, therefore mind must counteract all such.

A devil is superfluous, an abstract non-entity, and unnecessary, as mind, when perverted, is its own worst punisher, individually or nationally, by retribution of conservative principles, that vindicate themselves.

The division of several churches on sectional and national sectarianism in this union, the adherents of a part over-riding the constitution, display the malignancy of peculiar faith, and render her subversive, by example, of the liberties of the country, and the best hopes of the world.

We never will get the world right till we rid it of its corrupting influences. Do you wish purity? Then be pure yourself, in thought, word, and deed; proved by example abstracted from worldly speculation. Waver not, when principles require it, and be above self-reproach, much more above the reproach of the world, that should look at the principles of religion instead of the delusions and chimeras of peculiar faith.

Follow no church authority, that is individual, but act in accordance with principles, that are universal.

Neither sex is exempt from degrading and demoralizing nature in the church, and some are actually worse for church membership. Some are better by their honest natures realizing the virtues connected with proper mental discipline under rational religion, whilst most reflect the vices of peculiar faith and its partisan zeal.

Church vices and despotism are enormous.

They have crimes worse than inquisitions.

The basis of their creation excludes God's sovereign rights and attributes.

What church, then, has not necessarily bigots?

The discipline of the church is paramount to many paramount universal principles.

What can be worse than the present tyranny of the Roman hierarchy, embracing its inquisition.

There is something worse the cause of such institutions, peculiar faith. All bigots are inquisitors; then they are abundant even in this country, this republic.

Protestants are imprisoned for refusing to uncover their head while a Roman procession was passing.

What is the position of woman under the tyranny of peculiar faith but that of a degraded being?

She owes her exaltation in this country to the liberal light of mind.

The adulterer is a part of the peculiar faith, and can dispense with its obligations. The interpretation rests with him at confessional, who rules the wife and virtue, or principle. So much for Roman peculiar faith.

But independent of absolutism, principle causes such adulterer to put himself in the power, not over the power of the offended party, and forfeit his life if he choose its risk.

All main crimes, as adultery and drunkenness, are under the abeyance of principles, not of faith, where mind has its influence.

In vain may mind seek their correction by getting good stock and causing it to be well improved, independent of property, the last and least consideration; but the means of peculiar faith may destroy and annihilate all such exertions, and reflect on the miseries of the balance of the world. Then mind, that sees the world as it is, must desire the world's, not priests' prosperity. What errors are committed by churchmen! Millions join the church and have to leave it, or disgrace the church worse by continuance.

Their faith is not improved religion.

Church memberships by myriads, show that the word preached, is only received as that of man's. It is impossible for sincerity to act otherwise; hearing the word is a contingency the world over, but its right adoption is the thing for mind to recognise. That word is the result of rational religion.

The acts of mind portrayed in conscience, are constantly and uniformly proved to be by the only true word of God, cause and effect, for correct analysis of mind and its truthful sincere adoption.

Conscientious minds devoted exclusively to God, to whom all adoration is due, actually would refuse church-membership to any peculiar faith.

Men of principles can be made no better by joining any church.

Are none made worse by joining a perfectly useless thing? The great divisions of the church recently enacted in England, and more particularly in this country, appear a disgrace to those of the great church, so called of the world, always holding the genuine majority.

This position in this union declared in not less than two great divisions, declares a miserable example for its citizens, and familiarizes them to the accursed spirit of disunion. Such agitation is a hideous, but dangerous burlesque in religion.

The people at large are growing more and more sectional, from that degraded cause, and that, too, when the elements and light of mind are now best prepared to elicit more universal brotherhood. Where is union in church, but for union of interest? The light of faith in churches, is behind its proper position in the circle of liberty and mind. The position is not tenable, and has to be eradicated, expunged by truth and reason.

This mighty nation, to have the most powerful light of all nations, whose brilliancy from its glorious confederation, must reflect on the world at all points, at once, with gigantic strides to civilization, must take the noblest stand on all great conservative principles.

Already is she pouring in her noble offering, the best of mind, that atones for the original sin committed at first by a half civilized mother, whom she entreated to spare her this horrible crime. But relentless self-interest saw naught but profit over man's rights.

Through the influence of both nations, and the avenues of mighty commerce, Africa begins in earnest to reach civilization. by the only practical effects of mind. Already has she in part become regenerated from barbarism, at the best practicable point, and many of the descendants, America-Africans, who from thousands have become four millions of human beings, advancing on the blessings of mind, have established a free government, and already man-piracy is arrested for a large extent of coast.

What shall we say of the balance of the world? All peculiar faith dogmas and doctrines, will avail it naught, till mind rears its majestic influence, and its potency will rear a fabric for the glory of rational religion. All its churches are naught, and built on materials robbed of mind and religion, that direct man's chief good by intellectual and moral light, most refulgent.

What shall we say of that faith that produces change or conversion in a moment?

We must analyze the state of all minds, in this passion.

There is deep excitement, then a composure ensues, as the feelings will run their course and limit.

Some church professions exhibit no such show; as far as we can appreciate, the Romans and Episcopalians do not.

Wo unto all churches and members of churches, especially their heads, that hide the light of science under the pretences of faith.

You can never open your mouth against the atheists, as you reject the light of reason, that cuts them all down, and all your bibles of tradition, and all its doctrines of polytheism, or faith in more than one God.

It may seem singular, but it certainly is true, and vouches for the masterly handwriting of the Supreme God, who never lets mind, that has executed its trust, mistake the proof.

Nor need you fear the results of Mahometanism, Mormonism, or any analogous fanaticism or superstition.

They or you can never succeed, before the religion of God. Did you and all your fraternity not give an impetus to those very fanaticisms?

Have you not forwarded man-worship and superstition? Did you not believe in superstition, and what is that but a base for all such peculiar faith vagaries? See how the Christians love one another!

Which of the sects—for see how some sects detest and hate the others? All divisions of sectarianism think themselves orthodox, all infallible; of course, all others fallible, and to be put down.

How bad is it for churches of the same persuasion to be litigant. Is there any love there? Who believes it?

What can be worse than all the petty church priest tyranny? What, under such regime, does it matter about exclusion from confession, excommunication, &c.? Where is the mind-benefit?

Priests are tyrants, popes are murderers, and antagonistic to republican principles, avowed by their citizens.

What does mind need of these, to aid its progress in virtue. Church services stop on time, but mind always acts for itself, if left sound to do so.

What shall we say of the secret vices of the churches, of many members?

Have the head or leading men of some churches ever supported the means productive thereof?

We may counteract much of the world's nuisances and crimes, but not break up or eradicate at present, when there is so much corrupt collusion in the old overgrown cities. What is all church protection worth, to poor, ignorant females, who neglect the supremacy of mind?

No youth, females especially, should go to cities to live, that can be properly supported in the country. Not that they should not go thither, but when they go to cities contrary to the prudent advice of discreet friends, they lay themselves liable to suspicion, unless for rational considerations and laudable objects.

As suicide in woman is always suspicious, it is especially so in town residence, thus situated.

Woman should always keep sacred their right position above suspicion. What good do nunneries?

What is even monastic perfection attained by, but a trifling against God and his natural laws?

What are the sacred osteology, the holy tear of Vendome, and all such ignominious trifles before God?

Was it for such, that the proscriptions and butchery of past ages were perpetrated, society split asunder, and the world confounded and oppressed?

Who can honestly believe in all such, though sanctioned by any church? Who can credit any of the machinery of Christ, if his mind duly investigate this comprehensive subject fairly and honestly?

If popularity and emoluments be thus won, we do not wish them at the expense of honor, mind and religion. Mind must counteract what the time may not exactly suit to eradicate and supersede, by innovation, reformation, or conservative revolution.

What has not enlightened public opinion in republican constitutional freedom, in her upward and onward progress, to perform? Mind has to do the world the proper justice. What can churches do in this respect? The most they can effect is their own peculiar organizations, and perpetuate their own unredeemed abuses. But what avail the world all its peculiar organizations, that are made for the peculiar institutions, not the whole world? That is certain.

Churches have the elements of dissension, not only against each other, but actually among themselves in Europe, America, all over the globe. Peculiar faith wars are the bloodiest, for there is necessarily the enthusiasm of bigotry, the most fanatical of all enthusiasms.

Who can join themselves to church clans, that are identified to their exclusive interests above all others, not having any love of principles, but principals before their eyes? What must be the feelings of some independent thinkers to find themselves liable, as all such, to judicial investigation, at the pleasure of members?

Are lodges and private societies helpers to bind their members to the same power, also to propagate bible traditions? Are they doing the universal brotherhood of the whole world that justice that religion enjoins?

When the hardened sinner, full of years and iniquity, is converted in the deep infirmities of flesh and mind, probably at his death-bed scene, who can believe that his phrenological developments are properly changed? Are not such changes the gradual effect of virtue? This justification is at the bar of conscience and reason, and must be attended with the utmost difficulty, as some are of the lowest organization. Intelligent good citizens are bound to see all this, and correct all necessary as they live.

This is not a question of feeling, but of religion, the highest reason. Most church members are so bigoted that they talk of the world as no one but themselves having any faith. Where are God, mind, and its God-gift, religion? Some professors are worthy, whilst the most are unworthy members of society.

What can all the tenets of church doctrines avail when the organization of churches has no foundation?

What avail baptismal regeneration, when there is no valid baptism? "Dr. Musgrave, archbishop of York, in his primary visitation, distinctly disavowed the doctrines of baptismal regeneration."

What can we expect of baptism, when there is no baptism? There is no mission but that of mind, no commission but for its rational religion. All else is irrational, vain and idle folly. What church of peculiar faith is there but is troubled, and if old enough, divided?

How deplorable has been the state of the Roman church? To what abominations and mind degradations has she not resorted as long as mind permitted her?

In some priest-ridden countries, oppressed by intolerance of Romanism, one has to fall on his knees before the procession of the host which passes, and conform outwardly to observances which are exacted of him. This is honor and respect to mind, the noblest part of man, with a vengeance.

Time will be when this slavish felony will be duly estimated, and the priestocracy scouted on earth.

Are the worship of the figures of the virgin, &c., the institution of the holy sacrament and miracles, the procession of the miraculous wafers, the assumption of catholic majesty, defender of the faith, all these tricks and impostures the less to be deplored and objected to? What peculiar faith is to be, can be defended?

Are whole nations to be committed to an ignominious credulity, and the peace of the world disregarded therefor? The history of the miraculous wafers discloses an awful tragedy. The object was attained by killing the wealthy Jews in Brussels for their money, which the clergy obtained. Is not this felony still enjoyed?

All persuasions persecuted each other most abominably once under the peculiar faith garb. The priestocracies incited this, and enjoyed it over the ruins of the world, as much as Nero in the fire of Rome.

What a felony, then, is the base of all sects!

The working of miracles would rise to-day, if popular ignorance licensed it. Who needs the actors?

The actors are prepared, if the audience could be found. Poor imbeciles, who cannot estimate the value of their own mind. What greater blasphemy can arise than from hypocritical peculiar faith?

What good comes of any institution that erects an inquisition at this day at Rome?

If this prevail while the press speaks, what were its horrors when there was none to befriend man?

Of what value to society are nunneries and such societies, but to entice the holders of property to bestow it as a legacy on cunning priestocracies?

How much better to the world would it be, that all this should be the world's fund for mind and virtue.

All church property should be appropriated for educational purposes, and then we would begin to be right. Then church-faith would go with speculation to uphold it, and no state-church-supremacy would blight and blast the honest effusions of mind, and its religion.

The fund for bickering and opposition, even to rebellion, wars and crusades, would become extinct.

Citizens of the world, it is yours to decide this momentous question, to still the world-wide agitation.

Have no state and church endowments and preferments.

What would Juggernaut be without his car and his brute parasites, priests, and their minions?

What better are those that adopt the mummeries of church pretences?

What division of the world's bigots has the least vindictiveness when clothed with the brief authority of power? In protestant countries, the laws against popery were brutal in olden times.

In the year 1700, the Assembly passed a law to hang every popish priest who should come voluntarily into New York. Think of that, in these times of mind!

All sectarians swear they are right; of course, all others are wrong. What then is religion, and to whom is it due? It is the sacred obligation of mind to God most directly, not through messiahs or priestocracies. All that is a false position of peculiar faith.

Bigots and fanatics, the world over, will assume to decide this mighty question of religion, that they do not begin to apprectate or recognise, by their feelings of enthusiasm and narrow prejudices, exclusively by the doctrines of peculiar faith, that do and cannot touch the question at all. They persist that they are better by their faith, impudently arrogating pretensions not supported by their actions.

Religionists only claim to believe in the immortal God alone. Polytheists, called Christians, believe in four gods, many angels and spirits on earth, while one of their main ones is a mortal, on the laws of physiology, and illegitimate at that!

On the laws of the highest religion, he is a blasphemer. Ignorant of the earth's figure and its conservative principles, they, Jews and Christians, stupidly substituted ministers, angels and spirits in their place.

But no matter how absurd all this, it is peculiar faith, and that is sought to be made unquestionable, not however by any law of civilized mind.

The true faith must ever be in duty to God and mind. Peculiar faith believes in duty to gods, and that causes wars among men, who have their notions about these things, that if in power must be carried out, however repugnant their false views to society. Duty to God alone has naught to do with trade and speculation, whereas peculiar faith lives by them all the time.

The sooner all this is taken away, the better for pure religion and the universal good of all mankind.

What avails the prayer of the priestocracy, said over dead bodies for the redemption of their souls? It only avails the pockets of these pretended functionaries?

The question was decided by the decision of principles at the end of life, for the immortal soul.

So far as it concerns the balance, the pockets of the priestocracy are better filled, but those of the soul's representatives are emptied by gulling speculations of an ignoble and debauched set of blasphemers.

This vicegerentship is an absurdity, and heinously is the doctrine corrupting. All emanates from the priestocracy. God's attributes cannot be invaded for a moment, much less to be thus explained away. Individual accountability must be met by retributive justice for that particular mind, the soul embodiment, to produce the best happiness of the spirit embodiment, that may be a spiritual etherealization. An intolerant church is a butcher, all sectarian churches are nuisances. But evils have their end, that is a means to produce good by the manifest providence of conservative principles.

Persecution arouses up all the latent energies and zeal of mind, that is certain. Crush a man's spirit, dispirit him by misfortunes, and you arouse his ambition and talents, if he be of the right standard.

If obscure preachers are convicted as nuisances, vilifying other sects, what can we expect of their whole position.

Falling from grace is affirmed by some, and utterly denied by other churches. When members of churches fall or sin, they are considered by the last brethren, as never possessing the faith, and of course never attaining the point of correction.

This position implies that the position of faith is according to opinion, and that opinion, unless the result of science, reason and cultivated mind a serious mistake, or a degraded hypocrisy.

Give power even to persecuted protestants, and they will persecute most horribly, as the people that settled Rhode Island, an outcast from her sisters of New England can tell!

What superstition can induce the belief that it is in the nature of mind, to have sudden complete conversions?

Is there no ground for suspicion in some; is there no prompting from passions, as avarice or ambition? Are there no preferments to be expected in, by or through the church? But how about revivals? The world may have all that are legitimate.

The world is better, and improves on its improvement.

More crime is apparent than ever, by its superior general intelligence, and its varied excellence of means over that of past ages. How many of the superficial of the world, set themselves up for analyzers?

Past and ignorant ages gave in to the predominance of military ambition, but ere long a new era will burst in upon the world. Between Fulton and Napoleon, a few years hence, a decision will be made for science of mind over the butchery of mankind, the exalter over the corruptor of nations. What a distance is there already, between Washington and Napoleon?

If all societies, secret or others, fostered the greatest good of the world, which is the most, as it would be, of all, then they could not be clannish, or sectarian, or segregated. The justice of life is to be universally diffused. The christians can appropriate the claim of exclusive protectors of science for several reasons, as they were its bitterest unprincipled opponents, especially whenever their faith came in antagonism to science. The Saracens protected learning, in the 9th century. All this was nothing beyond the force of circumstances of ambition, lust of power, and the inherent capacity of principles.

How was the christian church recovered at various times from its deepest heresies, corruptions and schisms, but by the potency of mind, that will eradicate all, in time? When churches, creeds, faiths and the perverted cliques of the world, seek to extirpate natural improvements, they must first seek to extirpate mind, the world's active guardian, after God

But the church-converted, are the only people to be saved! Who are they? Of course, those in the peculiar church are meant. But the main question remains for solution. Are they of the church of God Almighty? Did they not eschew him when they adopted others?

As feeling presumes to define and decide this pretence, analysis decides it is not correct, as feeling is erroneous as peculiar education that originates it, when reason has not been heard. What avail church organizations, when the policy is worthless? The policy of mind is, to be honest and truthful.
